From this point of being, he is supposed to be the Archimedes capable of making turn everything that develops in this structure first evoked, of which the circumscribing of an "I lose" by which I began, gives the key.

(66) Would it be interesting to see there being reproduced here this effect of loss, beyond the operation that the analytic act centres? I think that by posing the question in these terms, it will immediately appear to you that there is no doubt that it is in the insufficiency, I would say, of analytic production that there ought to be read something which corresponds to this dimension of obstacle. Beyond an act that is supposed to bring to an end (faire fin), but whose magisterial point we must suppose if we want to be able to speak about anything at all concerning it. Moreover, there is nothing excessive in evoking it, when the analysts themselves, and those who may most fall under the threat of the designation of this obstacle - there where I am proposing that we should search for the incidence which can complete the support, indeed establish it - of our critique. There is nothing excessive in speaking about this turning point, in speaking about the passage of the psychoanalysand to the psychoanalyst, since among psychoanalysts themselves the reference to the very thing that I have just evoked is constant and given as a condition of any analytic competence.

It could be an infinite task to put the psychoanalytic literature to the test. Moreover, I have highlighted some examples of it on the horizon. In my first class this year I cited the article by Rappaport which could be called in French (it appeared in the International Journal) "statut analytique du penser". Thinking, the present participle. In such a large gathering it would be tedious, inefficient, to take such an article to see there being manifested in it the best of good intentions, as I might say. A sort of flattening of everything that can, from the Freudian statement itself, be organised in terms of stating what is involved for the function of thinking in what is called the analytic economy. The striking thing about it would be that the tearing apart that is marked at every instant, the impossibility of not, for example, making this montage or démontage, as you wish, of thinking, start from the primary process itself, at the level of what Freud designates as primary hallucination. This is linked to the first pathetic search, that supposed by the simple existence of a motor system. When it does not encounter the object of its satisfaction, it is supposed - at the source of the explanation of the primary process - to be responsible for this regressive process which makes the phantastical image of what is sought appear.

The complete incompatibility of this register, which is nevertheless put under the heading of thinking, with what in the secondary process is established in (67) terms of a thinking which is a sort of reduced action, a small scale action which makes it necessary to pass into a completely different register than the one first evoked, namely, the introduction of the dimension of reality testing, does not fail to be noted in passing by the author. In pursuing his path imperturbably he will come to see that not only are there not two modes and two registers of thinking but that there are an infinity of them which are to be more or less echeloned in what psychologists had previously noted in terms of stages of consciousness. And consequently to completely reduce the relief of what had been contributed by Freud to what is called the reduction to general psychology, namely, to its abolition. This is only a trivial example and each one of you can, each one as you wish, can go and confirm it. If other people saw the interest in holding a seminar in which something like this would be followed in its details - why not - the important thing it seems to me is that it is completely eluded in

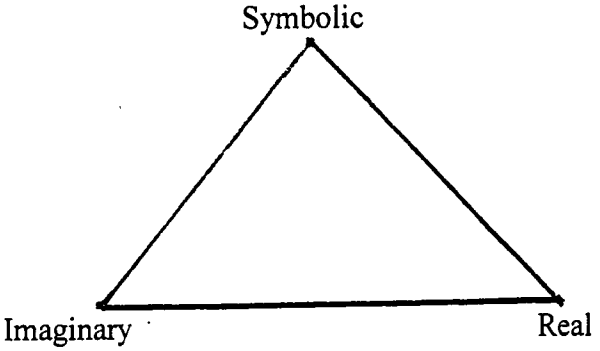
this perspective of reduction and consequently fails. What is striking, outstanding, extraordinary, implied in this dimension of primary process is something which can be expressed more or less as follows: not "in the beginning is dissatisfaction", which means nothing. It is not that the living individual chases after satisfaction that is important, it is that there is a status of enjoyment (jouissance) which is dissatisfaction.

To elude it as original, as implied in the theory of the one who introduced it, this theory, it does not matter whether or not he expressed it like that, but if he constructed it like that, namely, if he formulated the pleasure principle as it had never been formulated before him, for pleasure from all time served to define the good, it was satisfaction in itself. Except for the fact that no one was able to believe it, because everyone knew from all time that to be in the good is not always satisfying. Freud introduces this other thing. It is a matter of seeing what is the consistency between this point and the one first indicated in the dimension of truth.

I opened a journal by chance. I do not know what it is, a weekly, a tri-annual, in which I saw distinguished signatures, one from the side of the horizon where the divine battle is still firing on all cylinders, that for the good precisely. I saw an article which began with a sort of incantation around "the symbolic, the imaginary and the real". ... To which the person referred the illumination that had been brought into the world by this tripartition for which I am responsible. And he valiantly concludes: to us this says what it says, the Real is God. This is (68) how people can say that I am a contribution to theological faith.

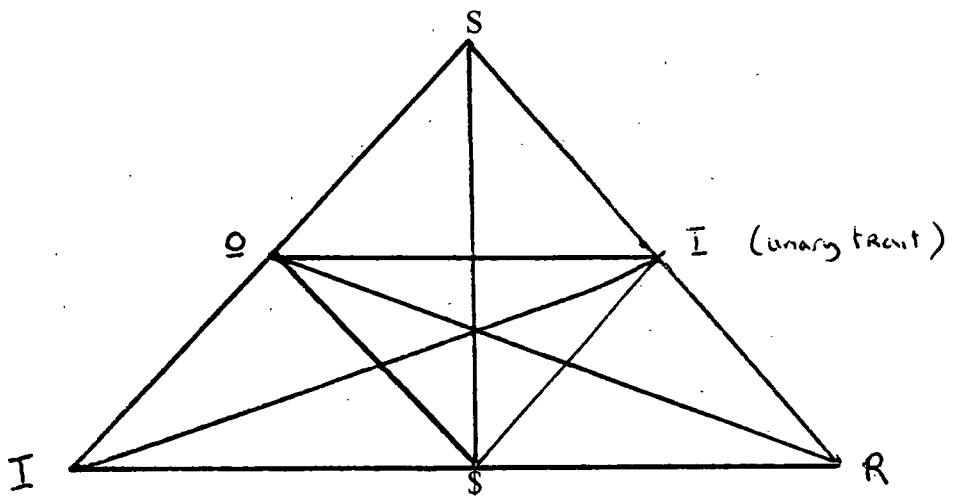
This, all the same, encouraged me to do something that I will attempt for the numerous people who see that this is mixed up. That what can be indicated, if one takes these terms otherwise than in the absolute, is the following:

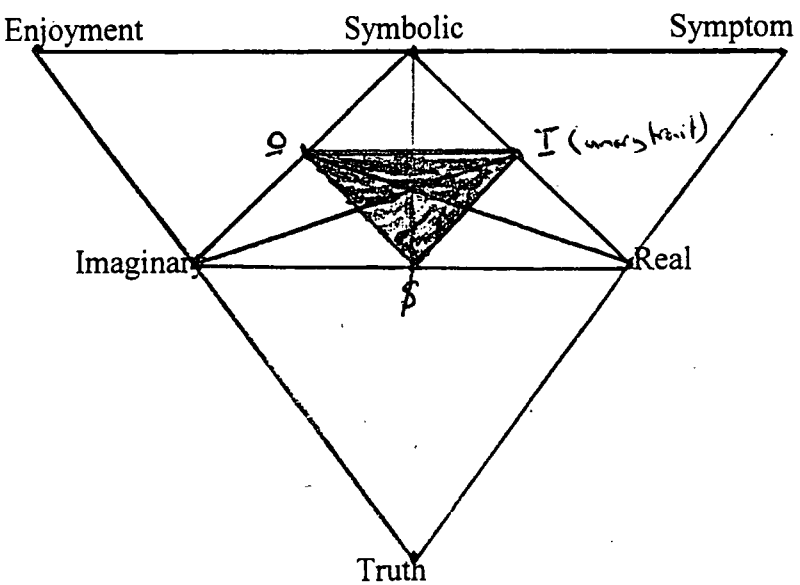


The symbolic, if you wish, we are going to put like that.

The imaginary, we are going to put it over here and the real ... it is completely idiotic, like that.

There would really be nothing to make of it, especially not a rectangular triangle, if, perhaps finally, to allow us a little to pose questions.





You are not going to go around with that on a piece of paper saying to yourself: what square am I in! All the same.

(69) If we remember what I teach about the subject as determined by two signifiers or more exactly by a signifier as representing it for another signifier, why not put the barred Subject like a projection onto the other side? This will allow there to be asked what is involved in the relation of the Subject between the Imaginary and the Real.

On the other hand this I of the unary stroke, the one we start from to see how, effectively, in the development of the mechanism, this mechanism of the incidence of the signifier in development, is produced, namely, the first Identification. We will put it also as a projection on the other side.

The third function will be given me by this "o" which is something like a falling of the Real onto the vector stretched from the Symbolic to the Imaginary, namely, how the signifier can very well take its material, who would see in this an obstacle, in the imaginary functions, namely, in the most fragile, the most difficult thing to grasp as far as man is concerned. Not that there are not in him primitive images destined to provide us with a guide in nature, but precisely, as the signifier lays hold of them, they are always very difficult to locate in their raw state.

You see that the question can be posed about what the vectors uniting each one of these mapped out points represent. This is going to have an interest - that is why, of course, I am preparing you for this little game. The fact is that, all the same, since we have been speaking about the psychoanalytic act, all we have been able to do is to re-evoke the dimensions in which there are deployed our (70) references concerning the function of the symptom when we have posited it as putting a check on what is knowable, on knowledge, which always represents some truth. We would put here what constitutes the third pole, namely, enjoyment.

This introduces more correctly a certain fundamental attachment of the human spirit to the imaginary. This introduces something that can help you like cardinal points and which perhaps may serve as a support every time I evoke one of these poles, for example, like today, I pose the question of what is involved in the act of the analyst with respect to the truth.

At the start the question can and ought to be posed, does the analytic act take charge of the truth? It seems to do so, but who would dare to take responsibility for the truth without drawing derision on himself? In certain cases I take myself for Pontius Pilate. There is a pretty image in Claudel. Pontius Pilate whose only mistake was to pose this question, he was unlucky, he is the only one to have posed it before the truth. That knocked him a little off centre. The result is, (here I am staying in Claudel's register, it is he who invented that) that when he was travelling afterwards, all the idols (it is still Claudel who is speaking) saw their bellies opening and clattering down with the loud noise of a slot machine.

I am not posing the question, either in this context or with such vigour to obtain this result. But in any case, sometimes, it is close to it. The psychoanalyst does not take charge of the truth. He does not take charge of the truth because none of the poles can be judged in function of what it represents in terms of our three starting vertices, namely, that the truth is at the locus of the Other, the

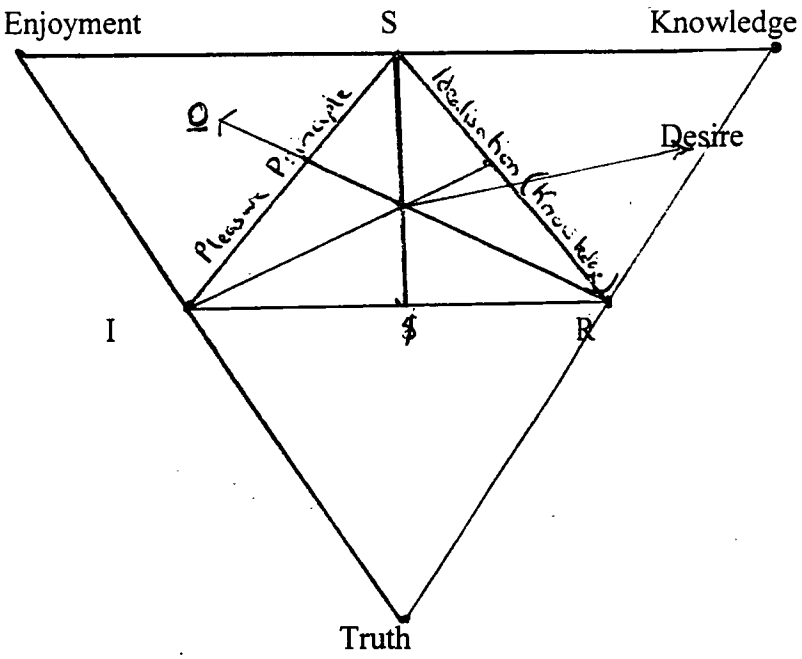
(71) inscription of the signifier. Namely, the truth is not there like that, any more than enjoyment in fact, which certainly has a relation with the Real, but from which precisely the pleasure principle is designed to separate us. As for Knowledge, it is an imaginary function, an incontestable idealisation, this is what renders delicate the position of the analyst who is in the middle, where there is the void, the hole, the place of desire.



But this involves a certain number of taboo points, in a way, of discipline, namely, that since one has to answer to something, I mean those who come to consult the analyst in order to find more security (assurance), well then my God, it happens that a theory is constructed of the conditions of the security that ought to come to someone who develops normally. It is a very lovely myth.

There is an article by Erik Erikson on the dream of Irma's injection that is constructed in this way. He enumerates in stages, how there ought to be edified the security of the little chap who first of all has had a suitable Mammy, one who has, of course, learnt her lessons in the books of psychoanalysts. And there is a series of stages which goes right to the peak, to give us (I already evoked it at one time) a perfectly secure GI. This can be constructed. Everything can be constructed in terms of psychology. It is a matter of knowing how the psychoanalytic act is compatible with such rubbish. It must be believed that it has something to do and the word rubbish (déchet) is not to be taken there as coming by chance. Perhaps by pinpointing, as we should, certain theoretical productions, we can immediately locate on this map, since it is a map, so Socratic a one that it is no more than the one I evoked the other day in connection with Meno. That has no more import, import as an exercise, than to see the relation that a production can have which, in no case, has a function with respect to the practice that even the analysts most exuberant about these constructions, in general optimistic, respect no less. No psychoanalyst, unless through excess or by way of exception, is going to believe in it when he intervenes.

The relation of these productions to the natural high point of rubbish here, namely the o, may help us to make progress as regards what is involved in the relation of analytic production to another term. For example, that of the idealisation of his social position that we would put on the side of the I.

In short, the inauguration of a method of discernment of what is involved in the (72) productions of the analytic act, of the perhaps necessary amount of loss, I am not saying, that it involves, may be of a nature not at all simply to illuminate with a bright light what is involved in the analytic act, of the status that is presupposes and that it supports in the ambiguity it deploys. And why stop at any particular point of the extension of this ambiguity, until, as I might say, we have come back to our point of departure, if it is true that there is no way of getting out of it, we may as well complete the circuit of it.

We are going to try this year to give a first trial image of it. For this, for example, I am not, of course, going to take the worst examples. There is rubbish and there is rubbish. There is uninterpretable rubbish, even though you should pay attention that this designation of uninterpretable is not taken here in the proper sense.

Let us take an excellent author: Mr Winnicott. It is remarkable that this author to whom we owe one the most crucial discoveries, I remember, and I will never fail to come to it in homage in my memory, the help the transitional object, as he put it forward, gave me when I was questioning myself about the way to demystify the function of the so-called partial object, as we see it being sustained to support the most abstruse, the most mystifying, the least clinical theory about the so-called developmental relations of the pre-genital with respect to the genital.

The simple introduction of this little object that Mr. Winnicott calls the transitional object, this little piece of cloth that the baby, before the drama around which there have accumulated so many confused clouds, before this drama of weaning, which, when we observe it, is not at all necessarily a drama. As someone who does not lack penetration pointed out to me, it can happen that the person who most resents weaning is the mother. The presence, the simple presence in this case which seems in a way to be the support, the fundamental arch thanks to which everything would no longer ever after be developed simply in terms of a dual relation, the relation of the child to the mother. It is immediately interfered with by the functions of this tiny object whose status Winnicott articulates for us.

I will take up next year (January 10th) these features whose description one can say is exemplary. It is enough to read Mr Winnicott to translate him in a way. It is clear that this little piece of cloth or of blanket, a dirty piece that the infant

(73) clings onto, which in a way is something to see here, the relation to this first object of enjoyment which is not the mother's breast which is never there permanently, but one that is always within reach: the thumb of the child's hand. How can analysts distance themselves to this degree from their experience of what is brought to them in the first place about the function of the hand, to the point that for them human (l'humain) ought to be written l'hu-main (with a hyphen in the middle).

The reading that I am recommending to you is in number five of this journal which passed as mine for a long time, which is called, La psychanalyse. There is a translation of this transitional object of Winnicott. Read it. There is nothing more tiring than reading something and less likely to hold the attention. But if someone wants to do it the next time, who will not understand that all of this is to say what this little o object is. It is neither within, nor without, neither real nor illusory. It does not enter at all into this artful construction that the usual analysis edifies around narcissism by seeing in it something completely different than what it is meant for. Namely, not to make two moral aspects, namely, on the one side self-love and on the other that of the object, as they put it.

It is very clear, I already did it here, in reading what Freud said about the Real Ich and the Lust Ich, that it was to demonstrate to us that the first object was the Lust Ich, namely, myself the rule of my pleasure and that it remains so.

So then this whole precious description which is so close to the o-object, only lacks one thing, which is that one sees that everything that is said about it means nothing but the bud, the point, the first emergence from the earth of what? Of what the o-object commands, namely, the subject. The subject as such, which functions at first at the level of this transitional object. This is certainly not a test designed to diminish the sort of production that can be done around the analytic act. But you will see what is involved in it when Winnicott pushes things further. Namely, when he is no longer the observer of the little baby (he is more capable of it than many others), but maps out his own technique concerning what he, for his part, seeks to know, in an open way. I indicated it to you the last time at the beginning of the lecture, namely, The Truth.

This self that he speaks about as something that is there from all time, behind everything that is happening before even the subject is mapped out in any way, something is capable of freezing, he says, the situation of lack. When the (74) environment is not suitable in the first days, in the first months of the baby, something may function which brings about this freezing, this gelation. Undoubtedly, this is something which only experience can settle. And there again there is, with respect to these psychotic consequences, something that Winnicott saw very clearly. But behind this freezing, there is, Winnicott tells us this self which is waiting. This self which, by being frozen, constitutes the false self that Mr. Winnicott has to return to by a process of regression whose relation to the acting (agir) of the analyst it will be the object of my discourse the next time to show. Behind this false self there is waiting what? The true to start up again. Who does not see, when we already have in analytic theory the Real Ich, the Lust Ich, the ego, the id, all these references already articulated enough to define our field, that the addition of this self represents nothing other than, as it is avowed in the text with false and true, the truth? But who does not also see that there is no other true-self behind this situation than Mr Winnicott himself, who places himself here as the presence of the truth.

This says nothing to involve in any way a disparagement of what this position leads him too. As you will see the next time, extracted from his own text, it is a position which avows that it must as such and in an avowed way emerge from the analytic act, to take up the position of doing, through which he assumes, as another analyst puts it, to answer all the needs of the patient.

We are not here to go into the details of what this leads to. We are here to indicate how the slightest miscognition - and how would it not exist since it is not yet defined - the slightest miscognition of what is involved in the analytic act, immediately draws the one who assumes it, and all the more so if he is more certain, more capable - I am quoting this author because I consider that there is no one who comes near him in English - that immediately he is brought, black on white, to the negation of the analytic position.

This just by itself appears to me to confirm, to give a beginning, if not yet a support to what I am introducing as the method of a critique by theoretical expressions of what is involved in the status of the psychoanalytic act.

10 January 1968

Seminar 5: Wednesday 10 January 1968.

I offer you my good wishes for the New Year, as they say.

Why "new"? All the same it is like the moon, when it has finished it begins again. And this point of finishing and of recommencing one could put anywhere, where, perhaps as opposed to the moon which was made, as every knows, and as a familiar saying recalls, for the intention of a not indifferent person. And there is a moment when the moon disappears, which is a reason for declaring it to be new afterwards.

But for the year, and for many other things and generally for what is called the real, there is no assignable beginning. Nevertheless, it is necessary that it should have one once it had been called "year", because of the signifying mapping out of what is found, for one part of this real, to be defined as a cycle.

It is a cycle that is not quite accurate, like all the cycles in the real. But once one grasps it as cycle, there is a signifier that does not quite agree with the real. It is corrected by speaking, for example, about a great year in connection with a little thing that varies from year to year until it makes up 28,000 years. In short, it is recycled.

So then, where should one put the beginning of the year, for example? This is where the act comes in. This at least is one of the ways of tackling what is involved in the act, a structure about which, if you search carefully, you will see that people have, when all is said and done, spoken little.

The New Year gives me the opportunity to approach it from this angle.

(76) An act is linked to the determination of the beginning, and very especially where there is need to make one, because, precisely, one does not exist. That is why, in short, what I did at the beginning has a certain sense. To offer you my wishes for a good year, is something that enters into the field of the act. Naturally, a small act, a very lay residue of act. But do not forget that if we make these little bowings and scrapings - which are always more or less going out of fashion, but which subsist, this is what is remarkable - it is as an echo of things that people speak about as if they were gone, namely, ceremonial acts which, in a framework that one can call the Empire, acts which consisted in the fact that on that day the Emperor handled the plough with his own hands.

It is an organised act that marked a beginning in so far as it was essential for a certain order of empire that this foundation renewed at the beginning of each year should be marked. We see here the dimension of what is called the traditional act, the one founded on a certain necessity of transferring something considered as essential in the order of the signifier. That it should be necessary to transfer it presupposes apparently that it is not transferred by itself, that beginning is well and truly renewal. This even opens the door by way of an opposition to the fact that it is conceivable that the act constitutes, if one can express it in this way, without quotation marks, a true beginning. That there should be in a word, an act, which is creative and that this is the beginning.

Now, it is enough to evoke this horizon of any functioning of the act to grasp that it is obviously here indeed that there resides its true structure, which is quite apparent, obvious, and shows the fecundity, moreover, of the myth of creation.

It is a little surprising that it did not emerge in a way that is now current, admitted into common consciousness, that there is a certain relation between the break produced in the evolution of science at the beginning of the 17th century and the realisation, the advent of the true import of this myth of creation which thus took sixteen centuries to come to its true incidence, to what one can call throughout this epoch, Christian consciousness. I cannot come back too often to this remark which, I underline, is not mine but that of Alexandre Koyré: "At the beginning was the action" says Goethe. A little later, people think that this is a (77) contradiction of the Johannine formula: "In the beginning was the word". This is what makes it necessary to look a little more closely at it. If you are introduced to the question along the path that I have just tried to open up for you in a familiar way, it is quite clear that there is not the slightest opposition between these two formulae. In the beginning was the action because without an act there can quite simply be no question of a beginning. Action is indeed at the beginning because there could not be a beginning without action.

If we can grasp from some angle what is never, or what has never been up to now, put forward quite as it is necessary to do, the fact is that there is no action that is not presented first and foremost with a signifying point. This is what characterises the act, its signifying point, and its efficiency as act has nothing to do with its efficacy as a doing. Something that reaches this signifying point. One can begin to speak about act simply, without losing sight - it is rather curious that it should be a psychoanalyst who can for the first time give to this theme of act this accent, more exactly what constitutes its strange and therefore problematic and double feature - on the one hand, that it is in the analytic field, namely, in connection with the parapraxis (acte manqué), that it appeared precisely that an act which presents itself as missing out is an act, and uniquely from the fact that it is signifying. And then, that a psychoanalyst presides, precisely, (let us limit ourselves to this term for the moment) over an operation described as psychoanalysis which, in its principle, commands the suspension of every act.

You sense that when we are now going to engage ourselves on this path, of questioning in a more precise, more insistent way than we were able to do in the introductory sessions of the last trimester, what is involved in the psychoanalytic act, I want all the same, a little bit more than I was able in these first words, to highlight that at our horizon, we know what it can be a question of in every act. Of this act whose inaugural character I showed earlier, and whose type as one might say, is given to us through this vacillating meditation that is carried on around the politics of the act described as that of Crossing the Rubicon, for example. Behind it others are profiled. The Night of the 4th of August, the Jeu de paume, the Days of October ...

Certainly we feel, we sense, that the point at which questioning is first (78) suspended, is the strategic sense of one or other breakthrough. Thank God, it is not for nothing that I first evoked the Rubicon. It is a rather simplistic example completely marked by the dimensions of the sacred. Crossing the Rubicon did not have a decisive military meaning for Caesar. But on the contrary, to cross it was to re-enter his motherland. The land of the Republic, which to attack, was to violate. This was a breakthrough that had been made, in the sense of these revolutionary acts that I find myself - unintentionally of course – to have profiled behind it. Is the act the moment when Lenin gives one or other order, or the moment when there are loosed upon the world the signifiers that give to one or other precise success in the strategy its sense of a beginning that is already traced out? Something in which the consequence of a certain strategy comes to take its place, and to take in it its value as sign.

After all, it is worthwhile posing the question here, at a certain starting point. Because in the way that I am going to advance onto the terrain of act, there is also a certain breakthrough in evoking this dimension of revolutionary act and pinning on it something different to any warlike efficacy and which is called stimulating a new desire.

"Un coup de ton doigt sur le tambour décharge tous les sons et commence la nouvelle harmonie
Un pas de toi c'est la levée des nouveaux hommes et l'heure en marche.
Ta tête se détourne, le nouvel amour. Ta tête se retourne, le nouvel amour."

[Your finger on the drum looses all the sounds and begins the new harmony
A step from you is the rising of new men and time on the march.
Your face turns aside, the new love. Your face turns back, the new love.]

I think that none of you can fail to understand this text by Rimbaud that I am not finishing and which is called "A une raison".

It is the formula of the act.

Can the act of positing the unconscious be conceived of otherwise. And especially from the moment that I recall that the unconscious has a language structure, when having recalled it without recording the profound tremors among those who are interested by that, I take up and speak about its disruptive effects on the Cogito.

Here, I take up again, I underline, it happens that in a certain field I can formulate, "I think". That has all sorts of characteristics. What I dreamt last (79) night, what I missed this morning, or indeed what I touched on yesterday through some uncertain stumbling, without wanting to, by making what is called a witticism, sometimes without doing it deliberately.

In this "I think", am "I there"? It is quite certain that the revelation of the "I think" of the unconscious implies - everyone knows this whether one has done psychoanalysis or not, it is enough to open a book to see what is at stake - something that, at the level of what Descartes' Cogito makes us put our finger on about the implication of the "therefore I am", and this dimension that I would describe as that of defusing. This means that where I most certainly think, because I am aware of it, I was in it, but exactly as they say - you know I already used this example, but experience teaches me that it is not vain to repeat myself - it is in the same sense in which, according to the example extracted from remarks of the linguist Guillaume, in the same sense that this very specific use of the imperfect in French which gives all its ambiguity to the expression "un instant plus tard la bombe éclatait" [another second and the bomb was gone off]. Which means that precisely it did not go off.

Allow me to add, to stick this nuance onto the German Wo Es war, which does not include it, and by this to add to it the renewed use that can be given of "Wo Es war soll Ich werden". Where it was, where it is no longer anywhere but there, because I know that I thought it, "soll Ich werden". Ich: for a long time I have underlined that it can only be translated by, the subject. The subject must become. Only can he? That is the question!

"Where it was ..." Let us translate: "I must become", continue, "a psychoanalyst". Only from the fact - it is the question that I posed about this Ich translated by the subject - how is the psychoanalyst going to be able to find his place in this conjuncture. This conjuncture is the one that last year I expressly articulated under the title of the logic of phantasy, by a disjunctive

conjunction of a very special disjunction which is the one that, more than three years ago, I introduced by giving a new sense to the term of alienation. Namely, the one which proposes this curious choice whose consequences I articulated which is a forced choice and, necessarily, a losing one. "Your money or your life", "liberty or death". The last one that we are introducing here and that I am bringing in to show its relation with the psychoanalytic act is: "either I do not think or I am not". If you add to it, as I did earlier to the soll Ich werden, the term which is indeed what is in question in the psychoanalytic act: the term psychoanalyst, it is enough to make this little (80) machine run. Obviously, there is to be no hesitation. If on the one hand I am not a psychoanalyst, the result is that I do not think.

Naturally the interest of this is not simply humorous. It ought indeed to lead us somewhere and particularly to asking ourselves what is involved simply in our experience of last year, in what I will call this starting supposition which is constituted by the "either I do not think or I am not". How does it happen that it has proved to be not simply efficacious but necessary for what I called last year a logic of the phantasy, namely, a logic of such a kind that it preserves in itself the possibility of giving an account of what is involved in the phantasy and of its relation to the unconscious.

Because it is there as unconscious, again I must not think of what is involved in my unconscious as thinking.. Where I think it, I am no longer at home. I am no longer there. "I am no longer there (je n'y suis plus)" in terms of language in the same way that I make the person who answers the door say: "Sir is not at home". It is an "I am not there" in so far as it is said. This indeed is what gives it its importance. This means in particular, this means that as psychoanalyst I cannot pronounce it. You can see the effect it would have on my clientele! This is also what corners me in the position of "I do not think". At least if what I am putting forward here as logic is able to be followed along its true thread. "I do not think" could be - having drawn the two circles below and their intersection (cf schema), I marked with all the quotation marks of prudence, and to tell you that you must not get too alarmed - this "false-being (faux-être)". It is the being of all of us. One is never so solid in one's being as when one does not think. Everyone knows that.

Only all the same, I would like to mark clearly the distinction from what I am putting forward today.

There are two distinct falsehoods. Everyone knows that when I came into psychoanalysis with a little broom which was called the mirror stage, I began by mapping out, because after all it was in Freud, it is said, mapped out, seried. I took the mirror stage to make a portmanteau. It is even much more emphasised immediately than I was ever able to do it in the course of statements that spared peoples sensitivities, that there is no love which does not derive from this narcissistic dimension. That if one knows how to read

Freud, what is opposed to narcissism, what is called object libido, what (81) concerns on the bottom left hand corner the o-object, for that is object libido. It has nothing to do with love since love is narcissism and the two are opposed: narcissistic libido and object libido.

So then when I speak about "false-being" it is not a matter of what comes to plant itself there upon it, in a way, like mussels on the hull of a ship, if you wish. It is not a matter of an individual (être) puffed up with the imaginary. It is a matter of something underneath which gives it its place.

It is a matter of the "I do not think" in its structuring necessity qua inscribed at this starting place without which we would not have been able, last year, to articulate the least thing about what is involved in the logic of the phantasy.

(82) Naturally, it is a convenient place, this "I do not think". It is not just the puffed-up individual that I spoke about just now, who finds his place there. Everything comes into it, medical prejudice as a whole, psychological or psychologising prejudice no less. On the whole, note the fact that in any case the psychoanalyst is particularly subject to this "I do not think" because he is inhabited by everything that I have just stated, pinpointed, as prejudices by qualifying them by their origin. He has others besides, for example about doctors. The advantage as I might say, when medical prejudice preoccupies him, and God knows that it preoccupies him a good deal, for example, to take only it. And precisely indeed the doctors do not think about it, even though it still worries them - but not the psychoanalyst. He takes it like that, precisely in the measure that he has this dimension that it is only a prejudice, but since it is a matter of not thinking he is all the more at ease with it.

Have you ever, unless exceptionally, seen a psychoanalyst who questioned himself about what Pasteur meant in the medical adventure? Pasteur is not a fashionable subject, but this might precisely have caught the attention of a psychoanalyst. It has never been seen. We will see if it changes. In any case, it would be necessary here to propose to oneself this little exercise: what is this initial point? It is worthwhile all the same posing oneself the question, if as we have glimpsed at the beginning - it is the axis of our progress today - the act in itself is always related to a beginning. I quite deliberately did not pose the question of this logical beginning last year, because, in truth, like more than one point of this logic of the phantasy, we would have had to leave it in suspense. Let us pin it down as arché, since this is how we have entered today, by the beginning. It is an arché, an initium, a beginning but in what sense?

Is it in the sense of the zero on a little measuring apparatus? An individual, for example, quite simply. It is not a bad start to ask oneself this question, because already it seems it can even be seen right away that to pose the question in this way is to rule out that it is a beginning in the sense of the unmarked.

We even touch with our finger that the only fact that we have to question this arché-point about, namely, is whether it is zero. The fact is that in any case it is already marked, and that, after all, this works out rather well all the same for from the effect of the mark, it appears very satisfying to see there flowing the "either I do not think" or "I am not". "Either I am not this mark", or "I am nothing but this mark", namely, that "I do not think". For (83) the psychoanalyst, for example, this applies very well.

He has the label, or indeed he is not it.

Only one must not be deceived by it. As I have just marked it, at the level of the mark, we see only the necessary result precisely of alienation. Namely, that there is no choice between the mark and the individual, so that if it must be marked somewhere, it is precisely on the top left (cf schema of the "I do not think"). The alienating effect has already taken place and we are not surprised to find there, in its original form, the effect of the mark, which is sufficiently indicated in this deduction of narcissism that I made in a schema that I know that at least some of you know, the one that relates in their dependence the ideal ego and the ego ideal.

So then knowing the nature of the logical starting point remains in suspense in so far as it still depends on the conjunction before the disjunction, the "I do not think" and the "I am not". Assuredly, last year it was towards this, since it was our starting point, and as I might say the initial act of our logical deduction, we would not be able to come back to it if we did not have what constitutes the opening, the gap that it is always necessary to find in every presentation of the analytic field, which made us, after having constructed the moment of the logic of phantasy, spend the last trimester around the sexual act, precisely defined by the fact that it constitutes an aporia.

Let us take up again then, starting from the psychoanalytic act, this questioning about what is the initium of the logic of the phantasy that I had to begin to recall here. That is why I inscribed on the board today this aspect of it that I articulated last year under the terms of operation alienation, operation truth, operation transference, to make of them the three terms of what one can call a Klein group, on condition of course of grasping that in naming them in this way, we are not seeing the return, the operation, of what constitutes for each one the return operation. That here as they are inscribed with these vectorial indications, there is only, as I might say, half a Klein group.

Let us take up the act at the sensitive point that we see it in the analytic institution and let us start from the beginning in so far as this today means that the act establishes the beginning.

(84) Is it an act to begin a psychoanalysis, yes or no? Yes, assuredly. Only who performs this act? We pointed out earlier what it implies for the one who engages himself in psychoanalysis, what it implies precisely in terms of relinquishing the act. It becomes very difficult, in this sense, to attribute the structure of the act to the one who engages in a psychoanalysis. A psychoanalysis is a task, and some people even say that it is a trade. I am not the one who said it, but people all the same who know about it. These people who have to follow the rule or not, however you define them, must be taught their trade. In any case, in that quarter people do not talk about their trade as psychoanalysands. They are going to say it now because the word has become popular. Nevertheless, that is what it means.

So then, it is clear that if there is an act, it is probably necessary to look for it elsewhere. We do not after all have to force ourselves very much to ask ourselves to say that if it is not on the side of the psychoanalysand, it is on the side of the psychoanalyst. There is no doubt about it. Only this becomes a difficulty. Because after what we have just said, as regards the act of positing the unconscious, is it necessary for the psychoanalyst to posit it again each time? Is it really possible, especially if we think that after what we have just said, to reposit it each time would be to give us each time a new opportunity for not thinking?

There must be something else, a relation between the task and the act which has perhaps not yet been grasped and which perhaps cannot be. It is necessary perhaps to make a detour. One sees right away where we can find this detour. At another beginning, at this moment of beginning when one becomes a psychoanalyst.

We must take into account the fact which is in the data that if one is to believe what is said, it is necessary to trust oneself in this domain.

Beginning to be a psychoanalyst, as everyone knows, begins at the end of a psychoanalysis. We have only to take that as it is given to us if we want to grasp something. We must start from that, from this point which is accepted by everyone in psychoanalysis.

So then, let us start from things as they present themselves. You have come to the end once. It is from this that you must deduce the relation that this has with the beginning on every occasion. You have reached the end of your analysis once, and it is this act so difficult to grasp at the beginning (85) of each psychoanalysis that we guarantee. It must have a relation with the end of what once occurred.

Now here it is already necessary that what I put forward last year should be of some use. Namely, the way in which there is formulated in this logic the end of psychoanalysis.

The end of psychoanalysis supposes a certain realisation of the truth operation. Namely, that if in effect this ought to constitute this sort of journey, which, from the subject installed in his false-being makes him realise something about a thinking which includes the "I am not". This does not fail to rediscover as is appropriate, in a crossed and inverted form, its truer place, its place in the form of "where it was" at the level of the "I am not". This is found in this o-object whose sense and practice we have done a lot, it seems to me, to give you, and on the other hand, this lack which subsists at the level of the natural subject, of the subject of knowledge, of the false-being of the subject, this lack, which from all time, has been defined as the essence of man and which is called desire, but which at the end of an analysis is expressed by this thing, not only formulated but incarnated, which is called castration.

This is what we usually label with the letter minus phi (-φ). The inversion of this relation of left to right which makes the "I do not think" of the alienated subject correspond to the "where it was" of the unconscious in the discovery of the "where it was" of desire in the subject in the "I am not" of unconscious thinking, this reversing itself is properly what supports the identification of the o as cause of desire, and of the minus phi (-φ) as the place from which there is inscribed the gap proper to the sexual act.

It is precisely here that we ought to suspend things for a moment. You see it, you put your finger on it, there are two "wo Es war", two "where it was", corresponding moreover to the distance which in the theory splits the unconscious from the Id. There is the "where it was" inscribed here at the level of the subject, and I already said it, I am repeating it so what you will not let it pass, where it remains attached to this subject as lack. There is the other "where it was", which at an opposite place is the one is on the bottom right (cf schema), of the locus of the unconscious which remains attached to the "I am not" of the unconscious as object, object of loss.

The initial lost object of the whole analytic genesis, the one that Freud hammered at every phase of the birth of the unconscious, is there, this lost object, cause of desire. We are going to see it as being at the source of the act.

(86) But this is only an announcement. I am not justifying it immediately. There is still a journey to take before being sure of it, we have to pause there for a while. In general, it is only worthwhile pausing for a while to grasp the time that one has passed on it without knowing it, we will say moreover, to correct ourselves. Passed ... it would be better to say "passing (passant)" and if you will allow me to play with the words "not without knowing it (pas sans le savoir)".

Namely, with knowledge, one passed it. But precisely, it is because I have presented to you the result of my schemas from last year, that you are supposed to know, though there is not some exaggeration in this. Yes, it is with this knowledge that I passed this time, too quickly, namely, in haste. As you know haste is precisely what allows the truth to escape. This moreover allows us to live. The truth is that the lack (on the top left), is the loss, (of the bottom right). But the loss for its part, is the cause of something else. We will call it the cause of itself on condition, of course, that you are not deceived. God is the cause of himself, Spinoza tells us. Did he realise how right he was? Why not, after all. He was someone very able. It is quite certain that the fact of conferring on God the fact of being the cause of himself, dissipated the whole ambiguity of the Cogito, which might well have a similar pretension, at least in the minds of some people. If there is anything that analytic experience reminds us of, it is that if this expression, "cause of itself", means something, it is precisely to indicate to us that the self, or what is called such, in other words, the subject to which everyone has to come, since even in one or other Anglo-Saxon field where it can be said that people understand nothing about any of these questions, the word self had to emerge. It can be adapted to nothing in analytic theory, nothing corresponds to it.

The subject depends on this cause which makes it divided and is called the o-object. Here is what marks what it is important to underline: that the subject is not its own cause, that it is the consequence of loss and that it has to put itself into the consequence of the loss, the one that the o-object constitutes, to know what he is lacking.

That is why I am saying that we would be going too quickly to state as I have done, these two points of the oblique line, from left to right (cf schema) and from top to bottom, of these two separated terms of the first division. The thing is supposedly known in the statement that the "where it was" is lack starting from the subject. It is only truly such if the subject makes of (87) himself a loss. Now this is what he cannot think except by making himself be. "I think, he says, therefore I am". He rejects himself invincibly into the being of this false act, which is called the Cogito. The act of the Cogito is error about being, as we see in the definitive alienation resulting from it of the body, which is rejected into extension, the rejection of the body outside of thinking is the great Verwerfung of Descartes. It is stamped with its effect that it reappears in the real, namely, in the impossible. It is impossible for a machine to be a body. That is why knowledge continues to prove it by making it into spare parts. We are in this adventure, I do not need I think to make allusions to it. But let us leave our Descartes here for today to return to what followed and to the punctuation that we must give today to our progress.

We know that the subject of the analytic act can know nothing about what is learnt in the analytic experience, unless there operates in it what is called transference. The transference that I restored in a complete fashion, by relating it to the subject supposed to know.

The term of analysis consists in the fall of the subject supposed to know and his reduction to the arrival of this o-object, as cause of the division of the subject which comes in its place. The one who, phantastically, with the psychoanalysand, plays the game with respect to the subject who is supposed to know, namely, the analyst, it is he the analyst who comes to the term of analysis by being able to tolerate being nothing more than this remainder. This remainder of the thing known, which is called the o-object, it is around this that our question should be brought to bear.

The analysand who has come to the end of the analysis in the act, if there is one, which carries him to become a psychoanalyst, must we not see that this passage only takes place in the act which puts back in its place the subject supposed to know.

We now see this place where it is because it can be occupied. But it is only occupied in so far as this subject supposed to know, is reduced to this term that the one who up to then guarantees it there by his act, namely, the psychoanalyst, the psychoanalyst for his part has become this residue, this o-object.

He who at the end of a training analysis takes up, as I might say, the challenge of this act, we cannot omit that it is knowing what his analyst has become in the accomplishment of this act, namely, this residue, this rubbish, this rejected thing. By restoring the subject supposed to know, by himself picking up the torch of the analyst, he cannot but install, even if he does not (88) touch it, cannot but install the o at the level of the subject supposed to know. This subject supposed to know, that he can only take up again as condition of every psychoanalytic act, he knows, at this moment that I called in the pass, he knows that here is the désêtre that through him, the psychoanalysand, has struck the being of the analyst. I am saying, without touching it, that this is how he is engaged. Because he, the subject in the pass at the moment of the analytic act, knows nothing about this désêtre established at the point of the subject supposed to know. Precisely because he has become the truth of this knowledge, and that, if I may say a truth that is reached "not without knowing it", as I said earlier, well, it is incurable: one is this truth.

The analytic act functions at the start, as I might say, with a falsified subject supposed to know. For the subject supposed to know now proves what was quite simple to see immediately: that it is what is at the arché of analytic logic. If the one who becomes analyst could be cured of the truth that he has become, he would be able to mark what has happened in terms of a change at the level of the subject supposed to know. This is what in our graph we have marked by the signifier of S (Ø).

It would be necessary to grasp that the subject supposed to know is reduced at the end of the analysis to the same "not being there" which is characteristic of the unconscious itself, and that this discovery forms part of the same truth-operation.

I repeat. The putting in question of the subject supposed to know, the subversion of what, I would say, the whole functioning of knowledge implies and that I already questioned before you many times in the form of: "so then this knowledge, whether it is that of the transfinite number of Cantor or of the desire of the analyst, where was it before it was known?

From that alone perhaps, can one proceed to a revival of the individual (l'être) whose condition it is to grasp that if its origin and its re-challenging, that which could take place from the signifier of the other that has finally vanished towards what replaces it, since moreover it is from its field, from the field of the Other that this signifier has been torn, namely, the o-object, this would also be to grasp that the individual as it can emerge from any act whatsoever, is an individual without essence as all the o-objects are without essence. This is what characterises them.

Objects without essence which are, or not, to be re-evoked in the act starting (89) from this sort of subject which, as we will see, is the subject of the act, of every act, I would say, in so far as like the subject supposed to know at the end of the analytic experience, it is a subject which is not in the act.

(91) In speaking about the "psychoanalytic act", I have, as I might say, two ambitions: one long term and the other short, but necessarily the short term one is the better. The long term one, which cannot be set aside, is to illuminate what is involved in the act. The short term is to know in what the act of the psychoanalyst consists. Already in some writings in the past, I spoke about the psychoanalyst. I said that I was only starting from the fact that there is something of the psychoanalyst (du psychanalyste). The question of whether there is "the" psychoanalyst is not to be put completely in suspense either, but that of knowing how there can be a psychoanalyst is a question that is posed more or less in the same terms as what is called in logic the question of existence.

The psychoanalytic act, if it is an act and it is indeed from this that we began last year, is something that puts to us the question of articulating it, of saying it, which is legitimate. And even going further, implies the consequences of the act in so far as the act itself is in its proper dimension a statement (un dire). The act says something. This is what we started from.

This dimension has always been glimpsed. It is present in the facts, in experience. It is enough to evoke for even an instant some pregnant formulae, formulae that have worked, like that of "to act according to one's conscience", to grasp what is at stake. To act in accordance with one's conscience is indeed a kind of middle point around which the history of the act could be said to have turned or that one can take as a point of departure to centre it. To act in accordance with one's conscience. Why and before whom?

(92) The dimension of the Other, in so far as the act bears witness to something, cannot be eliminated either. Does this mean that this is the true turning point, the centre of gravity? Could we even sustain it for an instant where we are coming from, namely, where conscience as such is put in question, put in question in the measure that it can lead to what? Assuredly not to knowledge or to the truth either. It is from here that we start again by taking the measure of what has not yet been defined, of what has not yet been really circumscribed, of what is only introduced here, not even presupposed, the psychoanalytic act, in order to question again this point of equilibrium around which the question is posed of what the act is.

On the horizon, of course, as we know, a distant murmur, a murmur which comes from afar, which comes from the times described as classical, or again our Antiquity, where assuredly we know that all that is said on the subject of the exemplary act, of the meritorious act, of Plutarchism, if you wish. We surely sense already that there is a little too much self-esteem getting into the game, and nevertheless are we that far from it? I think that today it is around a discourse on the subject that we will take up the act again. And that our advantage comes from nothing other than something which has made us restrict the supporting point of this subject by imposing on ourselves the most severe discipline, by only wanting to take as certain this dimension by which it is the grammatical subject.

Let us clearly understand here that it is not new, and that last year in our presentation of the Logic of Phantasy, we marked at its place, the place of "I do not think", this form of the subject which appeared as a curtailing of the field reserved to it. This dimension properly of grammar which meant that the phantasy was able to be dominated literally by a sentence which is only sustained, which is only conceived of in the grammatical dimension: Ein Kind wird geschlagen, a child is being beaten. We know all about it. This is the surest point we have, around which, in the name of what we posit for disciplinary purposes, that there is no meta-language, that logic itself must be extracted from this given which language is. It is around this logic, on the contrary, that we made revolve this triple operation, to which by a sort of attempt at a trial, a divination, a risk, we gave the form of the Klein group. (93) An operation that we began by highlighting, on the path along which we tackled it, by the terms of alienation, truth, and transference.

Undoubtedly, this is only a pinpointing. And having gone over them in a certain direction we are - to find our way in them, to support what they can represent for us - forced to give them another name, and of course, on condition that we see that it is the same journey that is at stake.

So then it is starting from the subversion of the subject that we have already for some ten years sufficiently articulated, so that people can conceive of the sense that this term takes on, when we say that it is from the subversion of the subject that we have to take up again the function of the act. In order for us to see that it is between this grammatical subject, the one that is there, inscribed in the very notion of act, in the way in which it is made present for us, the I of action, and this subject articulated in these terms that are sliding, always ready to flee us by a displacement, by a jump, to one of the vertices of this tetrahedron, in recalling to you the functions of these terms, namely:
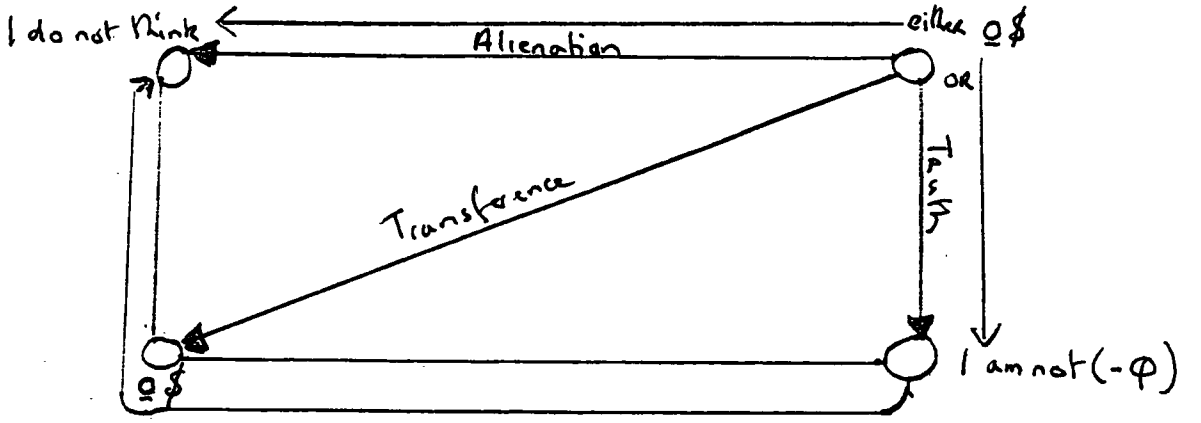
the position of the either-or from which there starts the originating alienation, the one which culminates at the "I do not think", for it to be even chosen - and what does this choice mean? - the "I am not" articulates its other term. These vectors, or more exactly these directions in which the fundamental operations are taken being those that I recalled earlier under the terms of alienation, truth, and transference.



What does that mean? Where does that lead us?

We posit the psychoanalytic act as consisting in the fact of supporting the transference. We are not saying: who supports, who performs the act, the (94) psychoanalyst therefore implicitly. This transference which would be a pure and simple obscenity, I would say, with some babbling added on, if we did not restore to it its true core, in the function of the subject supposed to know. Here, we have done this for some time by showing that everything that is articulated, about its diversity, as a transference effect, can only be organised by being referred to this truly fundamental function that is always present in everything that is involved in any progress of knowledge. This takes on its value here precisely from the fact that the existence of the unconscious puts it in question - a question never posed because we are still there, as one might say, implicitly - the answer is even unnoticed. From the moment that there is knowledge, there is a subject, and there must be some shift, some split, some shaking, some moment of I in this knowledge, for one to notice all of a sudden, for there to be thus renewed this knowledge that he knew before.

This is scarcely noticed when it is happening, but it is the field of psychoanalysis that makes it inevitable. What is involved in the subject supposed to know, since we have to deal with this sort of unthinkable thing which in the unconscious situates for us a knowledge without a subject? Naturally, this is something that one may not notice, by continuing to think that this subject is implied in this knowledge, quite simply by allowing there to escape everything involved in the efficacy of repression, and that it cannot be conceived of otherwise than in the fact that the signifier present in the unconscious, and liable to return, is precisely repressed in that it does not imply a subject, that it is no longer what represents a subject for another signifier, which is something that is articulated to another signifier without for all that representing this subject. There is no other definition possible of what is really involved in the function of the unconscious, in so far as the Freudian

unconscious is not simply the implicit, or the obscured, or the archaic, or the primal. The unconscious is always in a completely different register, in the movement established as doing by this act, of supporting, or accepting to support the transference.

The question is what becomes of the subject supposed to know? I am going to tell you that in principle, the psychoanalyst knows what becomes of it. Assuredly, it falls. What is implied theoretically in this suspension of the subject supposed to know, this line of suppression, this bar on the S which symbolises it in the becoming of analysis, manifests itself in the fact that something is produced at a place, that is certainly not indifferent to the (95) psychoanalyst, since it is at his own place that this thing arises. This thing is called the little o-object.

The little o-object is the realisation of this sort of désêtre that strikes the subject supposed to know. That it is the analyst, and as such, who comes to this place is not in doubt. It is marked in all the inferences in which he felt himself implicated to the point of no longer being able to do anything but bend the thinking of his practice in the sense of the dialectic of frustration, as you know. This is linked to the fact that he presents himself as the substance that is operated on and manipulated in the analytic deed. But this is precisely to fail to recognise the distinction there is between this deed and the act which allows it, the act which establishes it, the one that I started from earlier by defining it as this acceptation, this support given to the subject supposed to know, to the fact that the psychoanalyst knows that he is nevertheless doomed to désêtre and which thus constitutes, as I might say, an act that is out of synch since he is not the subject supposed to know, since he cannot be it. And if there is someone who knows it, it is above all the psychoanalyst.

Must I now, or a little later, yes, but why not now, why not right away, provided I can come back on something that I want to make you familiar with, by reminding you of its co-ordinates in other registers, in other statements. Must I now remind you that the analytic task, in so far as it is outlined from this point of the already alienated subject, in a certain sense naïve in its alienation, the one that the psychoanalyst knows to be defined by the "I do not think", that what he sets him to as a task, is an "I think" which takes on precisely its whole emphasis, from the fact that he knows the "I do not think", inherent to the status of the subject?

He sets him to the task of a thinking that is presented in a way in its very statement, in the rule that he gives him of it, as admitting the fundamental truth of the "I do not think", that he should associate and do so freely. That he does not seek to know whether or not he is entirely there as subject, whether he affirms himself there. The task to which the psychoanalytic act gives its status is a task which already implies this destitution of the subject, and where does that lead us?

You must remember, you must not spend your time forgetting what is articulated about it, what is articulated about it in Freud, explicitly about the result. It has a name, and Freud did not soften it for us, which is something that is all the more to be highlighted because as subjective experience this was (96) never done before psychoanalysis. It is called castration, which is to be taken in its dimension of subjective experience in as much as nowhere except along this path can the subject be realised. I mean the subject of course.

This subject is only realised exactly qua lack, which means that the subjective experience culminates in something that we symbolise by (-φ). But if every use of the letter is justified by demonstrating that it is enough to have recourse to its manipulation in order not to be mistaken, on condition that one knows how to use it, it nevertheless remains that we have a right to try to be able to put into it an "it exists" - which I evoked earlier in connection with the psychoanalyst at the start of today's discourse. And that this "it exists" in question, this "it exists" of a lack, must be incarnated by us in what effectively gives it its name: castration. Namely, that the subject realises that he does not have, that he does not have the organ of what I would call unique, unary, unifying enjoyment (jouissance). It is a matter, properly, of what makes enjoyment one in the conjunction of subjects of opposite sex. Namely, what I insisted on last year, in picking out the fact that there is no possible subjective realisation of the subject as element, as sexed partner in what is imagined as unification in the sexual act.

This incommensurability - that I tried to circumscribe before you, last year, by using the golden number, in so far as it is the symbol that allows the greatest play, this is something on which I cannot insist, because it belongs to the mathematical register - this incommensurability, this relation of small o, since it is the small o that I took up again not unintentionally to symbolise it in the (97) golden number, of small o to 1. This is where there operates what appears as subjective realisation at the end of the psychoanalytic task. Namely, this lack is not the organ, this naturally is not without a background

if we remember that the organ and the function are two different things. So different that one can say that there comes back from time to time the problem of knowing what function must be given to each organ, and this is where the true problem of the adaptation of the living being lies. The more organs he has, the more entangled he is.

But let us pause ... It is a matter then of a limited experience, of a logical experience and after all, why not? Because for a moment we have jumped onto a different plane, onto a plane of the relation of the living being to itself, that we only tackle by the schema of this subjective adventure. We must clearly recall here that from the point of view of the living being all of this, after all, can be considered as a artefact. And that logic is the locus of truth changes nothing in it, because the question that comes at the end is precisely the one to which we will be able to give its whole emphasis in time. What is the truth?

It is up to us to see that from these two lines, the ones that I designated as the task, the path taken by the psychoanalysand in as much as he speaks, a naïve subject who is moreover the subject alienated from this realisation of lack, in as much as, as I pointed out to you the last time, this lack is not what we know to be at the place of the "I am not". This lack was there from the start, and that from all time we have known that this lack is the very essence of this subject that is called man. Sometimes that it is desire, as has already been said, which is the essence of man. Quite simply this lack has made progress in the articulation of its function as organum, an essentially logical progress in this realisation as such of the phallic lack. But it involves that the loss in so far as it was there at first, at the same point, before its journey was followed through, and simply for us who know - the loss of the object which is at the origin of the status of the unconscious, this had always been explicitly formulated by Freud - is realised elsewhere. It is so precisely, this is what I started from, at the level of the désêtre of the subject supposed to know.

It is in as far as the one who gives its support to transference is there under the black line, that he knows where he is starting from. Not that he is there, he knows only too well that he is not, that he is not the subject supposed to (98) know, but that he is rejoined by the désêtre that the subject supposed to know undergoes. That in the end it is he, the analyst, who embodies what the subject becomes in the form of the little o-object. So then, as is to be expected, it is in conformity with every notion of structure that the function of alienation which was at the start, and which meant that we started from the top left hand vertex of an alienated subject, finds itself at the end equal to itself, as I might say. In this sense that the subject has been realised, in his castration, along the path of a logical operation. An alienated path, remits to the Other, gets rid - and this is the function of the analyst - of this lost object, from which, in Genesis, we can conceive that the whole structure originates. The distinction of alienation, of small o in so far as it comes here and is separated from (-φ), which at the end of analysis is ideally the realisation of the subject. This is the process that is at stake.

There is a second phase in this statement that I am producing. I open a parenthesis here in order to put what I came to a stop before earlier, in order to give what I should have given to it, an introduction. I will now give a reminder of it, which is that it is not by chance, a scholarly game, a question of taking a familiar point that your brains were tickled by, at the end of secondary school teaching, that I refer to Descartes' cogito. The fact is that it includes in itself this element that is particularly favourable for the Freudian detour to be relocated in it. Not at all, of course, in order to demonstrate here some historical consistency or other, as if all of this could be put end to end, from century to century, as a kind of progress, when it is only too obvious that if there is anything that this evokes, it is much more rather the idea of a maze. What matter, let us leave Descartes. In looking closely at the cogito, note carefully that the subject who is supposed there as being, may well be that of thinking, but of what thinking, in short? Of that thinking which has just rejected all knowledge. It is not a question of what is done after Descartes by those who meditate on the immediacy from "I am" to "I think", an obviousness that, as they wish, they make consistent or fleeting. What is at stake is the Cartesian act itself, in so far as it is an act. What is reported and said to us about it, it is precisely by saying it that it is an act. It is from this point, where there is completed a suspension of all possible knowledge. That this is what assures the "I am": is it to be "thought" by the cogito or is it from the rejection of knowledge?

The question is well worth asking if one thinks of what is called in the manuals of philosophy the successors, the posterity of a philosophical thinking, as if it were simply a question of taking it up again, a piece of treacle to make another mixture out of it. While what is at stake every time is a renewal, an act which is not necessarily the same. And that if we take Hegel, of course, there again, as everywhere else, we find the putting in suspense of the subject supposed to know, except for the fact that it is not for nothing, that this subject is designed to give us, at the end of the adventure, absolute knowledge.

To see what that means, one must look more closely at it, and why not look at it at the start. If the Phenomenology of the spirit is explicitly set up by being generated from the function of act, is it not visible in the mythology of the fight to the death for pure prestige, that this knowledge of the origin, by having to trace out its path in order to become this unthinkable thing, this absolute knowledge, and one can even ask oneself - and one is entitled to ask oneself because Hegel formulates it - what kind of subject can depend upon it, for even a single instant. That this starting knowledge, that is presented to us as such, is the knowledge of DEATH, namely, another extreme, radical form of putting in suspense as the very foundation of this subject of knowledge.

Is it by questioning this again from the point of view of consequences, something that is easy for us to see that, what psychoanalytic experience proposes as the little o-object - along the path of my discourse in so far as it only summarises, highlights, gives its sign and its sense to what is articulated everywhere in this experience - this is what generates in disorder and confusion this little o-object. Do we not see that it comes in the same place (100) where there is in Descartes, this rejection of knowledge, in Hegel, this knowledge as knowledge of death. And we assuredly know that this is its function. That this knowledge of death, articulated precisely in this fight to the death of pure prestige, in so far as it grounds the status of the master, it is from it that there comes this Aufhebung of enjoyment. This explains it. And it is as renouncing enjoyment in a decisive act, in order to make himself the subject of death that the master is established. And it is moreover there, for us, I underlined it at one time, that there is put forward the objection that we can make to this through a curious paradox, a paradox unexplained in Hegel. It is to the master that enjoyment is supposed to return from this Aufhebung. Many times we have asked why? Why, if it is because he has not renounced enjoyment that the slave becomes a slave? Why does he not keep it? Why should it come back to the master, whose status is precisely to have renounced it, unless in a form that we can, perhaps, require a little more of than the conjuring trick, the Hegelian maestria to account for it? It is no little test if we can feel in the Freudian dialectic a manipulation that is more rigorous, more exact, and more in conformity with experience as regards what is involved in what becomes of enjoyment after the first alienation.

I already sufficiently indicated it in connection with masochism for people to know here what I mean and that I am only indicating a path to be taken up again. We certainly cannot delay on it today, but it was necessary to indicate its beginnings at the right place.

To continue on our path in function of what is involved in the psychoanalytic act, we have done nothing up to now except to demonstrate what it generates

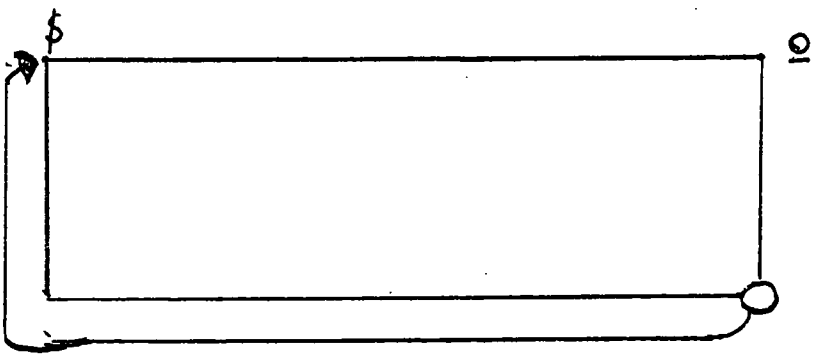
by being carried out. To take a further step, let us now come to the only point where the act can be questioned: at its point of origin.

What are we told? I evoked it again the last time. That it is at the end of an analysis that is supposed to be complete that the psychoanalysand may become a psychoanalyst. It is not at all a matter here of justifying the possibility of this connection. It is a matter of posing it as articulated and of putting it to the test of our little tetrahedric schema.

It is the subject who has accomplished the task at the end of which he has realised himself as subject in castration, qua something lacking in the enjoyment of sexual union. This is what we have to see by a rotation, or a tipping over, to a certain number of degrees, as this figure is drawn, by 180° in (101) order to see passing, coming back what has been realised here to the starting position. Except for the fact that the subject who comes here (on the top left), knows what is involved in the subjective experience, and that this experience also implies that on the left, there remains what has become of the one whose act is responsible for the path taken. In other words, that for the analyst as we now see him emerging at the level of his act, there is already a knowledge of the désêtre of the subject supposed to know, in so far as it is the necessary starting position for this whole logic.



It is precisely because of this that there is question of what is involved for him in this act, that we have defined earlier as an act that is out of synch. What is the measure of the illumination of his act? Because in so far as he has taken the path that permits this act, he is himself already the truth of this act.

This is the question that I posed the last time, in saying that a truth conquered "not without knowing it" is a truth that I described as "incurable", if I can express myself thus. For if we follow what results from this tipping over of the whole figure which is the only one in which there can be explained the (102) passage of the conquest, the fruit of the task, to the position of the one who breaks through the act by which this task can be repeated. It is here that there comes the $ which was there at the start in the either-or of the "either I do not think" or "I am not". And effectively, in so far as there is an act mixed up with the task that sustains it, what is at stake is properly a signifying intervention. The way the psychoanalyst acts, however little it may be, but

where he properly acts in the course of the task, is to be capable of this signifying interference which properly speaking is not open to any generalisation that might be called knowledge.

What analytic interpretation generates is this something, which cannot be evoked from the universal except in the form that I would ask you to notice is so contrary to everything that has been qualified as such up to now. It is, as one might say, this sort of universal key, the key that opens all the boxes. How the devil can it be conceived of? What does it mean to offer oneself as the one who has at his disposal what initially can only be defined as something or other particular?

Such is the question that I am also leaving only opened up here about what is involved in the status of the one who at the point of this subject, $, can ensure that there exists something in the task, and not in the foundational act, which corresponds to the subject supposed to know. Here is quite precisely what opens up the question. What is necessary for it to be possible that there should be an analyst? I repeat, on the top left of the schema, what we started from, is that in order for the whole schematisation to be possible, for the logic of psychoanalysis to exist, there had to be something of the psychoanalyst (du psychoanalyst).

When he puts himself there, after having himself taken the psychoanalytic path, he already knows where he will be lead to then as psychoanalyst by the path to be re-travelled: the désêtre of the subject supposed to know by being nothing but the support of this object called the little o-object. What is outlined for us by this psychoanalytic act, one of whose co-ordinates it must be carefully recalled is precisely to exclude from the psychoanalytic experience any act, any injunction to act? It is recommended to what is called the patient, the psychoanalysand, to name him, as far as possible he is recommended to wait before acting. If something characterises the position of the psychoanalyst, it is very precisely that he only acts in the field of signifying intervention that I delimited just now.

But is this not also an opportunity for us to grasp that the status of every act (103) emerges from it completely renewed? For the place of the act, whatever it is, and it is up to us to notice from its trace, what we mean when we speak about the status of the act, without even being able to allow us to add to it, of the human act. The fact is that, if there is somewhere that the psychoanalyst at once does not know himself, and, it is also the point where he exists, it is in

so far as he is, assuredly, a divided subject, even in his act. And that the end where he is awaited, namely, this little o-object, in so far as it is not his own, but what the psychoanalysand requires of him as Other, so that with him, he is rejected from it. Is this not an image to open up for us what is involved in the destiny of every act. And this under diverse figures, from the hero where Antiquity from all time has tried to place, in all its breadth, in all its drama, what is involved in the act. Not at all certainly that at this same time knowledge was not oriented towards other traces, for it is also, and it is not negligible to recall it, a time when people sought the reason for what is involved in a wise act - and in truth there is nothing there to be disdained - in a good. "The fruit of the act", here is what seems to give its first measure to ethics. I took it up at one time in commenting on Aristotle's.

The Ethics to Nicomachus starts from this: that there is something good at the level of pleasure and that following a correct channel in this register of pleasure will lead us to the conception of the sovereign good.

It is clear that this was, in its way, a sort of act that has its place in the journeying of any act described as philosophical. The way that we may judge it is of no importance here. It was a time, as we know, when there was set up a completely different questioning, the tragic questioning about what is involved in the act, and this was what was remitted to an obscure divinity. If there is a dimension, a force, which was not supposed to know, it is indeed that of the ancient ananke, in so far as it was incarnated by these furious (104) madmen that the gods were.

Measure the distance travelled from this perspective on the act to that of Kant. If there is something which in another way renders necessary our statement about the act as a saying (un dire), it is indeed in the measure that Kant gives of it, from the fact that it ought to be regulated by a maxim that could have a universal range. Is this not also what I took my time to caricature, by connecting it to a rule as it is stated in the phantasmagoria of Sade?

Is it not true, on the other hand, that between these two extremes, I am speaking about Aristotle and Kant, the reference to the Other taken as such is the one, also very farcical, which was given at least by a classical form of religious direction? The measure of the act in the eyes of God is supposed to be given by what are called good intentions. Is it possible to initiate a more established path of dupery than that of putting this measure at the principle of the value of the act.

Can the good intention in an act in any way remove for a single instant for us the question of what is its fruit? It is certain that Freud is not the first to allow us to emerge from these closed rings. That to put in suspense what is involved in the value of a good intention, we have a quite effective, explicit and useable critique in what Hegel articulates for us about the law of the heart or the delusions of presumption. That it is not enough to rise up against the disorder of the world, for this very protestation not to be itself its most permanent support. What succeeded the act of the cogito, has given us many models, precisely, of this thinking When the order, arising from the law of the heart, is destroyed by the critique of the Phenomenology of the spirit, what do we see, if not the return, that I cannot do otherwise than qualify as offensive, of the ruse of reason.

It is here that we must notice that this meditation opened out very specially on to something called the political act. And that assuredly it is not vain that what was generated not simply in terms of political meditations but of political acts, in which I in no way distinguish the speculation of Marx from the way in which is has been put into effect at one or other detour of the revolution, is it not possible for us to situate a whole line of descent of reflections on the political act, in so far as assuredly they are acts, in the sense that these acts were a saying (un dire) and precisely to say in the name of such a one who brought to them a certain number of decisive changes, is it not possible to question them again in the same register as the one at which there will culminate today what is outlined in terms of the psychoanalytic act? There where at the same time it is and it is not, and which could be expressed as follows, in virtue of the slogan that Freud gives to the analysis of the unconscious. Wo Es war, he says and I taught you to re-read it the last time, soll Ich werden?

Wo $ tat and you will allow me to write the S of the letter barred here, there where the signifier worked in the double sense that it has just ceased or that it was just going to act, not at all soll Ich werden but muss Ich, I who am acting, I who am launching into the world this thing to which one can address oneself as to a reason muss Ich (o) werden. I must become the waste product of what I am introducing as a new order into the world.

Such is the new form in which I am proposing to you to posit a new way of questioning what is involved, in our day, in the status of the act, in so far as this act is curiously related to a certain number of original introductions, in the first rank of which is the Cartesian cogito, in as much as the psychoanalytic act permits the question to be posed again.

(107) Today there is going to be something a little bit modified in our pact. Naturally, it is understood that in accordance with the good law of offering an exchange, you give me your presence for something that you are expecting. This is supposed to emerge from a certain background and to have been, up to a certain point - it is a matter of knowing which - predestined. In short you are expecting a lecture, a class.

On several occasions, it happens from time to time that I pose myself the question of whom I am addressing myself to, and where it (ça) speaks from. You know the amount of care I take to insist on the fact that I cannot for a single instant lose sight of the original reference point, which is that this discourse on psychoanalysis is addressed to psychoanalysts. There are so many people who are not such and who are gathered here, to hear something. This just by itself demands a certain number of explanations. One would be wrong in this connection to content oneself with historical explanations, namely, an encounter or encounters, the effects of crowd pressure, what it means that I found myself in the position of being heard elsewhere than where I gave it originally. This is obviously not enough to explain things. It is indeed here that one could compare the references of history - for after all, what one in general calls history, this scrum - and of structure.

There are obviously reasons of structure. If I am speaking this year about the act, and am posing the question of the act, that I arrived at the point of what I said the last time which seemed to me by some little samples, proofs that I received, that at least some people have glimpsed the importance of what was formulated the (108) last time in as much as it marks a point which justifies, which allows there to be gathered together at least in a core point, what began to be articulated by me from the start of our year and which of course might have left a fuzzy impression, especially if one starts from the idea that what is first said are necessarily principles. In many cases one is forced to proceed otherwise, even when one has a structural reference and even especially when one has one, because it is of its nature not to be able to be given at the beginning. It has to be conquered. Otherwise I do not see why a schema of the type of the Klein group, upon which I am trying for the moment to articulate what is involved in the act in the perspective that the psychoanalytic act opens up, I do not see why I would not have started from there fifteen years ago.

Today, there will be a pause whose occasion here is only a pretext, although that does not mean, for all that, that it is marginal. It is planned in this year's seminar on the psychoanalytic act, that the 31st January, the 28th February, the 27th March and the 29th May entry will be by invitation. This means that it will be reduced to a certain number of more restricted encounters, in order to allow a conversation.

This has been planned to give a minimum of this something that has always been difficult to handle. The rule governing closed seminars, with all the complications that this involves in the way of choosing. There is always established in things of this order a kind of competition. The place where you do not want to go, you begin to desire once your pal is going. All of this does not make the principle of who to welcome easy, but it is necessary to try to establish a milieu of exchange that has a somewhat different internal relation. I thought of it today but because no one having been warned, I had my reasons for not doing it. It is certain that apart from the people of my school who for their part were, not many candidates would have presented themselves.

Here is how I intend to resolve matters. Something that has nothing to do with the series means that, this 31st, I will not be there. This is not a reason for there not to be a closed seminar. It was agreed that the members of the Paris School described as Freudian, which everyone knows I look after, and this altogether legitimately because moreover they are psychoanalysts, that these should be the ones, in the measure in which they manifest the desire, to come here on the 31st January. I have not even asked yet - I am asking him now - Dr Melman to be (109) there, in short, to organise this meeting.

I had set out the principle that only the members of the School who have shown themselves here in a sufficiently regular fashion to know what I have stated up to now, should come to this meeting. You are going to see the degree to which it is justified. Because I am going to give to this meeting the following object: the idea moreover is not uniquely my own, far from it, I would even say that it was given to me by Dr Melman who, in the context of the teaching of the School, recently proposed to me that in the course of this seminar, which is particularly important all the same, it is hard to see how one could touch on a point more central for psychoanalysts than that of the psychoanalytic act itself, provided of course this word has a sense. This is what I hope has been sufficiently laid out up to the present in your sight, that at the very least I gave a certain shape to this sense. One can articulate it by following a certain number of questions and whether one can answer it and whether these are even questions, is precisely what is left open. This is the way, all the same, the problem is posed. I gave it its initial articulation, as a result of which one can see there being manifested within it certain blanks, in other points squares that are already full or even super-abundantly filled, or even completely overflowing, unbalanced because of not taking others into account. This is precisely the interest of introducing what is called "structure". It is rather curious that we are still at it, and I am obliged to say it since there are certain recent manifestations it among psychoanalysts to even consider whether there can be a question, at the level of principle, about structure. There are things that I really did not have the time to look at and which it is not even sure that I will look at closely but of which, of course, I hear echoes.

One sees people who have a psychoanalytic authority of a certain weight, honourable practitioners as they say, who find themselves manifesting very curiously the point at which things are at. For example, there is a whole milieu where is was, as everyone knows, forbidden even to come within range of the accursed word. And then there was a time, a fabulous time - but it has to be said that things go slowly in this very special milieu - can you imagine, 1960, there are people here who were fourteen years old at the time. The Congrès de (109) Bonneval is immemorial, it is dust-covered, unbelievable! It must be said that it took almost six years to produce its proceedings. There are people who, to discuss what I am teaching, think that it is great to take things up again from the Congrès de Bonneval!

I thank very much the people of my school for having produced a journal, which is obviously not mine, which allows these decanting effects. One could not put it elsewhere, elsewhere is not its place. In a certain Revue Francaise de Psychanalyse, as it is called, there is no question of discussing what I teach, and that is understandable, because psychoanalysis is not spoken about in it. So then, at this point, the empty pockets from next door can empty themselves to discuss what I am saying about the signifier. With all that I have been saying for four years, which has largely gone beyond the question of whether it must be known if at the source it is a matter or not of the signifier.

People go back to the Congrès de Bonneval which was a tunnel, this famous tunnel where the blacks fought one another, without knowing who was hitting who, and where there are the most fantastical lucubrations. There was someone called Lefebvre there, unbelievable people, the friendliest of people, my dear friend Merleau-Ponty who intervened on that occasion. But, everyone at that time, was off target. It was simply a matter, for the first time, of publicly discussing what at that time I had been teaching for seven years at Sainte-Anne to a little circle.

That is how things happen, and this is what makes tangible that in every discourse, there are act-effects. If there had only been the dimension of discourse in it, it ought to have spread more quickly. Precisely, this is what must be highlighted. That this discourse of mine, has this dimension of act at the moment that I am speaking about the act, is something that leaps to the eye. If one looks closely at it, it is the only reason for the presence of people who are here, for it is hard to see, particularly at the level of a young audience, what they can come looking for here. We are not on the plane of providing university services. I can bring you nothing in exchange for your presence. What amuses you is that you sense there is something happening. People do not agree. It is already a little beginning in the dimension of act.

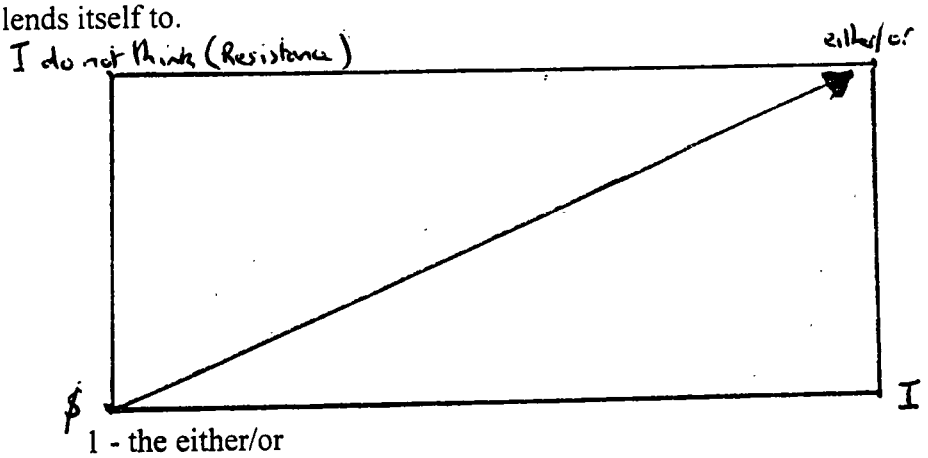
It is truly fabulous - naturally I only have this by hearsay - but in any case it has been affirmed to me that these kind of authors that I spoke about earlier, are among the people who object to this structure which is supposed to leave us, we (111) who are persons, so ill at ease. The being of the person is supposed to be something that would suffer from it. I am afraid that here we are into something which altogether merits analysis and study. What is involved in the being of the person of the psychoanalyst, is precisely something that can only be really grasped from its mapping out in the structure.

In this little tetrahedron which we have started from these last times, something all the same must be quite tangible in it: the multiplicity of translations that it lends itself to.



1 - the either/or

2 - the I am not/ I do not think

3 - this worthy unconscious; I am not

4 - the I do not think, which is not a place reserved to the psychoanalyst, all the same. The psychoanalyst reveals its necessity. That is something quite different. He reveals it in the fact that if it is obviously necessary for someone who is dealing only with thoughts "not to think", what are we to say about the others! This is why this starting point is instructive, and that in short it is something which makes quite clear the fact that this point on the top left then, of the forced choice which is the definition that I gave of alienation in its revised form, alienation as I have explained it here for you, a little improvement given to the notion of alienation as it had been discovered before us. It had first of all been pointed out at the level of production, namely, at the level of social exploitation.

This "I do not think" is what allows us to give its sense, to this word truly manipulated in a way that up to the present was rather abject, in this sense that it reduced the position of the psychoanalysand, the patient, to an attitude that I would qualify as disparaged, if the psychoanalysand, who is rightly or wrongly called the patient in a certain vocabulary, resisted. Anyway you see what that (112) reduces analysis to. To something that analysis certainly is not and that no one had ever thought of making of it, namely, operation of ensnaring, of getting the rabbit out of his burrow; he resists. What resists is obviously not the subject in analysis. What resists is obviously the discourse, and very precisely in the measure of the choice that is at stake. If he renounces the position of "I do not think" as I have just told you, he is all the same drawn to the opposite pole which is that of the "I am not". Now, the "I am not" properly speaking cannot be articulated. It is certain that what is presented first in resistance, is that discourse is not able to go and be something. What?

One would like to ask the people who speak to us about the being of the person in order to make of it an objection to structure, to articulate what it is for them, what they call in this case Being. It is not easy to see very clearly where they place it. They speak for themselves. There is a certain way of placing the being of the person in the others which is a rather something of an operation of odd jobbing.

What this act with a rather exceptional structure - we are going to try to say how it is so - that the analytic act is, what it is a matter at least of putting forward, of suggesting, of pointing out, is how it can preside at a certain renewal of what all the same remains, and from all time, the orienting point of our compass, the way in which it can renew the function of the enlightened act. There can be some renewal in it. If I use the term enlightened, it is not without seeing in it an echo of the Aufklärung. But it is also to say that if our compass always seeks the same north, and here I endorse this north, it can be posed for us in terms structured a little differently.

At the two poles that I defined and articulated of the position of the psychoanalyst, in as much as I do not refuse him at all the right to resistance, it is hard to see why the psychoanalyst should be stripped of it, this psychoanalyst in so far as he establishes the psychoanalytic act, namely, gives his guarantee to the transference, namely, to the subject supposed to know. While his whole advantage, the only one that he has over the psychoanalysing subject, is to know from experience what is involved in the subject supposed to know. Namely, what he - and in as much as he is supposed to have traversed the psychoanalytic experience in a way of which the least that can be said without entering any further to doctrinal debates, is that it ought to be a way that we could say is (113) pushed a little further than that of treatments - he ought to know about what is involved in the subject supposed to know. Namely, that for him, and I explained to you the last time (cf schema), why it is that the subject supposed to know comes here. For him who knows what is involved in the psychoanalytic act, the outline, the vector, the operation of the psychoanalytic act ought to reduce this subject to the function of the little o-object. That is what in an analysis, the one that founded this analysis in an act, his own psychoanalyst has become.

He had become it precisely in as much as at the end he has become joined to what he was not at first, I mean in the subjectivity of the psychoanalysand, he was not at first, at the start, the subject supposed to know. He becomes it, at the end of the analysis, I would say by hypothesis. In analysis, one is there to know something. It is at the moment when he becomes it that also he is vested for the

psychoanalysand with the function occupied in the dynamic by him, the psychoanalysand as subject, the little o-object.

This particular object that the little o-object is, I mean in this sense that it offers a certain diversity which moreover is not very broad, because we can make it quadruple with something empty in the centre, in so far as this little o-object is absolutely decisive for everything that is involved concerning the structure of the unconscious.

Allow me to return to my earlier questioning about those who are still there on the edge, hesitating about what is or is not acceptable in a theory sufficiently developed for there to be no longer a question of disputing its principles, but simply of knowing whether at one or other point its articulation is correct, or to be criticised. Is it not the case for any of those who are here, I would even say those, if there are such, who might be arriving for the first time, is not what settles - that does not mean of course that this could have been said so simply before - is not what settles purely and simply the question of the following: can analysis, yes or no, say - it seems difficult to me, in the way that I am going to say it, for people not to see what is at stake - yes or no, does analysis mean that in whatever you wish, a being as they say, or a becoming, or anything whatsoever, something which is of the living order, there should be, whatever there may be, events which have their consequences? Here we have the term consequence, which has all its emphasis.

(114) Is a consequence conceivable outside a signifying sequence? From the very fact that something which happened subsists in the unconscious in a way that one can rediscover it on condition of catching hold of a piece which allows a sequence to be reconstituted, is there a single thing that can happen to an animal that can be imagined as inscribed in this order? Is not everything that has been articulated in analysis, from the beginning, of the order of this biographical articulation in as much as it refers to something that can be articulated in signifying terms? That this dimension is impossible to remove from it, to expel from it from the moment that, as has been seen, it can no longer be reduced to any notion of plasticity or of reactivity or of biological stimulus-response which, in any case, will not be of the order of what is preserved in a sequence. Nothing of what can operate in terms of fixation, of transfixing, of interruption, indeed even of, of setting up, around a system, of what is only a system, and specifically the nervous one, is by itself alone capable of corresponding to this function of consequence. The structure, its stability, the maintaining of the line on which it is inscribed, implies another dimension, which is properly that of structure. This is a reminder and which does not come here at the point that I have got to, at the moment when then I interrupted myself to give this reminder.

Here we are then at this point $ which situates what is specifically involved in the psychoanalytic act, in so far as it is around it that there is suspended the resistance of the psychoanalyst. The resistance of the psychoanalyst in this structuring is manifested by the fact, which is altogether constitutive of the analytic relation - that he refuses to act. It is in effect quite original in the status of what is involved in the analytic function. Every psychoanalyst knows it, and finally this ends up by being known even by those who have not approached its field. The analyst is the one who is surrounded by a whole zone, who is called frequently by the patient, to make an intervention in terms of act. Not simply in as much as he may be called from time to time to take sides, to be on the patient's side, with regard to a close relation or anyone else. And even simply to perform the sort of act that is indeed one which consists in intervening by an approbation or the contrary, to give advice. This is very precisely what the structure of psychoanalysis leaves blank.

(115) It is very precisely for that reason that I put on the same diagonal - I am saying that to give an image, because of course what happens on that line (the diagonal) has no more right to be called diagonal than what happens on the others. It is enough to turn the tetrahedron, to make horizontal or vertical lines of it, but for reasons of imagination, it is more convenient to represent in this way. You must not be taken in by it. Even though there is nothing more diagonal in transference than in alienation, or in what I called the truth operation. If there are diagonals it is by reason of the schema. It is indeed because the act remains blank that it is also the one which in the other direction can be occupied by transference. Namely, in the course of what the psychoanalysand does by moving towards its horizon, the mirage, the point of arrival at which I already sufficiently defined the rendezvous in so far as it is defined by the subject supposed to know $. At the start, the psychoanalysand picks up his staff and puts on knapsack, to go to meet the subject supposed to know at the rendezvous.

This alone is what permits this careful prohibition that the analyst imposes on himself with respect to the act. In other words, if he did not impose it on himself, he would be quite simply a deceiver, because he knows in principle what is to become in analysis of the subject supposed to know. It is because analysis is, as we have more or less the original experience of it, this artefact, this something which only appears, perhaps, in history from a certain moment as an extremely limited type of episode, of extremely particular cases of a practice, which by chance opened up a completely different style of act relations between humans. This would not for all that be its privilege. I believe I gave you enough indications the last time of the fact that in the course of history the relation of the subject to the act has been modified. That it is not even what can still be found in manuals of morality or sociology that effectively give us an idea of what is effectively involved in act relations in our epoch. For example, it is obviously not only a matter of your having to remember Hegel, in the way the professors speak about him, for you to be able to measure the importance of what is involved in what he represents in terms of a sharp turn with respect to the act.

Now, I do not know what I ought to do at this turning point. To advise you to read something is always so dangerous because everything depends on the degree to which one has previously been more or less cleaned up. It seems (116) difficult to me not to have been sufficiently so, to be able to situate a book,

to give a sense, a weight to what I have just stated. A little book appeared by someone whom I believe I saw at this seminar at one time, who sent it to me because of this, which is called the Discours de la guerre by André Glucksmann.

It is a book which perhaps can give you the dimension on a certain plane, in a certain field of what can arise from something which is rather exemplary and rather complete in as much as the relation of war is something about which everyone speaks without rhyme or reason. But as regards the influence of the discourse of war on war, an influence which is not nothing, as you will see from reading this book, namely, one which corresponds to a certain way of taking Hegel's discourse in so far as it is a discourse on war in which one sees clearly how many limits there are on the side of the technician, on the side of the soldier. And then alongside the discourse of the solider, here again one would be wrong to despise the soldier from the moment that he knows how to sustain a discourse. This rarely happens, but when it happens it is all the same very striking that it is rather more effective than the discourse of the psychoanalyst.

The discourse of Clausewitz in so far as it is connected with that of Hegel and contributes its counterpart to it, can give them some idea of what my discourse could contribute along this line about a relation, which would allow it to be believed, that in our epoch, there is a discourse acceptable outside the discourse of war. This perhaps might also account for a certain gap between Hegel and Clausewitz at the level of a discourse on war. Naturally, Clausewitz did not know the little o-object. But if by chance the little o-object has allowed us to see a little bit more clearly into something that Clausewitz introduced as the fundamental asymmetry between two parties in war, namely, the absolute heterogeneity there is. And this asymmetry is found to dominate the whole game between offensive and defensive, even though Clausewitz was not precisely someone to go on about the necessities of the offensive. This is only a simple indication.

I am filling in, in a way, hastily, a certain number of lacks in the foundation of what I am articulating in connection with what the psychoanalytic act allows us, in short, to establish or to restore about what constitutes the co-ordinates of the act, of what we are trying to open up the path of this year.

(117) You see then that there are several lacks. First of all something that ought to be taken for granted, namely, what in a logical structure establishes for our mapping out at the minimal level of something quite privileged, psychoanalysis, in so far as it constitutes the connection between an act and a doing. If we do not set up this logical structure, with the parts that are alive in the operation, and then those that are left for dead, we cannot find our bearings in the analytic operation. It is therefore something primordial and something that is not simply important for our practice itself but also to explain the paradoxes of what is produced in its surrounds. Namely, how it can lend itself and very especially on the part of those who are engaged in it, to a certain number of elective miscognitions which correspond to the dead or suspended parts in the very operation that is at stake.

That gives already two aspects. The third which is no less thrilling, is this something to which, at the end of my discourse the last time, I gave a too facile, too tempting an indication to express rapidly something about which an echo came back to me. One that I cannot subscribe to and which is quite amusing having come from one of these numerous voices that I have at my disposal. It is someone, I no longer remember whom. I no longer know who repeated it to me. He said to me today, decidedly, this is a Che Guevara seminar. All that because in connection with the subject supposed to know, the $ barred on the bottom left, I had said that what is perhaps - at least this model poses the question for us - the end, the finish, the tipping over, the somersault, which is the normal end in itself of what is involved in the act, in so far as if there is something this psychoanalysis reveals to us, and this from the start, it is that it is not an act of which anyone can say that he is entirely master. It is not something to tear us away from all our certainties, from everything that we have picked up fundamentally from our experience, from what we know about history and a thousand other things again. Every act and not simply the psychoanalytic act promises to the one who takes its initiative only this end which I designate in the little o-object. And it is not something to make eardrums burst out of their orbits. It is hardly worthwhile because of that to believe that this is a Che Guevara seminar. There have been others before. I am not in the process of polishing up the tragic in order to make it shine. What is at stake is perhaps something else.

(118) What is at stake is something which is obviously more within our reach, if we bring it back to what we must know about the logical structure of the act to truly conceive of what is happening in the limited field of psychoanalysis.

It is here that questions can be formulated among those who belong to my School who one are presumed to be able to put what I am stating in its place, all along a construction, the necessity of whose different stages they have been able to follow. Let them bring me through the intermediary of Doctor Melman, and this no later than next Wednesday, something like a testimony. A testimony that they are capable of pushing a little bit further the turning points, the living things, the hinges, the doors, the way of using this apparatus in so far as it concerns them.

I mean that what I am expecting from the meeting, from which, I apologise, the majority of those who are here will find themselves excluded in advance, is a certain number of questions which prove to me that, at least up to the point that I have gone this year concerning what is involved in the act, people can question themselves about something, propose an interpretation and to this interpretation an objection. "If you interpret things in this way this is what it means" or "it is in contradiction with one or other point of our experience". In short, to show that up to a certain point I am being understood. This is what will serve then for the following closed seminar (28/2), in as much as the only people who will be invited, are those of my School who have taken part in this first meeting. It is an act to go out of one's way. It is especially an act not to go out of one's way. It happens, for example, that I can ask someone why a particular analyst, who is very aware to what I am teaching, and I ask, why he is not here, precisely this year, at what I am stating about the act. You will say that people take notes. In passing, I would like to point out that it is better to take notes than to smoke. Smoking is not such a good sign as regards listening to what I am saying. I do not disapprove of smoking ...

It seems to me that since I made an allusion to the fact that what seems to me to motivate this audience which honours me by its presence, is the aspect of opening up of what is happening before you. And I do not even find that on the part of analysts, not to be present here at the moment that I am speaking about the act - namely, that it is not just any discourse whatsoever - even if they are given faithful and well informed notes, there is something rather telling, significant, and which may well lie where I inscribed the term, resistance.

(119) I intended to ask one or two or three people to put one or two questions to me, to give a model for entering the closed seminar. It would not be a bad thing. I also know the freezing effect that results from this large number. I propose, nevertheless, that it should be established that apart from a few exceptions, that for the regulation of the seminar of those admitted on the 28/2, it is those who will have sent me a written question which seems to me to be on the right lines about what I am trying to bring you who will receive the little invitation card for the 28/2.

It only remains for me to pinpoint something here and there to advance us a little, even if today it is not of the ex cathedra order that I habitually adopt, alas. It must all the same be noted that this gap, which still remains between the act and the doing, is what is at stake. This is the burning point around which people have been racking their brains for a certain very limited number of centuries, from the few great, great-grandfathers that are necessary to be right away at the epoch of Caesar. You have no idea of the degree to which you are implicated in things that only history manuals make you think belong to the past.

If people rack their brains - look at Hegel - about the difference between the master and the slave, you can give to this as elastic a sense as you wish, if you look carefully at it, it involves nothing other than the difference between the act and the doing, to which we are trying to give a different body, a little bit less simple than the subject who poses the act. It is not at all necessarily and uniquely - this is what is disturbing - the subject who commands. Pierre Janet constructed a whole psychology around that. That does not mean that he was badly oriented, on the contrary, simply his analyses are rather rudimentary. They do not allow very much to be understood. Because outside the fact of what is represented on Egyptian bas-reliefs, namely, a pilot, moreover, that there is a conductor at Pleyel or elsewhere, that there are those who have - this does not explain very much, because where there is truly a master, that does not mean so much those who have a cushy time as people think - there are those who have to deal with the act and those who have to deal with the doing. So there is doing and doing. This is where one can begin to understand how this doing, despite its futile character, I am speaking about psychoanalysis, has perhaps a greater chance than any other of allowing us access to enjoyment.

(120) Look carefully at this doing in a feature that I would like to underline. There is no need to say that it is a doing of pure speech. It is something that I have killed myself recalling for years in order to try to see its function in the field of speech and of language. What is not noticed, is that, because it is a doing of pure speech, that it gets close to being an act as compared to common doing and that one could moreover express it by the signifier in act. If we look at things very closely, namely, what is truly the sense of the fundamental rule, it is precisely, that up to a point that is as advanced as possible, these are the instructions: that the subject should absent himself from it.

The task, the doing of the subject is to leave this signifier to its operation. The "in act" is a device, but it is not the act of the signifier. The signifier in act has this connotation, this evocation of the signifier that one could call in a certain register, in potency. But to know what our doctor earlier would like there to be recalled among those who put the stress on structure, there are so many there ready to rabbit on about the person. Being is so superabundant that for us to try to catch ourselves in its precise rails, in this logic which is not a logic at all, about which one cannot in any way and by any right put the sign of emptiness. It is not so easy to construct this logic, you see here what it results from. Let us say, that for an analyst to bring up terms like that of the person is something excessive, at least to my ears. But if he wants to reassure himself, let him observe that I would define this logic a little bit like one that would remain as close as possible to grammar. That startles you, I hope. So then, Aristotle, quite calmly, huh? Why not?

We must quite simply try to do better. I point out to you that if this logic of Aristotle has remained un-punctured for long centuries up to our own, it is because of the objections that were made to it of being, as they said, a logic which did not notice that it was doing grammar. I admire enormously professors in the university who know that Aristotle did not notice something. He is the greatest naturalist who ever existed. You can still reread his History of animals. It still holds up. It is fabulous. It is the greatest step ever taken in biology. Not that some have not been taken since. In logic also, steps taken precisely starting from grammar. It is still something that we can rack our brains about even after (121) having added to it some very astute things, quantifiers for example. They have only one inconvenience, which is that they are quite untranslatable into language. I am not saying that this does not bring up to date the question on which I took a kind of dogmatic stand, a label, a banner, a slogan: there is no meta-language. You can well imagine that it worries me also if perhaps there is one. In any case, let us start from the idea that there is not. This would not be a bad thing. It would avoid us believing wrongly that there is one.

It is not sure that something that cannot be translated into language does not suffer from a quite effective deficiency. In any case, following my remarks, bringing us to the question of quantifiers, it is obviously going to be a matter of posing certain questions, which are going to concern what is involved, what is going to happen in the corner of the $ of the subject supposed to know which has been removed from the map. What we will have to lucubrate about the availability of the signifier in this place, will perhaps leads us to this joint of grammar and logic. This is - I am only remarking it in this connection and to recall it to mind - very precisely the point by which we have always navigated, this logic that my entourage of the time called, with tentative sympathy, an elastic logic. I am not in complete agreement about this term. Elasticity is not the best thing that one could hope for as a standard of measurement.

The joint between logic and grammar, is also something perhaps which will make us take some further steps. In any case, what I would like to say in ending, is that I cannot summon psychoanalysts too much to meditate on the specialness of the position which happens to be theirs, of having to occupy a corner completely different to the one where they are required, even if they are forbidden to act. It is all the same from the point of view of act that they have to centre their meditation on their function.

But it is not for nothing that it is so difficult to get it. There is in the position of the psychoanalyst, and by function, if this schema renders it sufficiently tangible for no offence to be seen in it, something like taking cover (de tapi). We will try to decipher somewhere "an image in the carpet", or in the ..., as you wish. There is a certain way for the psychoanalyst to centre himself, to savour something that ends up in this position of taking cover. They call that what they (122) can, they call it listening, they call it the clinic. You cannot imagine all the opaque words that are found on this occasion. For I ask myself what can in any way, what can allow the accent to be put on what is quite specific about this flavour of an experience. It is certainly not accessible to any logical manipulation. In the name of this, I do not dare to say solitary enjoyment, morose delectation, in the name of this to allow oneself to say that all theories are of equal value. That above all you must not be attached to any one of them, whether one expresses things in terms of instinct, of behaviour, of genesis, of Lacanian topology. All of that, we should find ourselves equidistant from this sort of discussion. All of this fundamentally is a hypocondriacal enjoyment. This centred aspect, peristaltic and anti-peristaltic at the same time is something intestinal to psychoanalytic experience. It is indeed this that effectively you are going to see imaged, which displays itself on a rostrum, it is not necessarily the easiest point to win through the effect of a dialectic. This is the essential point around which there is played out, alas, what Clauswitz describes as asymmetrical between offensive and defensive.

Jacques Lacan did not attend this "seminar".

Among those who participated in the discussion were: C Melman, G Michaud, J Oury, P Lemoine, F Tosquelles, J Rudrauf, X Audouard, I Roublef, E LemoineT Abdoucheli, C Conté, J Ayme, M Noyes, L Mélèse, C Dorgeuille, F Guattari, J Nassif and others.

I am taking up again then after a fortnight the continuation of what I am advancing before you this year about the psychoanalytic act. It is parallel to a certain number of propositions, to employ the proper term, that I proposed in a circle composed of psychoanalysts.

The responses to these propositions, which moreover are not limited to those entitled such, are followed by a certain number of other productions. There is going to appear at the end of this month a journal which will be the journal of the School. All of this has as a result a certain number of responses or manifestations, which are certainly not in any case without interest for those to whom I am addressing myself here. It is clear that some of these responses, of these reactions, made to the most lively point where my propositions are rather consequent with what I am producing before you on the psychoanalytic act, are assuredly full of sense to define through a test that can be described as crucial, what is involved in the status of the psychoanalyst.

In effect the last time, I left you with the indication of a logical reference. It is quite certain that at the point that we are at, where the act defines by its cutting edge what is involved in the passage in which the psychoanalyst is instaured or established, it is quite clear that we cannot but pass again by way of the kind of testing that logical questioning constitutes for us.

Will it be, to take the inaugural reference of Aristotle, at the moment when, as I evoked, he takes the decisive steps from which there is instaured, as such, the (146) logical category in its formal species? Is it a matter of an approach with an demonstrative or dialectical intention? The question, as you are going to see, is secondary.

Why is it secondary? Because what is at stake is instaured from the discourse itself. namely, that everything that we can formulate about the psychoanalysand and the psychoanalyst, is going to turn - I think I am not going to surprise you in stating it as I am going to - I prepared it sufficiently for the thing to appear to you now as already said - is going to turn around the following: how contest the fact that the psychoanalysand, in his place in the discourse is at the place of the subject? Whatever reference we arm ourselves with to better situate him, it is

naturally in the first place with the linguistic reference. He is essentially the one who speaks.

He is the one who speaks and on whom there are tested the effects of the word. What is meant by this "on whom are tested" ("sur qui s'éprouvent")? The formula is deliberately ambiguous. I mean that his discourse as it is regulated, set up, by the analytic rule, is designed to be the test of the way in which, as subject, he is already constituted as effect of the word. And nevertheless, it is also true to say that this discourse itself, as it is going to be pursued, be sustained as task, finds its sanction, its evaluation, its result qua discourse-effect, above all from this proper discourse itself, whatever may be the way the analyst inserts himself into it by his interpretation.

Inversely, we should notice that if the always current, indeed sometimes burning question is brought to bear on the psychoanalyst, let us say, to be prudent, to say the minimum, that it is in so far as the term "psychoanalyst" is given as a qualification. Who, what, can be said to be - predicate - "psychoanalyst"?

Assuredly, if even this way of getting into the question appears to be going too quickly, it is by a twist that it will be justified if this is the way that, to go to the kernel, I am announcing under what escutcheon, under what rubric I intend to place my discourse today. You can trust me, it is not without having, in this connection, renewed contact, as I might say, with what is enlightening in the very history of logic, in the way in which, in our time, the handling of what is designated by this term logic see-saws in such a way, a way which truly makes, as I might say, not always more difficult, but makes us more and more confused before Aristotle's starting point.

(147) You have to consult his text, and specifically the Organon, at the level of the categories for example, or the Prior Analytics, or the first book of the Topics, to notice how close to our problematic is the thematic of the subject, as he states it. For assuredly, from the first statement, nothing is already more tangible to enlighten us about what, in this subject, is of its nature something that slips away par excellence. Nothing that at the start of the logic is more firmly affirmed as being distinguished from what has been translated, very insufficiently undoubtedly as "substance", ousia. What is at stake in translating it by substance is clearly seen, in the course of time, to be an excessive slippage in the function of the subject in its first Aristotelian steps, for the term "substance", which constitutes here an equivocation with what the subject includes in terms of supposition, for the term "substance" to have been so easily put forward.

There is nothing in the ousia in what is – namely, for Aristotle - the individual, of a nature to be able to be or situated in the subject, nor affirmed, namely, nor attributed to the subject.

But what else is more likely to make us immediately jump with both feet into the formula in which I believed I could, in all rigour, bear witness to this truly key,

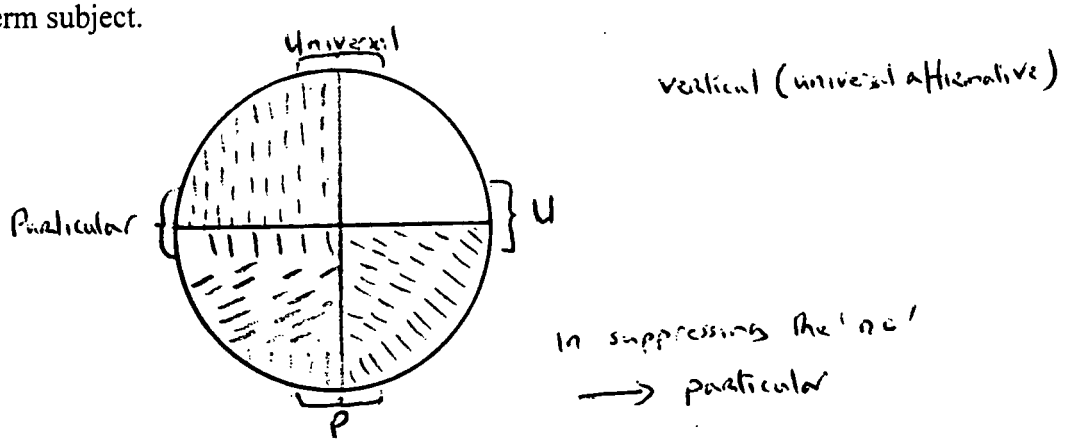
truly central point of the history of logic. The one which by being dulled by a growing ambiguity, the subject rediscovers on his path as in modern logic, this other aspect of a sort of turning point which makes its perspective tip over, as one might say, the one which, in mathematical logic, tends to reduce it to the variable of a function. Namely, something which is going to enter subsequently into the whole dialectic of the quantifier, which has no other effect than to make it henceforth irremediable in the way in which it is manifested in the proposition. The term "turning point" seems to me well enough fixed in the formula that I thought I should give of it, in saying that the subject is very precisely what a signifier represents for another signifier.

This formula has the advantage of re-opening what is eluded in the position of mathematical logic. Namely, the question of what is initial, initiating, in positing any signifier whatsoever, by introducing it as representing the subject. For this is, and this is since Aristotle, what is essential about it and what alone allows there to be situated in its correct place the difference between this first bipartition, the one which differentiates the universal from the particular, and the second bipartition, the one which affirms or which denies. One and the other as you know cross over (148) one another to give the quadripartition of the universal affirmative, the universal negative, and of the particular negative and affirmative, by turns.

The two bipartitions have absolutely no equivalence. What is meant by the introduction of the subject, in so far as it is at its level that there is situated the bipartition of the universal and the particular? What can that mean, to take things as did someone who found himself, as happened to Peirce, Charles Sanders, at this historic point, at this level of the joining of traditional logic to mathematical logic? Which means that in a way, we find from his pen this moment of oscillation in which there is outlined the turning point that opens up a new path. No one more than he - and I already produced his testimony when I had to speak in 1960 about the term identification - has better underlined, or with more elegance, what is the essence of this foundation from which there emerges the distinction between the universal and the particular and the link of the universal to the term subject.



He did it by means of a little exemplary drawing that those who have already followed me for some time know well, but that moreover it is not without interest to repeat, to designate here. The fact is that it gives the facility of giving as a support to the subject what is really involved in it, namely, nothing. In this case a stroke (trait).

None of these strokes that we are going to take in order to exemplify what is involved in the function of the subject for the predicate, there is none of these (149) strokes as we are going to inscribe them which is not already specified by the predicate around which we are going to make the statement of our proposition turn, namely, the "vertical" predicate.

1) In the first box, on the top left, the strokes correspond to the predicate, they are vertical strokes.
2) And then there are others in this bottom left box, some of which are not so.
3) Here on the bottom right none is.
4) Here, as you see, there are no strokes. This is where the subject is.

This is where the subject is, because there are no strokes. Everywhere else, the strokes are masked by the presence or absence of the predicate. But to make you grasp clearly why it is the "no stroke (pas de trait)" that is essential, there are several methods, even if it were only by instauring the statement of the universal affirmative, for example, as follows. There is no stroke that is not vertical.

You will see that it is making the "no" function on the "vertical" or by removing it that will allow you to make the affirmative or negative bipartition, and that it is by suppressing the "no" before the stroke, and that it is by leaving, the stroke that is or not vertical, that you enter the particular. Namely, at the moment when the subject is entirely subjected to the variation of vertical or not vertical. There are some that are, and others that are not. But the status of universality is only instaured here for example by the union of two boxes. Namely, the one which has only vertical strokes, but the one moreover where there are no strokes. For the statement of the universal, which says that all the strokes are vertical, is only substantiated, legitimately, from these two boxes and their union.

It is also true, it is more essentially true, at the level of the empty box. There are no strokes except vertical ones means that where there are no verticals, there is no stroke. Such is the acceptable definition of the subject in so far as beneath every predicative stating, it is essentially this something that is only represented by a signifier for another signifier.

I will only mention quickly, for we are not going to spend our whole talk dwelling on what we can draw from Peirce's schema. It is clear that it is similar from the union of these two boxes (the right hand bracket) that the statement: no stroke is vertical takes its support, why? This indeed is why it is necessary for me (150) to accentuate how it is demonstrated - what is already known if one reads Aristotle's text in an appropriate way - that the universal affirmative and the universal negative in no way contradict one another, that they are both acceptable on condition that we are in this top right hand box. It is also true at the level of this box to state that all the strokes are vertical, or that no stroke is vertical, the two things are true at the same time, something that curiously Aristotle, if my knowledge is correct, failed to recognise.

At the other points of the crucial division you have the instauration of particulars. There are in these two boxes (those on the left) vertical strokes, and, at the junction of the two lower boxes, there are only, and nothing more, strokes which are not so.

You see then that at the level of the universal foundation, things are situated in a way that involves an exclusion, that of this diversity, the one in the box on the bottom left. Likewise at the level of the particular differentiation, there is an exclusion: that of the box on the top right.

This is what gives the illusion that the particular is an affirmation of existence. That it is enough to speak at the level of "some", some man, for example, of yellow colour, to imply that from this fact that is stated in the form of a particular, there is supposed to be from this fact, if I may express myself thus, from the fact of this stating, the affirmation also of the existence of the particular. This indeed is something around which innumerable debates have turned on the subject of the logical status of the particular proposition. And this is assuredly what makes it derisory, for it is not enough for a proposition to be stated at the level of the particular, to imply in any way the existence of the subject, except in the name of a signifying arrangement, namely, as effect of discourse.

The interest of psychoanalysis is that it ties together, as has never been able to be done up to the present, these problems of logic, by contributing to them what, in short, was at the source of all the ambiguities that developed in the history of logic, by implying in the subject an ousia, a being. That the subject can function as not being (comme n'étant pas), is properly - I have articulated it, I have insisted on it from the beginning of this year - what can bring us the enlightening opening thanks to which there can be re-opened an examination of the development of logic. The task is still open - and who knows, perhaps by stating it here, I will (151) provoke a vocation - of showing us what is truly meant by so many detours, so much embarrassment, sometimes so curious, so paradoxical, manifested in the course of history. These are what have marked logical debates throughout the ages and render so incomprehensible, seen from a certain age, at least from ours, the time they sometimes took, and which appear to us for a long time to have constituted stagnations, even passions around the stagnations, whose import we can hardly sense as long as we do not see what was truly at stake behind them. Namely, nothing less that the status of desire whose link, because it is secret, with politics, for example, is altogether tangible at the turning point which constituted the instauration in one philosophy, English philosophy specifically, of a certain nominalism. It is impossible to comprehend the consistency of this logic with politics, without noting what the logic itself implies about the status of the subject and about the reference to the effectiveness of desire in political relations.

For us, for whom this status of the subject is illustrated by questions - and I marked again that all of this happens in a very limited, indeed very short milieu, marked by discussions about its pregnance - whose burning character, participates I would say in these ancient underpinnings, which is why, in this case, we take as example, what we are able to articulate. This is why it cannot but have an incidence on a much larger domain in as much as it is assuredly not just in the practice which turns around the function of desire in so far as analysis discovers it, it is not simply here that the question of it is played out.

Here then are the psychoanalysand and the psychoanalyst placed by us in these distinct positions which are, respectively, what is going to be the status of a subject defined by this discourse, by this discourse that, I told you the last time, is established by the rule, especially because of the fact that the subject is asked to abdicate from it. This is the aim of the rule, and by committing himself, at the limit, to the drift of language, he is going to attempt by a sort of immediate experience of its pure effect, to connect up with its already established effects.

Such a subject, a subject defined as effect of discourse, to the point that he undertakes the trial of losing himself in it in order to find himself, such a subject whose exercise is in a way to put himself to the test of his own resignation, when can we say to what is a predicate applied? In other words, could we state (152) something that falls under rubric of the universal? If the universal did not already show in its structure that it finds its source, its foundation in the subject in so far as he can only be represented by his absence, namely, in so far as he is never represented? We would assuredly have the right to pose the question if anything whatsoever could be stated of the order, for example, of "every psychoanalysand resists".

I am however not going to decide yet whether any universal whatsoever can be posited about the psychoanalysand. We will not set it aside, despite the appearance, that in positing the psychoanalysand as this subject who chooses to make himself, as one might say, more alienated than any other, to dedicate himself to the fact that only the detours of an unchosen discourse, namely, this something which is most opposed to what is here - in the schema - at the start. Namely, that it is of course by a choice, but a choice that is masked, eluded, because made earlier. We have chosen to represent the subject by the stroke, by this stroke that is no longer seen because it is henceforth qualified. There is nothing more opposed, in appearance, to how the psychoanalysand constitutes himself, which is all the same by a certain choice, this choice that I earlier called abdication, the choice of testing oneself against the effects of language. It is indeed here that we are going to find our bearings.

In effect, if we follow the thread, the web that the use of the syllogism suggests to us, what of course we ought to arrive at, is something that is going to connect this subject to what is here advanced as a predicate, the psychoanalyst - if a psychoanalyst exists. And, alas, this is what we lack to support this logical articulation. If one psychoanalyst exists, everything is assured. There can be a crowd of others.

But for the moment, the question for us is to know how the psychoanalysand can become a psychoanalyst. How does it happen that, in the most well grounded way, this qualification is only supported by the task completed by the psychoanalysand. Here indeed we see there being opened up this other dimension, which is one that I already tried to profile before you, about the conjunction of the act and the task. How do the two connect up? We find ourselves here before another form of what created a problem and ended up by being articulated in the Middle Ages. It is not there for nothing this inventio medi, from which there starts with this admirably lively step the Prior Analytics (153) of Aristotle. Namely, the first figure of the middle term, of this middle term about which he explains to us that by being situated as a predicate, it will allow us to connect in a rational fashion this vanishing subject to something which is a predicate. Through the middle term, this connection is possible. Where is the mystery? How does it happen that it appears that something exists which is a middle term and which appears in the first figure as predicate of the major where the subject awaits us, as subject of the minor which is going to allow us to lay hold again of the predicate in question. Is it yes or no, attributable to the subject?

This thing which, with the passage of time, passed through different colours, which appeared, at the turn of the 16th century, when all is said and done - there is no doubt that one sees it from the pen of the authors – to be a purely futile exercise. We will give it body again by noticing what is at stake.

What is at stake is what I called the o-object which is for us here the true middle term that is proposed, assuredly, as a plus one, of a more incomparable seriousness by being the effect of the discourse of the psychoanalysand. And by being on the other hand, as I have stated it, in the new graph that you see me using here for the last two years, not what the psychoanalyst becomes, what is implied at the start by the whole operation, what ought to be the outcome of the psychoanalysing operation, what liberates in it something of a fundamental truth. The end of psychoanalysis, namely, the subject being unequal to any possible subjectification of sexual reality and the requirement that, in order that this truth should appear, the psychoanalyst should already be the representation of what masks, obtrudes, stoppers this truth and which is called the o-object.

Note well, in effect, that I will return at length to the essential of what I am articulating here, the essential is not that at the end of the psychoanalysis, as some people imagine - I saw it from the questions posed - the psychoanalyst becomes the o-object for the other. This "for the other" here curiously takes on the value of a "for oneself", in as much as, as subject there is none other than this Other to whom the whole discourse is left. It is neither for the Other, nor in a for oneself which does not exist at the level of the psychoanalyst, that there resides this o. It is indeed an in itself (en soi), an in itself of the psychoanalyst. It is in as much as,

as the psychoanalysts themselves protest moreover - it is enough to open the (154) literature on it to see the testimony of it at every moment - they are really this breast of the "oh, my mother Intelligence", of our Mallarmé; that they are themselves this waste product, presiding over the operation of the task, that they are the look, that they are the voice. It is in so far as they are in themselves the support of this o-object that the whole operation is possible. There is only one thing that escapes them, which is the degree to which it is not metaphorical.

Now let us try to take up again what the psychoanalysand is, this psychoanalysand, who is engaged in this curious task that I described as being supported by his abdication. Are we not going to sense here that, in any case, there is something enlightening in whether he can or cannot be taken, we do not know, under the function of the universal? There is perhaps another thing that is going to strike us. It is that we have posited him as subject not without intention. That means that the sense of what this word, psychoanalysand, means when we articulate it at the level of the subject, in so far as he is the one who plays with all these colours taken, like those of a murena on the plate of a rich Roman, cannot be put to use except by changing its sense as an attribute. The proof is that when one uses it as an attribute, one uses the term psychoanalysed, as foolishly as possible. But one does not say that these or those or all of these or all of those are psychoanalysands. I did not use, as you notice, the singular term. This would be still more outrageous. But let us leave the singular to one side, experiencing at this turning point the same repugnance that ensures that Aristotle does not use singular terms in his syllogistics.

If you do not sense right away what I am aiming at in connection with this tangible testing of the use of the term psychoanalysand, as subject or as attribute, I am going to make you sense it.

Use the word worker, as it is situated in the perspective of: "workers of the world unite", namely, at the level of the ideology which picks out and emphasises their essential alienation, the constitutive exploitation which considers them as workers. Oppose this to the use of the same term in the paternalistic expression, the one that would describe a population as hardworking (travailleuse). These people are workers by nature, they are (attribute) "good workers". This example, this distinction is one which perhaps is going to introduce you to something which will perhaps make you pose the question after all, of why, in this so curious (155) operation which is the one by which, as I told you, the subject of the psychoanalytic act is supported, how, on the principle of the fact that the act by which psychoanalysis is established, starts elsewhere? Is this not designed to make us grasp that there is here also, a kind of alienation. And after all, you are not surprised at it since it was already present in my first schema, that it is from a necessary alienation, the one in which it is impossible to choose between the "either I do not think" and the "or I am not", that I derived the whole first formulation of what is involved in the psychoanalytic act.

But then, perhaps like that, in a sidelong way, it is a way that I have, like that, a heuristic one, of introducing you, you might ask yourselves - I put the question because the answer is already there of course - what does this psychoanalysing task produce?

To guide us we already have the o-object. For if at the end of a terminated psychoanalysis, this o-object, which is no doubt always there, at the level of our question, namely, the psychoanalytic act, it is all the same only at the end of the operation, that it is going to reappear in the real, from another source. Namely, as rejected by the psychoanalysand.

But this is where our middle term functions, that we find it weighted with a completely different accent. This o that is at stake, as we have said, is the psychoanalyst. It is not because it is there from the start, that at the end, from the point of view of the psychoanalysing task this time, it is not what is produced. I mean that one can ask oneself the question of what description can we give of the psychoanalyst. One thing in any case is certain, there is no psychoanalyst without a psychoanalysand. And I would say more, that this thing which is so curious for having entered into the field of our world, namely, that there are a certain number of people of whom we are not so sure that this has the power to establish their status as subject. There are, all the same, people who work at this psychoanalysis. The term work has never been excluded from it for a single instant, from the origin of psychoanalysis. Durcharbeitung, working through, is indeed the characteristic to which we must indeed refer ourselves in order to admit the aridity, the dryness, the detours, even sometimes the uncertainty of this area.

But if we put ourselves at the level of an omnitude where all the subjects frankly affirm themselves then, in their universality, as no longer being, and as being (the (156) box on the right) the foundation of the universal. What we see is that, assuredly, there is something that is going to depend on it, which is the product and even properly speaking the production.

Here already I can pinpoint what is the nature of these "people", of this species: the psychoanalyst, by defining him as production. If there were no psychoanalysand, I would say, like in some classic humour or other that I am reversing: if there were no Poles there would be no Poland. It can also be said: if there were no psychoanalysands, there would be no psychoanalyst. The psychoanalyst is defined at this level of production. He is defined as being this sort of subject who can approach the consequences of discourse, in a fashion so pure that he can isolate its plane in these relations with the one for whom, by his act, he sets up the task and the programme of this task. And through all the sustaining of this task, only sees in it relations which are properly those that I designate when I handle this algebra: the $, the o, indeed the O and the i(o). The one who is capable of maintaining himself at this level, namely, of only seeing the point at which the subject is at this task, whose end is, when there falls, when there drops, at the final term the o-object. The one who is of such a kind, which means the one who is capable, in relation to someone who is here in the position of treatment, of not letting himself be affected by everything involved in that by which every human being communicates in every function with his fellow.

And this has a name, which is not simply the one that I have always denounced, namely, narcissism, up to its extreme term, which is called love. There is not only narcissism, nor luckily only love between human beings, as it is called. There is something that someone who knew how to speak about love happily distinguished. There is taste, there is esteem. Taste is one aspect, esteem is perhaps not the same, but they connect up admirably. There is fundamentally this something which is called "I like you, Tu me plais", and which is made up essentially of this titration, of what ensures that in an exact and irreplaceable proportion, of what you can put in the bottom left hand box, the relation, the support the subject takes from the o and from this i(o) which grounds the narcissistic relation, resonates, is for you exactly what is necessary for you to like him. This is what ensures that in relations between human beings there is an encounter. It is very precisely from this, which is the flesh and blood of everything that has ever been articulated in the order of what in our day people try to mathematicise in a farcical way under the name of human relations. It is from (157) this that the analyst precisely distinguishes himself, by never having recourse in the relation within analysis, to this unexpressible, to this term which gives its only support to the reality of the other which is the "I like you" or "I do not like you".

The extraction, the absence of this dimension means that there is a being, the being of the psychoanalyst who can make everything that is at stake in the fate of the psychoanalysing subject turn, by being himself in the position of the o. Namely, in truth, to make his relation to him turn purely and simply around these terms of an algebra which are in no way concerned with a crowd of existing and more than acceptable dimensions. A pile of givens, of substantial elements in what is in operation, in place and breathing there on the couch. Here is a production that is altogether comparable to that of one or other machine which circulates in our scientific world and which is, properly speaking, the production of the psychoanalysand.

Here is something original. Here all the same is something that is rather tangible, which is not all that new, even though it is articulated in a way that may appear striking to you. Because what does it mean if one asks the psychoanalyst not to bring into play in analysis what is called counter-transference? I would defy anyone to give it another sense than the following. That there is no place either for "I like you", or "I do not like you", after having defined them as I have just done. But then we find ourselves up against the question of what is involved, after having transformed the o-object for you at this point into an assembly line production, if the psychoanalyst produces the o like an Austin. What can the psychoanalytic act mean, if in effect the psychoanalytic act is, all the same, committed by the psychoanalyst?

This of course means that the psychoanalyst is not entirely o-object. He operates as o-object. But I think I have already articulated the act in question strongly enough up to the present to be able, to take it up again without commentary, the act which consists in authorising the psychoanalysing task, with what this involves in terms of having faith in the subject supposed to know. The thing was quite simple as long as I had not announced that this faith is unsustainable. And that the psychoanalyst is the first, and up to now the only one, to be able to measure it. It has not yet been done. Thanks to what I am teaching it is necessary for him to know that:

1 - The subject supposed to know is precisely what the transference considered as a gift from heaven, depended on.

2 - But that also from the moment that it proves that transference is the subject supposed to know, he the psychoanalyst, is the only one able to put in question the following. The fact is that if this supposition is in effect quite useful in order to engage in the psychoanalytic task, namely, there is a – call it what you wish the omniscient, the Other - there is someone who already knows all of that, everything that is going to happen. Naturally not the analyst. But there is someone. The analyst, for his part, does not know that there is a subject supposed to know and even knows that everything involved in psychoanalysis, because of the existence of the unconscious, consists precisely eliminating from the map this function of subject supposed to know.

It is then a curious act of faith that is affirmed by putting one's faith in what is put in question, since by simply engaging the psychoanalysand in the task one prefers this act of faith, namely, one saves him.

Do you not see here something that overlaps in a curious way a certain quarrel? One of these things that have now lost their relief a little, to the point that now no one gives a damn about them. At Luther's last centenary it appears that there was a postcard from the Pope: "Best wishes from Rome". Is it faith or works that save? You see perhaps there a schema where the two things are connected. Between psychoanalysing work and psychoanalytic faith, there is some tie-up, which may perhaps allows there to be clarified retrospectively the validity and the asymmetrical order in which there these two formulae of salvation by the one or by the other were posited.

But it will no doubt seem more interesting for us - at least I hope so - to see there being highlighted at the end of this discourse something that I must say, for myself, it is a surprise to find.

If it is true that in the field of the psychoanalytic act what produces the psychoanalysand is the psychoanalyst, and if you reflect on this little reference that I took in passing about the essence of the universal consciousness of the worker, properly speaking, qua subject of exploitation of man by man, does not focusing the whole attention about economic exploitation on the alienation of the product of work not mask something in the constitutive alienation of the economic exploitation of man? Is this not to mask an aspect, and perhaps not without motivation, the cruellest aspect of it which perhaps a certain number of political facts make likely? Why would we not ask ourselves the question of (159) whether it does not appear at a certain degree of the organisation of production, precisely, that the product of the worker, under a certain aspect, is precisely the singular form, the figure that capitalism takes on in our day. I mean that by following this thread, and in then seeing the function of capitalist faith, take some little references in what I am indicating about the subject of the psychoanalytic act. And keep that in the margin, in your head, for the remarks with which I am going to pursue my discourse.

I am going to continue then in a fortnight in virtue of the very vacation that is given to the little brats in secondary school. I am giving it to myself and I am giving you an appointment in a fortnight's time.

Seminar 10: Wednesday 21 February 1968

(161) One of these days a little journal is going to appear that I am not responsible for presenting to you. You will find it out there, at St. Germain des Prés, in a few days. You will see in it a certain number of features which will be particular to it in the first rank of which, the fact that apart from my own, for reasons that I shall explain, the articles in it are not signed. This fact astonished people and created a certain fuss, naturally, principally where it ought to have been grasped almost immediately. I mean among those who, up to now were the only ones to have been informed that this was the way the articles would appear. I mean not simply psychoanalysts, but, better still, people who are members of my School, who, because of that ought to have their ears a little alerted to what is said here. In any case, I hope that after what comes in the order of what I am teaching you, namely,, what I am going to say today, the explanation, the source of this admitted principle that the articles in it will not be signed will, perhaps, appear clearly. Since it seems that few people are capable of taking this little step forward, even though it is already indicated by the earlier approach.

The piquant thing is still that in the news report, it was specified that the fact that these articles were not signed did not mean that one would not know the authors. Because it was said that the aforesaid authors would appear in the form of a list at the end of each year. The term of unsigned article was immediately picked up, amplified by ears, anyway ... ears that are like seashells, from which there emerge singularly ridiculous things about what the function of anonymity is. I will spare you all the things that have been said in this connection. Because if I (162) communicated with some people about this, uniquely for instructional purposes, namely,, how one thing can be transformed into another. There is no worst deafness than when one does not wish to hear the first time. Others have gone further and in copious personal correspondence have pointed out to me the degree to which the visage of anonymity represented a way of using one's collaborators like employees. This is done, it appears, in certain journals that are perhaps not more badly placed because of that, in any case from the outside. This is how people allow themselves to describe the fact that in journals of critics in which it is not usual for the critic to put his name, they are only, it appears, employees of the management. In that case who knows how far the notion of employee can be taken! Anyway, I heard everything that can be heard, as I do every time that I have to get a response to an innovation.

An innovation of something important that is beginning to come to the fore today following the psychoanalytic act. Namely,, what results from that act as a position of the subject described as a psychoanalyst, precisely in so far as this predicate is to be affected to him. Namely,, his consecration as psychoanalyst. This, if the consequences of it that we see, as in the case I have just quoted for you, this would take the form of a sort of, of a sort of very obvious stunting of the faculty of comprehension. If this is demonstrated as being, in a way, included in the premises, as the consequence of what results from the inscription of the act, in what I called the consecration in a predicative form, it would greatly relieve us as regards the comprehension of this singular effect that I called stunting, without pushing any further what one can say about it at the level of the people involved. On occasion the term puerile is used, as if truly, in truth, one should refer to the child as regards what is at stake in its effects.

Naturally, it happens, as has been demonstrated in very good places, that children become mentally handicapped because of the action of adults. It is not all the same to this explanation that one can refer, in the case we are dealing with, namely, that of psychoanalysts. Let us take up again what is involved in the psychoanalytic act, and let us clearly posit that today we are going to try to advance in this direction, which is that of the psychoanalytic act.

Let us not forget the first steps that we have taken in explaining it, namely, that it (163) is essentially inscribed as a language effect. Assuredly, in this case, we were able to notice, or at least simply recall that this is how it is for every act, but of course this is not what specifies it. We have to develop what is involved in it, how the language effect in question is organised. It is in two stages. It presupposes psychoanalysis itself precisely as language effect. It is only definable, in other words, at least by including the psychoanalytic act as being defined by the accomplishment of psychoanalysis itself. We have shown that we have here to reduplicate the division. Namely,, that psychoanalysis cannot be instaured without an act, without the act of the one who authorises its possibility, without the act of the psychoanalyst. And that within this act of psychoanalysis, the psychoanalysing task is inscribed, within this act. I already made there appear in a way this first structure of envelopment.

But what is at stake, and, moreover, it is not the first time that I am insisting on this distinction at the very heart of the act, is the act through which a subject gives to this curious act, its strangest consequence. Namely, that he himself should be the one who institutes it, in other words that he posits himself as psychoanalyst. Now this does not happen without having to hold our attention. Because what is at stake is that he takes this position, that in short he repeats this act, knowing full well what is involved in the continuation of this act. That he makes himself the champion of something whose ending he knows. Namely, that by putting himself in the place of the analyst, he will finally come to be, in the form of the o, this rejected object, this object in which there is specified the whole movement of psychoanalysis. Namely, the one that comes at the end, by coming to the place of the psychoanalyst, in as much as here the subject separates himself off decisively, recognises himself as being caused by the object in question. Caused in what way? Caused in his division as subject. Namely, in so far as at the end of the psychoanalysis, he remains marked by this gap which is his own and which is defined in psychoanalysis in the shape of castration.

Here at least is the schema commented, summarised as I am making it for the moment, that I gave of the result, the effect of psychoanalysis. And I marked it on the board for you as represented by what happens at the end of the double movement of psychoanalysis marked in this line by transference, and by what is called castration, and which comes finally to this disjunction of (-) on the one hand and of the o which comes to the place at the end of the psychoanalysis.

(164) There is the psychoanalyst, through the operation of the psychoanalysand, an operation he authorised, in a way, knowing what its end is. And an operation whose culminating being he himself establishes, as I told you, despite, as one might say, the knowledge he has of what is involved in this end.

Here the opening remains agape, as one might say, about how this leap can operate, or again, as I did in a text which was a text meant as a proposition, to explore what is involved in this leap that I have called the pass (la passe). Until we have looked at it more closely, there is nothing more to be said about it, except that it is, very precisely, a leap. Naturally, many things are done, one could say that everything in the organisation of psychoanalysis is done to conceal that this leap is a leap. That is not all. On occasion people will even make a leap of it, on condition that there is a kind of blanket stretched over what has to be got over, which does not let it be seen that it is a leap. It is still the best case. It is, all the same better, than putting a little safe, convenient foot-bridge, which in that case no longer makes of it a leap at all.

But as long as the matter has not been effectively questioned, interrogated in analysis, and why wait any longer to say that my thesis is that every organising of what is done and exists in psychoanalysis is designed so that this exploration, this interrogation will not take place. As long as, effectively, it has not taken place, we cannot say anything more about it than what is said nowhere, because in truth it is impossible to speak about it all alone.

On the contrary, it is easy to designate a certain number of points, of things, as being, to all appearances, the consequences of the fact that this leap is put in parenthesis. Question for example what is involved in the effects, as I might say, not of official, but of officiale consecration, of consecration as office, of what a subject is before and after this leap is presumed to have been taken. Here indeed (165) is something that, after all, is worth questioning and which it is worthwhile making the questioning of more urgent. I mean that is not simply worth questioning but is the prelude to the response. The insistence, as one might say, of the question of whether it proves that in the very measure of the duration of what I called consecration in the office, something fundamental becomes opaque, about what is effectively involved in the necessary pre-supposition of the psychoanalytic act. Namely,, what I ended on the last time by designating it as being in its own way what we call an act of faith.

An act of faith, I said, in the subject supposed to know and precisely by a subject who has just learned what is involved in the subject supposed to know, at least in an exemplary operation, which is that of psychoanalysis. Namely,, I mean that far from psychoanalysis being able to be established as has been done up to now from the statements of a science, I mean, this moment at which what has been acquired from a science passes over to the state of being teachable, in other words professorial. What is stated from a science never puts in question what it was before the knowledge emerged. Who knew it? The matter, I ought to say, came into nobody's head, because it is so obvious that there was, beforehand, this subject supposed to know. The statements of science, in principle the most atheistic, is firmly theist on this point. For what else is this subject supposed to know, and in truth I know nothing serious that was put forward in this register, before psychoanalysis itself posed us the question. Namely, something that is properly speaking untenable. That the subject supposed to know pre-exists its operation, when this operation consists precisely in the sharing between its two partners of two terms of what is at stake as regards what is operating. Namely,, what I learned to articulate in the logic of phantasy. These two terms of $ and o, in as much as at the ideal end of psychoanalysis, the psychoanalysis that I would describe as finite, and note clearly that here I am leaving in parenthesis the accent this term may receive in its use in mathematics, namely, in set theory. Namely,, this step that is taken when what is at stake is a finite set, to the one where one can treat by means that are tested, inaugurated at the level of finite sets, a set which is not such.

Let us keep for the moment to the level of finite psychoanalysis and let us say that at the end the psychoanalysand, we are not going to say that he is all subject since precisely he is not all, because he is divided. We cannot say for all that that he is two, but that he is only a subject and that he is not this divided subject. That he is not without (pas sans), according to the formula to which I accustomed the few people who were listening to me when I was giving my seminar on Anxiety, that he is not without this object, finally rejected to the place prepared by the presence of the psychoanalyst, so that he can situate himself in this relation of cause of his division as subject. And that, on the other hand, we will not say either that the analyst, for his part, is all object, that he is nevertheless at the end simply this rejected object. It is indeed here that there lies some mystery or other that conceals, in short, what all practitioners know well. Namely, what is established at the level of human relations, as it is put, at the end, after the end, between the one who followed the path of psychoanalysis and the one who was "his guide".

The question of how someone can be recognised otherwise than along the very paths that he is sure of, namely,, recognised otherwise than by himself to be qualified for this operation, is a question, after all, which is not special to psychoanalysis.

It is solved habitually, as in psychoanalysis, by election or by a certain kind of choice. Seen from the point of perspective as we are trying to establish it, election or choice, all of that is resumed as being more or less of the same order, from the moment that this presupposes as being still intact, not put into question, the subject supposed to know. In the kinds of election that aristocrats declare to be the most stupid, namely,, democratic elections, I do not see why they should be any more stupid than the other, simply this supposes that the base, the member, the voter, knows something about it. It cannot depend on anything else. It is at his level that the subject supposed to know is put. As long as it is there, things are always very simple, especially from the moment that it is put in question. For if there is put in question, what one maintains nevertheless in a certain number of operations, it becomes much less important to know where it is put. And it is difficult to see in effect why it should not be put at the same level as everyone else.

That is why the Church has been for a long time the most democratic institution, namely, where everything happens through elections. It is because she, she has the Holy Spirit. The Holy Spirit is a notion that is infinitely less stupid than that of the subject supposed to know. There is only one difference, at this level to be put forward in favour of the subject supposed to know, it is that on the whole one (167) does not notice that the subject supposed to know is always there, so that one is not at fault in maintaining it.

It is from the moment that it can be put in question that one can raise categories like the one that I have, as a way of tickling your ears, brought out under the name which cannot naturally be in any way be sufficient, of stupidity (bêtise). It is not because one is obstinate that one is stupid. It is sometimes because one does not know what to do. As regards the Holy Spirit, I would point out to you that it is a much more elaborated concept, whose theory I am not going to develop, but as regards which it is all the same easy, for anyone who has reflected a little about what is involved in the function of the Christian Trinity, to find quite precise equivalents as compared to the functions that psychoanalysis allows to be elaborated. And especially those that I highlighted in one of my articles, the one on the questions preliminary to any possible treatment of psychosis, under the terms of the as regards which precisely it is not in a very tenable position, except in the categories of psychosis.

Let us leave there pointing, in a way, this detour which has its interest and let us come back one more time to the transference. But it is today very necessary to articulate the degree to which, since I introduced it as constituting the psychoanalytic act, the degree to which it is essential for the configuration as such of transference. Naturally, if one does not introduce into it the subject supposed to know, transference maintains all its opaqueness. But once the notion of the subject supposed to know is fundamental and the fracture that it undergoes in psychoanalysis is brought to light, transference is singularly illuminated. And this, of course, takes on all its value by taking a look back and noticing, for example, how every time transference is at stake, the authors, the good ones, the honest ones, evoke that the notion, the distance taken which permitted the instauration, in our theory of transference, goes back to nothing less than to the precise moment when as you know, when in emerging from a triumphant session of hypnosis, the patient, Freud tells us, threw her arms around his neck. There you are.

So then what is that? Naturally people stop and marvel. Namely,, that Freud was not very moved for all that. "She is taking me for someone else", people translate the way in which moreover Freud expressed himself. "I am not that unwidersetzlich, irresistible", there is something else. People marvel as if there were here, I mean at this level here, something to marvel at. It is perhaps not so (168) much that Freud, as he puts it, in his humorous way, did not believe himself to be the object in question. It is not because one believes oneself or not to be the object. It is that when this is what is at stake, namely, love, people think they know what they are at. In other words, people have this sort of complacency which, however little, gets you caught up in this treacle that is called love.

Because in fact, for the moment, people perform all kinds of operations, of arabesques around what must be thought about transference. We see some people showing courage and saying: but come on! Let us not reject the whole of transference onto the side of the analysand (analysé), as it is put. "We are involved in it too", and how! And we are involved in it and the analytic situation is also a little responsible for it. Starting from there comes a different kind of excess. The analytic situation determines everything. Outside the analytic situation there is no transference. Anyway you know the whole variety, the scale, the roundabout that emerges when each one is in rivalry to show a little more freedom of spirit than the others. There are very strange things also. There is a person who, like that, during one of the last congresses where we were dealing with things that were put in question during the meeting of the closed seminar here, was asking at what moment of the psychoanalytic act, I was going to link all of that to the passage à l'acte, to acting-out.

Of course I am going to do it. In truth, the person who best articulated this question is someone who, exceptionally, remembers what I was already able to articulate about it on a certain 23 January 1963. The author whose personality I began to introduce earlier is an author who, in connection with acting-out - no one properly speaking asked him to do it - gives on this subject a little class on transference. He gives this class on transference, which is modelled on this little article which, now, is spreading more and more. Things are articulated about

transference that would not even be conceived of if Lacans' discourse did not exist. Moreover, it is consecrated by demonstrating, for example, that a particular formulation that Lacan put forward in his report on The function and field of speech and language, namely, for example that the unconscious is this something which is lacking to discourse, that must in a way be supplied, completed in the history for the history to be re-established in its completeness, in order that, etc. the symptom should be removed. And naturally your man sniggers "Wouldn't it be lovely if that was how things were".

(169) Everyone knows that it is not because the hysteric remembers that everything is arranged. Moreover, that depends on the case, but what matter. People go on to show the degree to which what is at stake in the analytic discourse is more complex. And that it is necessary to distinguish something which is not only, it is said - believing they are taking up arms against me - the structure of the statement, but that it must also be known what use it is to know if one is telling the truth or not. And that sometimes to lie is properly speaking the way in which the subject announces the truth of his desire, since precisely there is no other angle from which to announce it than the lie.

It is something which, as you see, consists precisely in saying only things that I articulated in the most explicit way. If I mentioned earlier this seminar of the 23 January 1963, it is because it is exactly what I said about the function of a certain type of statement of the unconscious, in so far as the stating of desire which is involved is very properly that of the lie. Namely,, the point that Freud himself put his finger on in the case of the female homosexual. And that it is precisely thus that desire is expressed and is situated. And that what is advanced in this connection as being the register where analytic interpretation is played out in its originality, namely,, precisely what ensures that in no way is it possible in a kind of anteriority for there to have been known, what is revealed by the interpretative intervention. Namely,, what makes of transference, something quite different to the object already there, in a way inscribed in everything that it is going to produce. A pure and simple repetition of something which already, from previously, would only be waiting to express itself there, instead of being produced by its retroactive effect.

In short, everything that I have said for the last three years which it must not be believed, of course, does not make its own little way, like that, by absorption. And, in a second moment, remembering what I said ten years before and by making of the second part an objection to the first, in short, people easily arm themselves, on occasion, against what I am stating with what I may have stated after a certain number of stages, built up and shot through with what I am constructing to enable you to find your bearings in the analytic experience. And objections are made from what I said at a later date, as if they were inventing it themselves, to what I first said and which, of course, can be understood as partial, especially if it is isolated from its context. In short, what is involved in the effect of certain purely complementary interpretations of a particular piece of history at the level of the hysteric, was effectively specified by me as being extremely

(170) limited and absolutely not corresponding, since that very epoch when I articulated this too objectifying notion of history which would consist in taking the function of history otherwise than as the history constituted starting from present pre-occupations, namely, like every kind of existing history, and very specifically in my discourse described as the Rome discourse, I rather insistently put my foot in it on this point. Namely, that no kind of function of history can be articulated, can be understood, without the history of the history, namely, from what does the historian construct.

I am only making this remark about a statement which presents itself as a banality to designate this something which is not after all without a certain relation with what I called earlier the structure of what happens in connection with the step that has to be taken, the one that I am trying to get psychoanalysts to take. Namely, what results from the putting in question of the subject supposed to know. What results from it, namely, the style of exercising the question, the formulation of a logic which makes something manageable starting from the necessary revision at the level of this preliminary step, of this pre-supposition, of this pre-establishment of a subject supposed know, which can no longer be the same at least in a certain field. The one in which what is at stake is to know how we can handle knowledge, there, at a precise point of the field where what is at stake is not knowledge but something which, for us, is called truth.

To obtain this sort of answer where, precisely, my question can only be felt as most annoying, because the whole ordering of analysis is constructed to mask this question about the function to be revised of the subject supposed to know. This very precise type of answer which consists - for anyone who knows how to read - in a way that is purely fictitious, in decomposing two phases of my discourse in order of create an opposition between one and the other. Which is moreover quite impossible to find in most cases and which only results from the fiction which would have it that the author who is expressing himself is himself supposed to have discovered the second part. While I would be supposed to have limited myself to the first, to this rather derisory thing which does not fail to stick, if one can also say it here, it must be recognised where things are inserted in their reality, to what is involved at the very foundation of the question.

When I spoke about transference in order to bring it back to its simple and very miserable origin, and if I was able to speak in this connection, so badly, about the (171) terms of love, is it not because the difficulty of putting in question what transference constitutes is neither that it is love, as some people say, nor that it is not so as others are happy to advance. It is that it puts love, as I might say, puts love on the spot. And precisely in this derisory way, the one which allows us to see here, in this gesture of the hysteric coming out of the hypnotic capture, to see what is at stake in what is indeed here, at bottom, in what is affected. What is affected, first of all, is that through which I define what is involved in this thing, which is so rich and instructive and, in truth, new to the world which is called psychoanalysis.

The hysteric reaches the goal immediately. The Freud she is kissing is the o-object. Everyone knows that this is what a hysteric needs especially coming out of hypnosis. Things are in a certain way, as one might say, cleared away. Of course Freud, this indeed is the problem about him, how was he able to put in suspense in this radical way what is involved in love? We can perhaps be sure of it by mapping out what is strictly involved in the analytic operation.

The question is not there. Putting it in suspense allowed him to establish, from this original short circuit that he was able to lay out, to the point of giving it this excessive place of the analytic operation in which one discovers the whole human drama of desire. And in the end what? This immense acquisition is not nothing. The new field opened out onto what is involved in subjectification. In the end what? The same result which was reached in this brief instant, namely,, on the one side this $ symbolised by this moment of the emergence, this overwhelming moment of 'between two worlds' in awakening from a hypnotic sleep, and the o suddenly clasped in the arms of the hysteric. If the o for its part is so suitable, it is because it is what is at stake at the heart of the apparel of love. What is grasped there - I sufficiently articulated and illustrated it - it is around this o-object that there are installed, that there are established all the narcissistic coatings with which love is supported.

But the hysteric for her part, clearly knows here what she needs, I mean what necessitates this "I want and I do not want" at the same time, which proceed at the same time from the specificity of this object and from its intolerable rawness.

So that it is amusing incidentally to think that in making this whole construction of psychoanalysis, this Freud, up to the end of his life, asked himself, what does a woman want? Without finding the answer. Precisely that, what he had made, a psychoanalyst. At the level of the hysteric in any case, it is perfectly true. What (172) the psychoanalyst becomes at the end of the psychoanalysis, if it is true that he is reduced to this o-object, this is what the hysteric wants. One understands why, in psychoanalysis, the hysteric is cured of everything except her hysteria. This of course is only a marginal remark, in which you would be wrong to see a greater import than that on which it is quite simply inscribed.

But what must be known, is what in a recent fashion, I indeed was lead to say to make a certain number of those who hear these things, here, more sensitive. Is there not here in this expulsion of the o-object something which evokes for us (since the telly shows it to us) a little penchant that one might rather easily take by finding analogies between what we are operating on and something or other that might be found at the most abyssal levels in biology.

Biologists are happy to express chromosomic terms in terms of messages. Someone can come to the point, as I recently heard - because when there are stupidities to be said one can say that the opportunity is never missed - someone made this discovery that one could say that language is structured like the unconscious. People will like that, there are people who believed that one should go from the known to the unknown, but here off you go, huh? Let us go from the unknown to the known, that is often done, it is called occultism. It is what Freud called the taste for the mystisch Element. It is very precisely the reflection he made when the hysteric flung her arms around his neck. He speaks very precisely at this moment of the mystisch Element.

The whole sense of what Freud did, consists precisely in advancing in such a way that you go against the mystisch Element and do not start from it. Let us not forget that it is spoken about. And if Freud protests against the protestation, for it is exactly what he did, which arose around him the day he said that a dream is lying, he repeats at that moment that if people are indignant at the thought that the unconscious can be a liar it is because there is nothing to be done. Whatever I said about the dream, they will continue to want to maintain in it the mystisch Element, namely,, that the unconscious cannot lie.

Let this not prevent us from taking a little metaphor. Whether this o-object that has to be expelled at the end of analysis, which comes to take the place of the analyst, does not resemble something. You have not heard of that? The (173) expulsion of polar globules in meiosis. In other words, from what the sexual cells get rid of in their maturity. This, in short, would be elegant, this would be what is at stake. Thanks to which the comparison is pursued. What becomes then of castration? Castration is precisely that. It is the result, the reduced cell in a way. Starting from there the subjectification is carried out, which is going to allow them to be, what they say. God made them male or female. Castration is supposed to be truly the preparation for the connection of their enjoyments (jouissances).

From time to time, in the margins of psychoanalysis, this naturally does not involve any seriousness but in any case there are those who dream, this has counted. I am saying that. There is only one little misfortune, which is that we are at the level of the subjectification of this function of the man and the woman. And at the level of subjectification, it is qua o-object, this object to be expelled, that there is going to be presented in the real the one who is called to be the sexual partner. It is here that there lies the difference between the union of gametes and what is involved in the subjective realisation of the man and of the woman. Naturally, one can see all the female lunatics in the world precipitating themselves onto this level. In any case, thank God, in our field there are not too many of them. Those who are going to look for their references concerning some supposed obstacles of feminine sexuality in the fear of penetration which is supposed to be circumscribed at the level of the break that the spermatozoid makes into the capsule, into the envelope of the ovule. You see that it is not I who, for the first time, waves it in front of you. But so that we can distinguish ourselves from it, so that we can clearly mark in this connection the differences to supposedly biological phantasies.

When I say that it is in the o-object that there will subsequently always necessarily be rediscovered the sexual partner, we see arising a truth inscribed in a corner of Genesis. The fact that the partner, God knows that this does not involve her in any way, figured in the myth, as being Adam's rib, the o then.

That is why things have gone so badly since that time, at regards what is involved in this perfection which might be imagined as being union of two enjoyments. In truth I am sure of it. It is from this first simple recognition that there emerges the necessity of the medium, of the intermediary of the defiles constituted by the phantasy. Namely, this infinite complexity, this riches of desire, with all its tendencies, all its regions. This whole map, which can be drawn, all the effects at (174) the level of these slopes that we call neurotic, psychotic or perverse and which are inserted, precisely, in this distance forever established between the two enjoyments.

That is why it is strange that in the Church, where they are not so, not so stupid all the same, they should notice that here Freud is saying the same thing as what they are presumed to know to be the truth. Which obliges them, precisely to teach it. There is something that does not work on the side of sex. Otherwise what use is this stupefying technical network? Well then, not at all. Their preference in this area goes much more rather towards Jung, whose position it is clear is exactly the opposite. Namely,, that we enter into the sphere of Gnosis, namely,, the obligatory complementarity of the Ying and the Yang and of all the signs that you see turning around one another. As if, from all time, they were there to connect up with one another, animus and anima, the complete essence of the male and the female.

I am opening the question as to whether it is not precisely because of that. If we were in the truth like them, what would happen to their magisterium? I am not giving myself over to vain excesses of language simply for the pleasure of going for an uncomfortable stroll in the field of what is called aggiornamento. Because, of course, these are remarks that, at the point at which we are at, I can go as far as to make them to the Holy Office. I went there not long ago, they were very interested in what I told them. I did not push the question to the point of saying to them, is it because it is the truth that you do not like it? The truth that you know to be the truth? I gave them time to become accustomed to it.

If I am only speaking to you about it here, why is that? It is to tell you that what is perhaps so annoying at the level of power in certain areas, where there is a little more bottle than among us, can be something of the same order. What can happen at the level of this something, of this kind of bizarre Principality of Monaco of the Truth called the International Psychoanalytic Association. There can be effects of the same order. To know exactly what is happening is not always easy. All the more so because, when all is said and done, we for our part can dot the i's for a certain number of things. Namely,, that the analytic adventure, as long as it allows things to be articulated, very precisely in the whole field of the (175) unconscious of human desire, perhaps contributes something which renews what was beginning to be put forward on a certain slope of cretinisation, such as the one accompanied by the idea of obligatory progress, the seed of science. You have to see where this renewal of the truth is situated. If this is how the analytic experience is defined, by instauring its defiles, this formidable production which is installed where? In a gap that is not at all constituted by castration itself, of which castration is the sign, the most accurate tempering, the most elegant solution. But it nevertheless remains that we know very well that enjoyment, for its part, remains outside. We do not know a single word more about what is involved in feminine enjoyment. It is not a question that dates from yesterday, all the same. There was already a certain Jupiter, for example, this subject supposed to know, well then, he did not know that, he asked Tiresias. An extraordinary thing, Tiresias knew something more about it. He only made one mistake, which was to say it. At that, as you know, he lost his sight.

You see that these things have been inscribed for a long time, in truth, in the margins of a certain human tradition. In any case it would be worth our while, perhaps, to notice in order to understand properly, this moreover is what renders legitimate our intrusion of logic into what is at stake in the psychoanalytic act. It is, moreover, what is here able to encompass our bubble. It is certainly not reducing it to nothing to describe it as a bubble if it is there that there is situated everything that happens which is sensible, intelligible and also even senseless. But in any case it would be worth our while knowing where things are situated, for example, as regards what is involved in feminine enjoyment. There it is quite clear that it is left completely out of consideration.

Why am I talking to you first of all about feminine enjoyment? It is perhaps to already specify something that the subject supposed to know that we are dealing with - some people, we must not deceive ourselves about it, may believe with all the confusion that is being produced that we are somewhere on the side of the subject supposed to know - how one goes to enjoyment! I call on all psychoanalysts, those who all the same know what we are talking about and what can be aimed at, reached. We clear the ground in front of the door, but as regards the door, I believe that we are not very competent.

After a very good analysis, let us say that a woman can find her feet. All the same, if there is a little advantage won, it is very precisely in the measure and in (176) the case that, just before, she might have taken herself for the mentioned earlier. Because, in that case of course, she is frigid.

There is not only that. Freud noted that when what is at stake is the libido as he defined it, namely, the field that is at stake in psychoanalysis, the libido desires, there is only the masculine sort, he tells us. This ought to make us prick up our ears and show us precisely, even though I already stressed it, that the operation and what is at stake is the relation of subjectification concerning the sex thing. But in as much as this subjectification culminates in the relation logically defined by $ o, in which case everyone is equal.

As regards the libido, it can be qualified as masculine or feminine, as you wish. It is quite clear that what makes us think that it is rather masculine, is that, from the side of enjoyment, as regards the man, this means again going back much further, since feminine enjoyment, we still have it there from time to time within reach of what you know. But for masculine enjoyment, at least as regards analytic experience, it is a strange thing, no one has ever seemed to notice that it is very precisely reduced to the Oedipus myth.

Only there you are. Ever since I have been killing myself in saying that the unconscious is structured like a language, no one has yet noticed that the original myth, that of Totem and Taboo, the Oedipus complex in a word, is perhaps an original drama, but it is an aphasic drama. The Father enjoys all the women, such is the essence of the Oedipus myth, I mean from Freud's pen. There are some for whom that does not work. It is botched or it is eaten. It has nothing to do with any drama. If psychoanalysts were more serious, instead of spending their time fiddling around in Agamemnon and Oedipus to draw something or other out of them, always the same thing, they could begin by making this remark. That what is to be explained is why precisely this should have turned into a tragedy. But there is something much more important to be still explained: why psychoanalysts have never explicitly formulated that the Oedipus complex is only a myth thanks to which they put in place the limits of their operations. It is so important to say it. This is what allows there to be put in its place what is involved in psychoanalytic treatment, within this mythical framework destined to contain in an outside already within, from which there is going to be able to be put the realised division from which I started. Namely, that at the end of the analytic act, there is on the stage, this stage which is structuring, but only at this level, the o, at (177) this extreme point that we know to be at the end of the destiny of the hero of tragedy. He is no longer any more than that. And everything that is of the order of subject is at the level of this something which has this divided character that exists between the spectator and the choir.

It is not a reason, but this is what is to be looked at closely, since this Oedipus has come one day onto the stage so that we do not see that its economic role in psychoanalysis is elsewhere. Namely,, this putting in suspense of these enemy poles of enjoyment, male enjoyment and the enjoyment of the woman.

Assuredly, in this strange division which already escapes, we notice what, in my sense already truly throws into relief the difference between the function of the myth of Oedipus, namely, the father of the primordial horde, who has no right to be called Oedipus, as you see, and the usage imaged on the stage when Freud recognises him, transposes him, and brings him into play on the stage, whether it is the Sophoclean stage or that of Shakespeare. This is what allows us to create the distance between what really operates in psychoanalysis and what does not operate in it.
To be complete, and before continuing, I would add that you will note that there is in Freud's text a third term, that of Moses and monotheism. Freud does not hesitate in this third case, any more than in the first two which have no resemblance, to claim to make function there, still in the same way, the Father and his murder. Ought this not begin to awaken in you some little suggestions? By doing nothing more than bringing up such a question and especially about the obvious tripartition of the function summarised as Oedipal in Freudian theory, and that not the least little beginning of a development at the true level of what is at stake, nothing has yet been done and specifically not by me. You know why.

I had prepared it by the analysis in my seminar on the Name of the Father, everything having proved at that moment that it was not by chance that it happened like that. If I began to enter into this field, let us say that they appeared to me to be a little fragile. I am speaking about those interested in this and who have quite enough of their psychoanalytic field that we now see defined as being in no way something which, in any way, can claim to take the stage again, either of tragedy or of the Oedipal circuit.

(178) What are we doing in analysis? We notice failures, differences, with respect to something that we know nothing about, to a myth, to something which allows us to put order on our observations. We are not going to say that we are in the process, in psychoanalysis, of doing anything whatsoever to mature a so-called pre-genital. Quite the contrary, since it is by regression that we advance into the fields of prematurity. Just as it leaps to the eye, like anyone who is not absolutely caught up by the things to which we must come, by women who are assuredly in psychoanalysis those who are most efficacious, in certain cases the least stupid, by women, by Melanie Klein. What do we do? We notice that it is precisely at the pre-genital levels that we have to recognise the function of the Oedipus complex. It is in this that psychoanalysis essentially consists.

Consequently, there is no Oedipal experience in psychoanalysis. The Oedipus complex is the frame in which we can regulate the game. I am intentionally saying the game. It is a matter of knowing what game one is playing. That is why I try to introduce here a little logic. It is not usual to begin playing poker, and to say all of a sudden, oh, excuse me, I have been playing manille for the last five minutes. That is not done, especially in mathematics. That is why I am trying to take some reference points from it.

I am not going to detain you any longer today, especially as in this respect we are in no hurry. I do not see why I should make the cut here or there, I will do it according to the time. I am going to posit important elements in terms of logic, why? Because in all of science - I am giving you this new definition of it - logic is defined as this something that properly has as end to resorb the problem of the subject supposed to know.

In it alone, at least in the modern logic from which we are going to start the next time when it will be a matter precisely of posing the logical question, namely,, of these literal figures thanks to which we can progress in these problems, by

figuring in them in literal terms, in terms of logical algebra, how there is posed the question of what "a psychoanalyst exists" means in terms of quantification.

We will be able to make progress where up to the present people have been able to do nothing except something as obscure, as absurd as ratification of a (179) qualification of everything that has ever been done elsewhere and that I evoked earlier, and which, here precisely, by following an experience that is so particularly serious concerning the subject supposed to know, takes on an aspect, an accent, a form, a value of relapsing which precipitates in it such dangerous consequences. Consequences which can figure in an implacable and as it were tangible way, by simply supporting them by these traits, these units, these figures, these propositions of modern logic. I am speaking about the one that introduced what I already announced in a word. I already emitted the word quantifiers.

Well then, if this is of service to us, you should know that it is precisely in function of what I put forward earlier, a definition which, certainly, was never given by any logician, because he is a logician, because this dimension was always for them resorbed, conjured away. They do not notice - everyone has his black spot - that the function of logic is the following. That there should be duly resorbed, conjured away the question of the subject supposed to know. In logic, this is not posed. There is absolutely no kind of doubt that before the birth of modern logic there was very certainly no one who had the slightest idea of it. Within logic, I am not going to prove it to you today, but it would be easy to do so, in any case I am proposing its trace and its indication, it could be the object of an elegant work, more elegant than I would be able to do myself, on the part of a logician, what grounds and legitimates the existence of logic, is this minute point. Very precisely, when the field is defined in which the subject supposed to know is nothing.

It is precisely because it is nothing there, and that moreover it is fallacious, that we are between the two, finding support on logic on the one hand, on our experience on the other. We can at least introduce a question which it is not sure - the worst, as Claudel says, is not always sure - is ever without an effect on psychoanalysts.

Seminar 11: Wednesday 28 February 1968

(181) Someone who had already been alerted the last time through the good offices of Mr Charles Melman, who was kind enough the last time to take this place for the closed seminar at the end of January, found himself solicited by him and in a way that is all the more legitimate in that Jacques Nassif, who is the person in question, was good enough to produce, for the Bulletin de l'Ecole Freudienne, a summary of my seminar of last year, that on The logic of phantasy. He was good enough to answer this call which consisted in asking him if he did not have something to say or to question, or to present, which gives an idea of the way in which he understands the point that we have got to this year.

I am very grateful to him for having been willing to give this answer, namely, for preparing something which is going to serve as an introduction to what is going to be said today.

I can say already the sense in which this brings me satisfaction. First of all, for the pure and simple fact that he has prepared this work, that he has prepared it in a competent fashion, being perfectly au fait with what I said last year. And then it happens that what he extracted from this work, I mean what he highlighted, what he isolated with respect to the content of what I said last year, is properly speaking the logical network. And above all its importance, its accent, its meaning in what is, perhaps, defined, indicated as the orientation of my discourse, indeed its perspective, its end, to say the word.

That we should be precisely at the point at which, in this development, this question that I am posing about the analytic act which presents itself as something (182) that profoundly implicates each one of those who are listening to me here as analysts. We are coming precisely to the point at which I am going to put a still stronger stress than has been put up to now, precisely, in order not, simply, on this something which might be understood in a certain way as: "there is a logic in everything". No one knows very clearly what it means to say that there is an internal logic to something. Here one would be simply looking for the logic of the thing, namely, that the term "logic" would be here put to use in fashion that is in a way metaphorical. No, it is not quite to that we are coming. And the last time, at the end of my discourse, there was an indication of it in this certainly audacious affirmation, to which I do not expect in advance to find an echo, a resonance. I hope, at least, for the sympathetic ear of one or other of those that I may have in my audience, who are here present as logicians. Anyway, what I indicated is that that there ought to be (and, of course, I hope to show that I am in

Seminar 12: Wednesday 6 March 1968

P	Je ne connais pas tout
		de la poésie
U	J'ignore tout
P	I don't know everything about poetry
U	I don't know anything

I wrote "Je ne connais pas" and "J'ignore". I am confronting this "Je ne connais pas" and this "J'ignore" with something that is going to serve me as a foundation: "about poetry".

For greater rigour, I am saying that I posit that "je ne connais pas" is equivalent to "j'ignore". I admit, I accept that negation is included in the term "j'ignore". Of course, another time, I could return to ignosco and to what it indicates very precisely in the Latin tongue from which it comes to us. But logically I am positing today that these two terms are equivalent. It is starting from this supposition that what follows is going to takes its value.

I am writing the word tout, twice. They are indeed equivalent. What results from this? That, from the twice-repeated introduction of this identical term at these two levels, I obtain two propositions of essentially different value. It is not the same thing to say "I don't know everything about poetry" and "I don't know anything about poetry". Between one and the other there is the distance - I am saying it immediately to clarify, since it is necessary, where I want to get to, it is to the signifying distinction, I mean in so far as it can be determined by signifying procedures - between what is called a universal proposition, to express it like (210) Aristotle, and, moreover, also like everything that has been prorogued in logic ever since, and a particular proposition.

Where then is the mystery if these signifiers are equivalent term by term. Let us say that here we have posited it by convention, I repeat, it is only a scruple about the etymology of j'ignore. J'ignore means well and truly what it means on this occasion: je ne sais pas, je ne connais pas. How does that end up with two propositions, one of which is presented clearly as referring to a particular of this field of poetry (there are some things within it that I do not know; I do not know everything about poetry) and this well and truly universal, even though negative proposition: I know nothing about anything that belongs to the field of poetry, I don't have a clue (which is the case in general).

Are we going to stop at this which, immediately, introduces us into the specificity of a positive tongue, into the particular existence of French which, as very learned people have put it in their time, presents a duplicity in the terms negation is supported by. Namely, that the ne which seems to be the sufficient support, (adjunctive, as they say) necessary and sufficient for the negative function, is supported, in appearance is reinforced, but perhaps after all is complicated, by this adjunction of a term which only the usage of the tongue allows us to see what it is for. On this, someone that I can only quote in the margin, namely, a psychoanalytic colleague and eminent grammarian named Pichon, in the work on French grammar that he excogitated with his uncle Damourette, introduced some very pretty considerations, in accordance with his method and procedure, concerning what he calls the rather discordant function of the ne and the rather foreclusive one of the pas. About this he said things that were very subtle and packed with all sorts of examples taken at every level and very well chosen without, I think, being on the axis which, at least for us, may be truly important.

How this importance is determined for us, is what I shall make you understand later, at least I hope so, and for the moment by referring myself to this specificity of the French tongue. I only want to take the support of this something that must indeed also happen elsewhere, if it happens in our tongue. The fact is - for example - one could raise the following. If the result of this statement depended, for example, on the fact that we can group together the pas tout, in which case the sense of the sentence would return, rendering superfluous, in a way, allowing (211) there to be elided, as happens in familiar conversation (I am not saying to suppress, to elide, to swallow) the ne. J'connais pas tout with pas tout together, would be the non-separability of negation, that we can describe as included in the term of j'ignore, and which would here be the source of it, and everyone would be happy. I do not see why one should not be satisfied with this explanation if all that were involved, of course, was to solve this little riddle. It is funny but anyway this does not perhaps go so far as its seems to.

Yes, it goes further, as we are going to try to demonstrate by referring to another tongue, the English tongue, for example.

Let us try to start from something that corresponds in meaning to the first sentence:

I don't know everything about poetry, and the other sentence:

I don't know anything about poetry.

What is nevertheless going to appear to us, in considering things expressed in this other tongue, is that, although producing these two meanings equivalent to the distance between the first two, the explanation that we evoked earlier of the blocking together of two signifiers is going to find itself necessarily inverted. Because this blocking of the pas with the term tout in the first example is realised here - at the signifying level I mean - in what corresponds to the second articulation, the second proposition, the one we have qualified as universal.

"Anything", as everyone knows, is there in effect as the equivalent of "something", something which is transformed into "anything" in the measure that is intervenes as negative.

Consequently, our first explanation is not fully satisfying, since it is by something completely opposite, it is by a blocking carried out in the second sentence, the one which realises the universal on this occasion, that there is produced this blocking, this equally ambiguous detaching moreover, the don't not disappearing for all that, to obtain this sense, I am completely out of it as regards poetry.

On the contrary it is where "everything" is joined to "I don't know" that the first sense is realised. This is well designed to make us reflect on something that (212) involves nothing less than - as I told you already, showing my hand - what is involved in the mystery of the relations between the universal and the particular.

We will try later to say what was the fundamental preoccupation of the one who introduced this distinction into history, namely, Aristotle.

Everyone knows that, on the subject of the angle from which these two registers of the statement should be taken, a little revolution of the spirit occurred, one that I already pinpointed on several occasions as the introduction of quantifiers.

There are perhaps some people here - I would like to suppose it - for whom it is not simply something that tickles their ears. But there must also be many for whom it is truly only the announcement that I made that at a given moment I would speak about it and - God knows how - I am going to have to talk to you about it from the point where it interests us, the point that I am at, the point then where it seemed to me it could be of use to us. Namely, that I cannot give you its whole history, all its antecedents, how it arose, it emerged, it was perfected and how (when all is said and done, this is what I have to limited myself to) it is thought of by those who make us of it. How can one know that? Because it is not at all certain that because they make use of it, they think about it, I mean that they situate in any way what their way of using it implies in thinking.

So then, I am going to be forced to start from the way in which I for my part think about it, at the level that I think interests you, namely, at the level where this can, be of some use to us.

In Aristotle, everything depends on something that is designated as a sign, which he believes he can allow himself. He allows himself to operate in this way,

namely, that if he said that every man is an animal, he can for any useful purpose, if this appears to him to be of some use, extract from it: some man is an animal.

This is what we will call - it is not quite the term that he uses - since what is at stake is a relation that has been qualified as subalternate between the universal and the particular, an operation of subalternation.

I will probably have to make some remark more than once regarding the fact, the way that "man" is dinned into our ears in the examples, the illustrations the logicians give to their developments, which is certainly not without a (213) symptomatic value. We can begin to be sure of it in the whole measure that we have made the remark that we perhaps do not know as well as all that what man is. Anyway this would take us ...

The question of whether two sets, as is said in our day, can have something in common is a grave question which is in the process of involving a whole revision of mathematical theory. Because after all, we might very well, from the beginning, and without making vain gestures, I dare to say it, like those of our friend Michel Foucault performing the last rites for a humanism, so long dead that it has gone down the river without anyone knowing where it has got to, as if it were still a question and as if it was what was essential about structuralism. Let us pass on ... Let us say simply that, logically, we can only retain the fact that all that is important for us is whether we are talking about the same thing when we say - I mean logically - every man is an animal, or, for example, every man speaks. The question of whether two sets, I repeat, can have a common element, is a question that is very seriously raised in as much as it raises the following. Namely, what is involved in the element, if the element itself can only be - it is the foundation of set theory - something in connection with which you can speculate exactly as if it were a set. This is where the question begins to arise, but let us leave it.

You know that the fatherland is at once the most beautiful reality, and that of course it is self-evident that every Frenchman ought to die for it. But it is from the moment that you subalternate to know whether some Frenchmen ought to die for it that it seems to me that you ought to notice that the operation of subalternation presents some difficulties. Since every Frenchman ought to die for it and some Frenchman ought to die for it, is not at all the same thing! These are things that you see every day.

This is when you notice the amount of ontology, namely, something a little more than was his intention in constructing a logic, a formal logic, how much ontology his logic still brings with it.

I am avoiding, I assure you, many digressions. I do not want you to lose my thread ...

(214) Here I am going to introduce right away by an opposition process that is obviously a little decisive. I am happy, perhaps wrongly, but usually there is an eminent logician here in the first row. I always keep the corner of my eye on him to see when he is going to start shouting. He is not there today, I do not believe I see him. On the one hand that reassures me, on the other hand it annoys me. I would like to have known what he would say to me about it at the end. Normally he shakes my hand and tells me that he is in complete agreement, which always does me a lot of good. Not at all because I need him to say it to know naturally where I am going, but everyone knows that when you venture onto a terrain which is not your own, properly speaking, you are always at the risk of - bang bang! Now for my part, of course, it is not encroaching onto terrain that is not my own that is important to me. It is to find, in logic, something that would be for you an example, a thread, an exemplary guide in the difficulties we have to deal with. We, those in the name of whom I am speaking, those also to whom I am speaking - and this ambiguity is here quite essential – namely, the psychoanalysts with respect to an action which concerns nothing less and nothing other than what I tried to define for you as "the subject". The subject is not man. If there are people who do not know what man is they are indeed the psychoanalysts. It is even their merit to put him radically in question, I mean qua man, in as much as this word has even still an appearance of sense for anyone.

So then I pass to the logic of quantifiers. And I allow myself, with this bulldozer approach that I use from time to time, to indicate that the radical difference in the way of opposing universal to particular, in the logic of quantifiers, resides in the fact (naturally, when you open books on it, you will find your bearings again with what I am telling you, you will of course see that it can be tackled in a thousand different ways, but the essential, is that you should see that this is the principal thread, at least for what interests us) that the universal, at least the affirmative one, must be stated as follows. "There is no man who is not wise" (pas d'homme qui ne soit sage).

There you are, believe it from me at least for a moment. The important thing is that you are able to follow the thread to see where I want to get to, which gives the formula of the universal negative. Namely, what in Aristotle, might be articulated as: All men are wise, a reassuring statement that on this occasion, (215) moreover, is of no importance. What is important to us, is to see the advantage that we may find in articulating this statement differently.

Here, right away, you can note that this universal affirmative will bring into play to support itself nothing less than two negations. It is important for you to see the order in which things are going to be presented. Let us put on the left the Aristotelian forms, the universal affirmative and negative. It is the letters A and E which designate them among Aristotle's posterity, and the letters I and O are the particulars, I being the particular affirmative (all men are wise, some man is wise).

How, in our quantifying articulation, is some man is wise going to be expressed?

I had said first of all there is no man who is not wise. Now we articulate there is a man who is wise or man who is wise. But we will support this man, who might remain suspended in thin air, as it is appropriate, with a he is, just as no man who is not wise is there is no man who is not wise, il n'est homme qui ne soit sage.

But you also see that there is no longer a ne, in is not wise. This is how it has to be for who is wise to have a meaning. Or, if you again want to articulate there is a man such that he is wise, this such that is not excessive because you can also put it at the level of the universal: there is no man such that he is not wise. So then, to give the equivalent of our Aristotelian subalternation we had to efface two negations. This is very interesting. Because first of all we can see that a certain use of the double negation is not meant to be resolved into an affirmation, but precisely to allow - according to the sense in which this double negation is used, whether it is added or removed - to assure, the passage from the universal to the particular.

This is striking and makes us ask ourselves what indeed must be said for us to be able, in certain cases, to assimilate the double negation to a return to zero. (216) Namely, what existed in terms of affirmation at the start, and in other cases with this result.

But let us continue to interest ourselves in the property presented by the function we started from, that we have pinpointed, because it is correct, because this is what it corresponds to the quantifying operation. Let us only remove one negation, the first one: there is a man such that he is not wise. There also, I particularise, and in a fashion that corresponds to the particular negative. It is what Aristotle would call some men are not wise - no longer of subalternation but of the opposite subalternation which is diagonal, the opposition between A and O, from all men are wise to some men are not wise - this is what he calls "contradictory".

The use of the word contradiction interests us, us analysts. All the more so because, as Mr. Nassif recalled at the last closed seminar, it is an altogether essential point for psychoanalysts that Freud once threw out for them this assuredly primary truth that the unconscious does not know contradiction.

The only inconvenience -you never know the fruits borne by what you announce as a truth, especially a primary one - is that this had as a consequence that psychoanalysts, from that moment on, thought they were on holidays, as I might say, with respect to contradiction. They thought that this at once allowed them to know nothing about it, namely, not to be interested in it in the slightest.

It is a consequence that is obviously excessive. It is not because the unconscious, even if it were true, does not know contradiction that psychoanalysts should not have to know it, even if it were only to know why it does not know it, for example!

Anyway, let us remark that "contradiction" deserves a more attentive examination which, of course, logicians have carried out a long time ago. And that it is something quite different to speak about contradiction in the principle of contradiction, namely, that A cannot be not-A from the same point of view and at the same place, and the fact that our particular negative is not contradictory here. It is true that it is. But you see from the angle there is a man such that he is not wise, I am only raising it, with respect to the formula which served us as a point of departure, founded on the double negation, I am only raising it to the position of an exception.

(217) Of course the exception does not confirm the rule, contrary to what is usually said and which suits everyone. It simply reduces it to the value of a rule without a necessary value. Namely, it reduces it to the value of rule. That is even the definition of the rule.

So then you begin to see the degree to which these things can be of interest to us. I am appealing here to my psychoanalytic audience a little in order to allow it not to be bored. You see the interest of these articulations that allow us to nuance things as interesting as the following, for example. It is not the same thing to say (this is why I made this distinction at the level of contradiction) man is non-woman - here, of course, we will be told that the unconscious does not know contradiction - but it is not quite the same as to say (universal) there is no man (we are dealing with the subject, of course) who does not rule out the feminine position, the woman, or (the state of exception and no longer of contradiction) there is a man who does not rule out the woman.

This may show you, however, something manageable and designed to show the interest of these logical researches, even when the psychoanalyst believes himself (a thing which well deserves, with time, to be called obedience) obliged to have his gaze fixed on the horizon of the pre-verbal.

Let us continue, for our part, on the contrary, our little path of conducting an experiment.

There is a man such that he is not wise, I have said. You have been able to note that we have been able, up to the present, to do without the "pas". Let us try to see what that is going to give. There is a man such that he is - for example - not wise. There is no problem about this, it means the same thing. There are still some who are not wise.

Let us be careful. This not wise may well serve us as a passage to something a little unexpected.

If we restore the "ne" it still works. There is a man such that he is not wise (ne soit pas sage)", that will still work.

Let us come then to the not wise and let us come back in the diagonal to the A, the universal affirmative of Aristotle being the quantifying locution: there is no man such that he is not not wise (pas d'homme tel qu'il ne soit pas sage). The fact is that this gives a funny sense, all of a sudden. It is the universal negative: they are all not wise.

What could have occurred? This added not, which was perfectly tolerable at (218) the level of the particular negative, here if we put it into what previously was the universal affirmative, which appeared altogether designed to tolerate it just as well, with this not, it swerves towards blackness and towards some colour or other at E in the Rimbaud's sonnet. But at the Aristotelian level, it is black, it is the universal negative: all of them are not wise.

I am going to tell you right away the lesson we are going to take from this. It is obviously something which makes us put our finger on the fact that the relation of the two ne, as it exists in the fundamental structure of the quantified universal affirmative, which is this formula, there is nothing which does not, has something which suffices in itself. And we have the proof of it in the liberation of this pas which all of a sudden, while inoffensive elsewhere, here makes one universal turn into the other.

This is what allows us to advance and to affirm that the distinction of the quantifying operation, when we give it its rectifying (rectrice) function, a normal function of logical operation, is distinguished from the logic of Aristotle by the following. It substitutes - at the place where the ousia, the essence, the ontological is not eliminated, at the place of the grammatical subject - the subject that interests us qua divided subject. Namely, the pure and simple division as such of the subject in so far as he speaks, of the stating subject qua distinct from the subject of the statement.

The unit in which this presence of the divided subject is presented, is nothing other than this conjunction of two negations. This, moreover, is what justifies that to present it to you, to articulate it before you, whether you have noticed it or not - but it is time to notice it - things would not work without using a subjunctive. There is nothing which is not (qui ne soit) wise or not wise, the thing is of little importance. It is this soit which marks the dimension of this slippage from what happens between these two ne and which is precisely where there is going to operate the distance which always subsists between stating and stated. It is therefore not for nothing that in giving you, a few sessions ago, the first example of what is involved in Pierce's formulation, I well and truly pointed out to you that, in this exemplification that I showed you of these little lines divided, well chosen, in four boxes, what constituted the veritable subject of every universal, is essentially the subject in so far as he is essentially and fundamentally this no subject (pas de sujet) which is already articulated in our (219) way of introducing it: no man who is not wise.

It is difficult to stay on this cutting edge. The theory, of course, is very exactly constructed to eliminate it. I mean that what interests us, is that the theory of quantifiers, if we articulate it, forces us to uncover in it this relief and this irreducible flight. Which means that we do not know where there is slipped in the properly instituting core of what only seems to be at first repeated negation, and is, on the contrary, creative negation, in so far as it is from it that there is instaured the only thing which is truly worthy of being articulated in knowledge. Namely, the universal affirmative, what is valid everywhere and in every case. This alone interests us.

This is how you will see there being formulated from the pen of the logicians of quantification that we can treat as equivalent what is expressed by a ∀, namely, the universal value of a written proposition such as ∀x, F(x), we must write in algebraic terms of symbolic logic. Namely, that this universal truth is valid for every x, that x functions in the function F(x), namely, - for example - on this occasion the function of being wise, and that man will be an x which will be always at its place in this function.

The transformation which is acceptable in the theory of quantifiers is represented as follows: by -∃x, this ∃ being the symbol that specifies quantification for us, the existence of an x, of a value of x such that it satisfies the function F(x). And we will be told that x, F(x) can be expressed by a -∃x. Namely, that no x exists that is such that it explodes the function F(x). -∃x-F(x). In brief, that the conjunction of these two minus signs (and it is indeed something which is found to overlap the articulated, nuanced language form under which I put it forward to you) is enough to symbolise the same thing. It is not true at all. For it is quite clear that even though it is a minus in logical symbolisation, these two minuses do not have the same value. There exists no x which, I was lead to tell you, explodes, namely, renders false this function F(x). I symbolised these two terms. That of non-existence and that of the effect, which end up with the falsity of the function, are not of the same order. But this is precisely what is at stake. It is to mask something that is precisely the fissure and is altogether essential for us to determine and to fix in its plane, which is the distance between the stating subject (220) and the subject of the statement. I will again point this out to you, for example, in connection with another way, among other authors, of giving to the function an image that is more manageable at the level of its properly predicative application. For, in truth, F(x) can designate all kinds of things, including all kinds of mathematical formulae that you can apply to it. It is the most general formula.

On the contrary, if you want to remain at the level of my all men are wise, here is the formula: ($\bar{m}$ V w), with the sign of disjunction V that I already put on the board the last time. A formula to which, according to the logicians who introduced quantification, it would be enough to add the $\forall$ of pan to make of it the universal or particular proposition:$\forall$ ($\bar{m}$ V w) and which means, in short, that what we are dealing with is the disjunction between no man and this w. This means that if we choose the contrary of no man, namely, man, we have the disjunction: he is wise, either in every case, or in certain particular cases.

If we take the negation of wise, namely, if we renounce wise, we are at the other side of the disjunction, namely, on the side of no man. This can still work, up to this point.

But this in no way implies the requirement of not wise for what is not man. Now this is not indicated in the formula. For this it is necessary that the disjunction should be marked, for example, like that,$\exists$ ($\bar{m}$ V w), a sign then which would be the inverse of the one of the square root. This is designed to show us that with respect to implication, if we know here, in short, at the level of the universal that man implies wise, that not wise, certainly, does not imply no man. But that wise is perfectly, for its part also, with no man. Namely, that there can be something other than man who is wise is elided in the way of presenting quite crudely the formula of disjunction, between a subject which is negated and the predicate which is not.

A point, also, which demonstrates something that, in the system described as that of double negation, to express oneself in this script (scription) of Mitchell, always allows to escape this something which, this time, far from suturing the fissure, leaves it gaping without knowing it. A confirmation that it is the fissure that is always at stake.

In other words, what is at stake, as regards logic, I mean formal, is always this. What can be drawn, and up to what point, from a statement, namely, to get a (221) reliable statement. It is indeed from there also that Aristotle started.

Aristotle, of course, let us not say that he was at the dawn of thinking, because what is proper to thinking is precisely never to have had a dawn. It was already very old and it knew something. In particular it knew that of course there would be no question of knowing, if there were no language. That is not enough, of course, because knowledge does not depend only on language. But what was important for it, was to know precisely - because thinking did not date from yesterday - what could make of a stating, something necessary. There is no way of yielding on this point. The first ananke is the ananke of discourse.

The formal logic of Aristotle was the first step in knowing what properly and distinguished as such, at the level of the statement, could be formulated as giving this source - which does not mean that it was the only one, of course - its necessity for stating. Namely, that here there is no way of retreating. Moreover, it is the sense that the term episteme had at that time, it is that of a stating about the distinction between episteme and doxa is nothing other than a distinction situated at the level of discourse.

It is the difference between what is for us science, to go in the same direction, namely, between a strictly reliable statement, and indeed it is certain for us, who have made some original contributions to what is involved in the statement, and in fact in no other place than in mathematics. These laws of the statement, to be reliable, have become, still become every day more and more exigent and, in this respect, do not fail to show their limits. I mean that it is in the whole measure that we have taken, in logic, some steps, among which of course is the one that I am presenting to you here. But it is the original step, that interests us. Why? Because we analysts find ourselves beyond this attempt at capturing stating by the networks of the statement. But what luck that the work has been pushed so far elsewhere, if through this there are given to us some rules to carefully map out the fissure.

When I state that the unconscious is structured like a language, that does not mean that I know it, since, what I completed it with, is properly this one (on) on which I put the emphasis and which is the one which gives vertigo to all the (222) psychoanalysts. The fact is that one knows nothing about it. One, the subject supposed to know, the one who must always be there to make us comfortable.

If I state it, therefore, it is not because I know it, it is because my discourse, in effect, organises the unconscious. I am saying that the only discourse that we have about the unconscious, that of Freud, makes sense. This certainly is not what is important, because it makes sense as one makes water: everywhere. Everything makes sense, as I showed you. "Colourless green ideas sleep furiously", also makes sense. It is even the best characterisation that one could give to the totality of analytic literature. If in Freud this sense is so full, so resonant with respect to what is at stake, - the unconscious. If, in other words, it is distinguished from everything that he rejected in advance as occultism, if everyone knows and senses it is not Mesmer - that it why it subsists despite the senselessness of the analytic discourse - it is a miracle that we can only explain indirectly. Namely, by the scientific formation of Freud.

The important thing in this discourse is not its sense which must first of all exist so that what I put forward with "the unconscious is structured like a language" has its reference, its Bedeutung. Because it is here that one notices that the reference is language. In other words that everything that my discourse articulates about that of Freud on the unconscious ends up with isomorphic formulae, the ones required if what is at stake is language taken as object. The isomorphism that the unconscious imposes on my discourse about the unconscious, with respect to what is involved in a discourse on language, is what is at stake. Which means that every psychoanalyst ought to be caught up in this discourse, in so far as he is engaged in this field defined by Freud for the unconscious.

Starting from there, I can only barely state, before leaving you, some pinpointing designed for you not to lose your heads in this business. I hope that what I have said at the final term concerning the formula "the unconscious is structured like a language" will preserve all the same its value as a turning point for those who have heard for a long time as, moreover, for those who refuse to hear it.

Of course our science, the one that is ours, is not defined simply by these co-ordinates, which mean that there is no knowledge except through language. It nevertheless remains that science itself cannot be sustained except by putting in reserve a knowledge made up purely of language. Namely, of a logic that is (223) strictly internal and necessary for the development of its instrument in so far as the instrument is mathematics. And everyone can put his finger at every instant on the properly language impasses in which the progress of the mathematical instrument itself puts it. In as much as it both welcomes and is welcomed by every new field of these factual discoveries and is an altogether essential resource for modern science.

It remains indeed then that there is a whole level where knowledge is about language. And it is a vanity to say that this field is properly tautological, that it is at the very origin of what constitutes the start of science, namely, taking the measure of the cleavage thus defined in discourse, from a logical asceticism called the cogito. It is a sign that I was able to develop this asceticism sufficiently to found on it the logic of the phantasy. The one whose articulations were, I must say, very well isolated the last time during the closed seminar by one of those who are working here in the field of my discourse.

It is not a matter, as he said, and as he said in a legitimate fashion in the perspective of what he was trying to contribute as an answer to this discourse, of a "new negation" which is supposed to be the one that I am producing. May heaven preserve me from giving again to anyone whomsoever with the introduction of a novelty the opportunity of conjuring away what is at stake. Which is indeed the complete contrary of this thing that is plugged up because it is something that cannot be plugged. May heaven grant that I do not in any way give to the psychoanalyst a renewed alibi to the one that he has by being in the analytic discourse. Namely, in the proper and Aristotelian sense, his upokeimemon, his subjective support certainly, but in so far as he himself assumes its division.

What is it to be a psychoanalyst? It is towards this aim that there is making its way what I am trying to tell you this year, under this title of the psychoanalytic act.

It is strange that some, among the messages that are sent to me and for which, since I asked for them, I thank those who were good enough to take this step, it is strange that there sometimes crops up the following. That I am doing here something that is supposed to be close to some kind of philosophical reflection. Perhaps all the same some sessions, like the last one, which, of course, if it did not fail to grip those among you who are best following my discourse, sufficiently warns you nevertheless, that what is at stake is something else. Experience - an experience, it is always something which one recently has had the echoes of - proves that the state of mind produced in a certain order of studies described as philosophical, adapts itself badly to the whole precise articulation of this science called logic. In this echo, I even picked out and retained this humorous judgement, that such an attempt to bring in, properly speaking, what has been constructed as logic into the classes, into what is imposed for the philosophical cursus or gradus, would be something akin to this ambition of the technocrat, whose final slogan among all auricular resistances, is to accuse those who, on the whole, are trying to contribute this more precise discourse, which my own is supposed to be a part of, under the title of structuralism. This, in short, is distinguished by this common characteristic, of taking properly as object, what is constituted, not under the heading of what (226) constitutes the ordinary object of a science, namely, something from which one is once and for all at a sufficient distance to isolate in the real as constituting a special species, but to be occupied properly by what is constituted as language-effect.

To take the language-effect as object is indeed, in effect, what can be considered as the common factor in structuralism. And that assuredly, in this connection, thinking finds its basis, its angle, its way of escaping, in the form of a reverie, from this something which, precisely, around this strives to become embodied, and to restore to it, what? Ancient themes which, under different headings, always found themselves flourishing around every discourse in so far as it is properly the backbone of philosophy. Namely, keeping oneself at the point of what, in the use of discourse, has certain effects. Where precisely there is situated the way in which this discourse unfailingly comes to this sort of

mediocrity, inoperancy which means that the only thing left outside, eliminated, is precisely this effect.

Now it is difficult not to notice that psychoanalysis offers a privileged terrain for such reflection.

What in effect is psychoanalysis? I happened, incidentally, in an article, the one found in my Ecrits under the title "Variants de la cure type, Variants of the standard treatment", to write something that I took care to re-extract this morning. That to ask oneself what is involved in psychoanalysis, since precisely it was a matter of showing how there could be defined, established, these variants, which presupposes that there is something typical. And it was indeed precisely to correct a certain way of associating the word type to that of the efficacy of psychoanalysis, that I wrote this article. So then I said, incidentally: "This criterion rarely stated because it is taken to be tautological" - it was already so well before, it is more than ten years ago - I write, "a psychoanalysis, standard or not, is the treatment that one expects from a psychoanalyst".

"Rarely stated", because in truth, in effect, people back away from something that might be not only, as I wrote, tautological, but either would be, or would evoke, this something or other unknown, opaque, irreducible which consists precisely in the qualification of the psychoanalyst.

Observe, nevertheless, that this indeed is what is involved, when you want to verify whether someone is correct in claiming to have gone through an analysis. (227) Who did you go to? Is that person a psychoanalyst or not? This is something that is not settled in the question. If for some reason - and the reasons are precisely what are to be opened up here with a big question mark - the person is not qualified to call himself a psychoanalyst, a scepticism at least is generated as to whether, yes or no, in the experience from which the subject authorises himself, it was indeed a psychoanalysis that was at stake.

In effect, there is no other criterion. But it is precisely this criterion that it would be a matter of defining, in particular when it is a matter of distinguishing a psychoanalysis from this broader thing, whose limits remain uncertain, that is called a psychotherapy.

Let us break up this word "psychotherapy". We will see it being defined by something that is "psycho", psychology, namely, a material of which the least that can be said is that its definition is still subject to some contestation. I mean that nothing is less obvious than what people have wanted to call the unity of psychology, since moreover it only gets its status from a series of references, some of which appeared to be reassuring, because they are most foreign to it. Namely, what is most opposed to it, for example, as belonging to the organic. Or, on the contrary, by the establishment of a series of severe limitations that in practice render what has been obtained, for example, under certain experimental conditions, in the laboratory context, more or less inadequate, indeed

inapplicable, when what is at stake is something that is still more confused, called therapy. Therapy. Everyone knows the diversity of styles and of resonances that this evokes. The centre of it is given by the term suggestion. At least, it is that of all of them. What is referred to the action, the action of one individual on another, being exercised in ways that certainly, cannot claim to have received their full definition. At the horizon, at the limit of such practices, we will have the general notion of what are called on the whole, and what have been rather well situated as techniques of the body. At the other end, we will have ...- I mean by that what, in many civilisations, is manifested as what is propagated here in the erratic form of what people are happy to pinpoint in our epoch as Indian techniques, or again what are called the different forms of yoga. At the other extreme, Samaritan help, which confusedly loses itself in the field, in the abysses, of the elevation of the soul; indeed! It is strange to see it taken (228) up in advertising what is supposed to be produced at the end of the exercise of psychoanalysis; this curious effusion described as the exercise of some goodness or other.

Psychoanalysis let us start then from what is for the moment our only firm point: that it takes place with a psychoanalyst. "With" must be understood here in the instrumental sense, or at least I am proposing that you should understand it in that way.

How does it happen that there exists something that cannot be situated except with a psychoanalyst. As Aristotle says, not at all that one should say, he assures us, "the soul thinks" but "man thinks with his soul" indicating explicitly that this is the sense that should be given to the word "with", namely, the instrumental sense. A strange thing, when I made an allusion somewhere to the Aristotelian reference, things seem rather to have brought effects of confusion to the reader, for want no doubt of recognising the Aristotelian reference.

It is with a psychoanalyst that psychoanalysis penetrates into this something that is at stake. If the unconscious exists and if we define it, as it seems at least, after the long march that we have been making for years in this field, to go into the field of the unconscious is properly to find oneself at the level of what can be best defined as language-effect, in this sense that, for the first time, it is articulated that this effect can be isolated in a way from the subject. That there is knowledge, knowledge in so far as here is what the typical language-effect constitutes. That knowledge is incarnated without the subject who is holding his discourse being conscious of it, in the sense that here, being conscious of his knowledge, is to be co-dimensional with what the knowledge includes, it is to be complicit in this knowledge.

Assuredly, there is here an opening onto something through which there is proposed to us the language-effect as object, in a way that is distinct. Because it excludes from this dialectic, as it has been constructed at the end of the traditionally philosophical questioning, and which would put us on the path of a possible, exhaustive and total reduction of what is involved in the subject, in so far as it is what states this truth, which claims to give the final word on discourse in these formulae. That the en-soi is of its nature destined to be reduced to a pour-soi. That a pour-soi would envelop at the end of an absolute knowledge everything involved in the en-soi. That things are different, by the (229) very fact that psychoanalysis teaches us that the subject, because of the effect of the signifier, is only established as divided and this in an irreducible fashion. This is something that solicits from us the study of what is involved in the subject as language-effect. And how this is accessible, and the role that the psychoanalyst plays in it, is assuredly something essential to ground.

In effect, if what is involved in knowledge always leaves a residue, a residue in a way constitutive of its status – is not the first question posed about the partner, about the one who is there, I am not saying as aid, but as instrument, for something to occur, the psychoanalysing task, at the end of which the subject, let us say, is aware of this constitutive division, after which, for him, something opens up which cannot be called otherwise nor differently than passage à l'acte, let us say an enlightened passage à l'acte - it is precisely from the fact of knowing that in every act, there is something which escapes him as subject, which will have an incidence there, and that at the end of this act, the realisation is, let us say for the moment, at the very least veiled about what he has to accomplish, from this act, as being his own realisation.

This, which is the end of the psychoanalysing task, leaves completely to one side what happens to the psychoanalyst, in this task that has been accomplished. It would seem, in a kind of naïve questioning, that we could say that by setting aside the full and simple realisation of the pour-soi in this task taken as asceticism, its term could be conceived of as a knowledge which at least would be realised for the other. Namely, for the one who is found to be the partner of the operation, to have established its frame and authorised its process.

Is this how it is? It is true that in presiding, as I might say, over this task, the psychoanalyst learns a lot about it. Does this mean that in any way he is the one in the operation who, in a way, can pride himself on being the authentic subject of a realised knowledge? The specific objection to this is that psychoanalysis disputes all exhausting of knowledge and this at the level of the subject himself, in so far as he is brought into play in the psychoanalytic task.

What is at stake in psychoanalysis is not at all a gnothi seauton but precisely a grasp of the limit of this gnothi seauton. Because this limit is properly of the nature of logic itself, and because it is inscribed in the language-effect that it always leaves outside itself. And, consequently, in so far as it allows the subject (230) to be constituted as such, this excluded part which means that the subject, of his nature, either only recognises himself by forgetting what firstly determined him in this operation of recognition, or indeed even by grasping himself in this determination, as denial, I mean only sees it arising in an essential Verneinung by failing to recognise it.

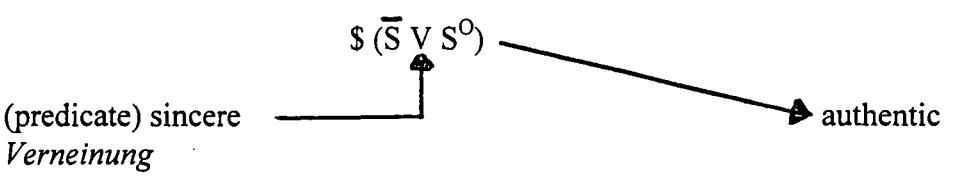
In other words, we find ourselves, with the basal schema of two forms, specifically the hysterical and the obsessional from which analytic experience starts. These are here only an example, an illustration, a flowering, and this in the measure that neurosis is essentially constructed from the reference of desire to demand. We find ourselves face to face with the same logical schema that I produced the last time, in showing you the framework of what quantification is. The one that links the elaborated approach that we can give of the subject and of the predicate, which here, would be inscribed in the form of the repressed signifier S, in so far at it is representative of the subject for another signifier S^O. Let us give this signifier the co-efficient O, in so far as it is the one in which the subject has in fact to recognise himself or fail to recognise himself, where it is inscribed as fixing the subject somewhere in the field of the Other, whose formula is the following: $\$ (\bar{S} \vee S^O)$. That for every subject in so far as it is of its nature divided, here exactly, in the same way as we can formulate that every man is wise ($\bar{m}Vw$), we have the disjunctive choice, between the no man and the to be wise. We have fundamentally this. As the first analytic experience teaches us, the hysteric, in her final articulation, in her essential nature, quite authentically, if authentic means "to find one's own law only within oneself", is sustained in a signifying affirmation which, for us, looks like theatre, looks like comedy. And in truth it is for us that she presents herself in this way as authentic $\$ (\bar{S} \vee S^O)$. No one will be able to grasp what is involved in the true structure of the hysteric, if he does not take it on the contrary as being the most firm and most autonomous status of the subject, the one that is expressed in the signifier on condition that the first, the one that determines it, remains not alone forgotten, but in ignorance of the fact that it is forgotten. While it is quite sincerely at the level of the structure described as obsessional that the subject produces the signifier that is at stake, in so far as it is his truth, but provides it with the fundamental Verneinung, through which he announces himself as not being what precisely he is articulating, that he admits he is formulating.
(231) Consequently, he only establishes himself at the level of the predicate, maintained in its pretension of being something else, only formulates himself, as it were, in a failure to recognise in a way indicated by the negation itself with which he supports it, by the denegatory form with which this failure to recognise is accompanied.



[other version: $\bar{m}Vw$

It is then from a homology, from a parallel to what has been inscribed in writing in which, more and more there is established what is imposed from the very progress which forces, in discourse, the enriching it is given by having to match itself with what comes to us from the varieties, the conceptual variations, that the progress of mathematics imposes on us. It is from the homology of forms of inscription - I am making an allusion for example to Frege's Begriffschrift, Frege, which is the writing of the concept. As you know, it is enough to open him. As a writing of the concept, I already gave you some examples of it. And in so far as we are trying to begin with Frege to inscribe in this writing predicative forms which, not only historically, but because of the fact that throughout history they hold up, they are inscribed in what is called the logic of predicates, and first degree logic. Namely, which contributes no quantification at the level of the predicate.

Let us say, to take up our example again, in truth it is important not to spare it too much, that the use that I made the last time of the quite humorous universal affirmative: all men are wise, that the way in which, in his Begriffschrift, Frege would write it, would be in a form which posits, in the horizontal lines, the (232) simply propositional content, namely, the way in which the signifier are stuck together, without anything for all that being required of them except syntactical correctness. By the bar he puts on the left, he marks what is called the implication, the presence of the judgement. It is starting from the inscription of this bar that the content of the proposition is affirmed, or passes to the stage that is called assertoric. The presence here of something that we can translate by "it is true" assuredly we must translate it. And this "it is true" is precisely what, for us, namely, where what is at stake is a logic, which does not deserve in any way to be called technically primary logic, for the term is already used in logical constructions. It designates specifically what can only operate by combining truth values. It is indeed for this reason that what might well be called primary logic, if the term were not already employed, we will call sub-logic. This does not mean inferior logic, but logic in so far as it is a matter of a logic qua constitutive of the subject. This "it is true", is indeed for us at the level at which we are going to place something other than this assertoric position, it is indeed in effect here that for us the truth is in question. $\forall(Fx) - \exists x - (Fx) \rightarrow$ double negative, this little hollow, this concavity, this hollowing-out in a way, that here Frege reserves to indicate in it what we are going to see. This is why it seems indispensable to him to assure its correct status to his Begriffschrift. It is here that there is going to come something which operates in the proposition inscribed here under the heading of content, "all men are wise", that we are going to inscribe in this way, for example, by putting the "wise" as being the function, and here man as what he calls in the function the argument.

There is, for him, no other correct way of proceeding for any subsequent handling of this Begriffschrift , writing of the concept, than to inscribe here, in the hollow and in a form explicitly indicative of the function that is at stake, that the same m of the man in question, indicating by this that, for every m, the formula "man is wise" is true.

I do not have to develop for you here the necessity of such a procedure, because it would be necessary to give what follows, its riches and its complications. Let it be enough for you here to know that in the link that we might make, between (233) such a proposition and another which is supposed to be, in a way, its condition, a thing which in the Begriffschrift is inscribed thus:

namely, that a proposition F has a certain relation with a proposition P, and that this relation is defined once, (I am saying it for those for whom these words have a sense), in accordance with the module of what is called Philonian implication. Namely, that if this (P) is true, this (F) cannot be false. In other words, that to give order, coherence to a discourse, there only has to be ruled out, and simply ruled out the following: that the false can be conditioned by the true. All the other combinations, including the fact that the false determines the true are admissible.

I am simply indicating this to you, in the margin, that by writing things in this way, we will have the advantage of being able to distinguish two different forms of implication, according to whether it is at the level of this part of the Begriffschfift, namely, at the level at which the proposition is posited as assertoric, that the conditional incidence will come to connect itself:

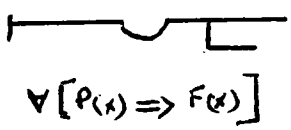
(1) French editor says this shd be corrected to:



at the level of the proposition itself. Namely, that it is not the same thing to say that, if something is true, we might state that man is wise, or that if something else is true, it is true that all men are wise. There is a world between the two things.

This is only designed, moreover, to indicate to you in the margin, and to show you what the necessity of this hollow corresponds to, which is the following. That somewhere there deserves to be isolated the term which logically, at the point of adequate advancement of logic that we are at, gives body to the term all as being the principle, the base starting from which, through the simple operation of diversified negation, there can be formulated all the first positions

defined, contributed by Aristotle. Namely that, for example, there is to be put (233) here, in the form of this vertical line, the negation, that it will be true for every man, that man is not wise, namely, that we will incarnate the universal negative.

On the contrary, to say in this way:

we are saying that it is not true that for every man we can state that man is not wise. We obtain by these two negations, the manifestation of the particular universal. For if it is not true that for all men, it is true to say that man is not wise, it must be then that there is one little fellow, lost somewhere, who is. And that inversely, if we remove this negation here and only leave that one, we are saying that it is not true that for every man, man is wise, namely, that there are some who are not so.

You sense some artifice in articulating things in this way. Namely, that the fact you sense as artifice, for example the appearance of the last particular described as negative, highlights that in the original logic, that of Aristotle, something is masked from us, precisely by implying these subjects to be a collection, whatever they may be, whether by grasping it in extension or in comprehension. That the nature of the subject is not to be sought in something that is ontological, the subject functioning in a way itself as a sort of first predicate, which it is not. What the essence of the subject is, as it appears in logical functioning, starts whole and entire from the first writing, the one that posits the subject as affirming itself of its nature as all. For every m, man, the formula: "man is wise" is true. And it is starting from that, in accordance in a way with a deduction the inverse to the one that I highlighted before you the last time, that existence, comes to light and specifically the only one that is important for us, (235) the one that the particular affirmative supports: there is a man who is wise. It depends, and through the intermediary of a double negation, on the affirmation of the universal. Just as the last time, in presenting the same thing to you (for we are still dealing with quantifiers), it was the double negation applied to existence that I showed you could express the function of all. That the function, $\forall$ (Fx), I said could be expressed be reversed into a-$\exists$(x). No x exists which renders the F(x) function false, namely a double minus,- $\exists$x.- Fx.

This presence of the double negation is what for us, creates a problem. Since in truth, the connection with it is only made in a enigmatic fashion with what is involved in the function of the all, because this fact again of course that the linguistic nuance, of the function opposite to pan or of pantes in Greek, is opposed to the function of olos, just as omnis is opposed to totus. It is, nevertheless, not nothing that Aristotle himself, as regards what is involved in

the universal affirmative, says it is posited kath olon "for the whole", and the ambiguity in French remains unaffected, because of the confusion between two signifiers, between which fundamentally has some relation, namely, this function of the all (du tout).

It is clear that if the subject, that we manage, with the perfection of logic, to reduce to this "no one who is not" (pas qui ne) that I noted the last time, that this subject, nevertheless, in what one might call its native pretension, poses itself as being of its nature capable of apprehending something like all, and that what gives it its status and also its mirage, is that it can think of itself as subject of knowledge. Namely, as an eventual support, just by itself, for something which is all.

Now it is there that I want to lead you, to this indication. I do not know whether the discourse that I am making today as short as I can, as I always do, after having very seriously prepared its stages for you, depending on the attention of the audience - or my own state - I am indeed forced, as in every articulated discourse, and more especially when it is a matter of a discourse about discourse, about logical operations, to take a short cut when it is necessary. It is the fact that, in the way I already indicated to you, the first division of the subject is set up in the repetitive function, what is at stake is essentially the following. The fact is that the subject is only set up as represented by a signifier for another signifier (S and S^1). And it is between the two, at the level of (236) primitive repetition, that this loss, this function of the lost object takes place, around which, precisely, the first operational attempt of the signifier turns, the one that is established in the fundamental repetition; that what comes here to occupy the place given in the establishment of the universal affirmative, to this factor called "argument" in Frege's statements, which is why the predicative function is always acceptable. And that in every case the function of all finds its base, its original turning point and, as I might say, the very principle that establishes its illusion, with reference to the lost object, in the intermediary function of the o-object, between the original signifier in so far as it is repressed signifier, and the signifier that represent it in the substitution established by the repefition which itself is first.

And this is illustrated for us in psychoanalysis itself, and by something capital, in the fact that it represents, that it incarnates in a way in the liveliest fashion, what is involved in the function of the all in the economy, I would not say of the unconscious, in the economy of analytic knowledge, precisely in so far as this knowledge tries to totalise its own experience. It is even the bias, the slope, the trap into which analytic thinking falls when, for want of being able to grasp itself in its essentially divisive operation, at its term with respect to the subject, it establishes as primary, the idea of an ideal fusion that it projects as original,

but which, if you wish, operates here around this universal affirmative, which is precisely the one that it is supposed to be created to make problematic, and which is expressed more or less as follows: no unconscious without the mother. No economy, no affective dynamic, without this thing which is supposed in a way to be at the origin, that man knows the all, because he was in an original fusion with the mother.

This kind of parasitic myth, for it is not Freudian, it was introduced from an enigmatic angle, that of the birth trauma, as you know, by Otto Rank. To bring in birth from the angle of trauma is to give it a signifying function. The thing then in itself was not intended to contribute a fundamental vitiation to the exercise of a thinking which, as analytic thinking, can only leave intact what is (237) at stake. Namely, that on the final plane where the identificatory articulation stumbles, the gap remains open between man and woman, and that consequently, in the very constitution of the subject, we can in no way introduce, let us say, the existence in the world of male and female complementarity.

Now how was the introduction by Otto Rank of this reference to birth from the angle of trauma used? To profoundly vitiate it subsequently in analytic thinking, because it is said that as least this all, this fusion which means that, for the subject there was a primal possibility, and therefore the possibility of re-conquering, a union with what constitutes the all. It is the relation of the mother to the child, of the child to the mother in the uterine state, at the stage before birth, and here we put our finger on where the bias and the error is. But this error is exemplary, because it reveals to us where this function of the all originates in the subject, in so far as it falls under the bias of unconscious destiny. Namely, that it is only recognised authentically by being forgotten, or it is only sincerely recognised by being mis-recognised.

And here in effect, very simply, is where the mainspring is, from the moment that we take things at the level of the function of language: there is no demand that is not addressed to the mother.

We can see this manifesting itself in effect in the development of the child, in so far as he is first of all infans and that it is in the field of the mother that he will first of all have to articulate his demand.

What do we see appearing at the level of this demand? This, uniquely, is what is at stake and what every analysis designates for us: it is the function of the breast. Everything that analysis makes operate, as if what were at stake here were a process of knowledge, namely, that the fact that the reality of the mother is first of all only brought to us, designated by the function of what is called the partial object. But this partial object - I do not mind it being called that - in effect, except that we ought to notice that it is at the source of the imagination of the all. That if something is conceived of as totality between the child and the mother, it is in the measure that, at the heart of the demand, namely, in the gap between what is not articulated and what is articulated as demand, the object around which there arises the first demand, it is the only object which brings to this little newly born being this complement, this irreducible loss, which is its (238) only support. Namely, this breast, so curiously placed here for this use, which of its nature is logical: the o-object, and what Frege would call the variable, the variable I mean in the instauration of any function Fx whatsoever. If a variable is quantified, it passes to another status, precisely by being quantified as universal. This means not simply any one whatsoever, but that fundamentally, in its consistency, it is a constant. And that it is for this reason that, for the child who begins to articulate, with his demand, what will constitute the status of his desire, if an object has this favour of being able for an instant to fulfil this constant function, it is the breast. And, moreover, it is strange that there did not immediately appear, in speculating on the biological terms that psychoanalysis aspires to, since it refers to them, that people do not notice that this thing, which seems to be stated as self-evident, that every child has a mother - and people even underline, in order to put us on the track, that assuredly for the father, we are in the order of faith! But would it be so certain that there is a mother if, instead of being a human, namely, a mammal, it was an insect? What are the relations of an insect with its mother?

If we allow ourselves perpetually to play - and this is presentified in psychoanalyses - between the term, the reference, of conception and that of birth, we see the distance there is between the two. And that the fact that the mother is the mother does not depend, except by a purely organic necessity - I mean, of course, that up to the present, she is the only one who can produce in her own uterus her own eggs, but after all, since people practise artificial insemination nowadays, people will also perhaps perform ovular insertion - the mother, is not, essentially at the level that we take her in analytic experience, this something which is referred to sexual terms. We always speak about the relation described as sexual, let us also speak about the sexual described as relation. The sexual described as relation is completely masked by the fact that human beings of whom we can say that if they did not have language, how would they even know that they are mortal? We will also say, moreover, that if they were not mammals, they would not imagine that they had been born. For the emergence of being, in so far as we operate in this constructed knowledge, which moreover becomes perverting for the whole operational dialectic of analysis, that we make turn around birth, is it anything other than something that was presented in Plato in a manner that I for my part find more sensible. Read the myth of Er. What is this wandering of souls once they have left the body, who are there in a hyperspace before entering to re-lodge themselves somewhere, according to their taste or chance, it does not matter, what is it if not something which has much more sense for us analysts. What is this wandering soul, if not precisely what I am speaking about: the residue of the division of the subject? This metempsychosis appears to me logically less flawed than the one constituting what happens before everything that happens in the psychoanalysing dynamic, the sojourn in the mother's womb. If we do not imagine this sojourn, as it is after all, at the beginning of the mammal line of

"Every man is an animal, except that he names himself"
(Tout homme est un animal, sauf à ce qu'il se n'homme)

I put that on the board for you as a way of getting you going, since in reality I am not in a very good mood. This little formula has no pretension to being thinking. It may however serve a number of you as something to hold onto, as a pivot for a certain number of you who will understand nothing, for example, of what I will say today, something that is not unthinkable. They will understand nothing, but this will not prevent them from dreaming about something else. I am not insulting you, I do not think that this is the generality of cases, but anyway let us say an average!

The reverie aspect of what is always produced in every kind of statement with thinking pretensions or is believed to be such, must always be taken into account and why not give it a little point to hook onto. Suppose, for example, that this aspect of my teaching, namely, what can pass for being thinking, does not have - as has happened to many people, and those of greater stature than mine - any follow-up. There will remain little things like that, it has happened to the very great. So then on this point, there is produced what is called as in the animal kingdom a sort of very special fauna, these kinds of little beasts of the insect class, individuals with wing-sheaths, there are a whole lot of them which feed on cadavers. They are called death squads in legal medicine. There are about ten generations that come to consume what remains in terms of human debris. When I say generation, I mean that they succeed one another, that different species come (242) at different stages.

This is more or less what the use of a certain number of university activities around the remainders of thinking is like, death squads. There are already some busying themselves, for example, without either waiting for me to die, or seeing the result of the things that I have stated before you in the course of the years, at gauging at what moment, in what is constituted by what I collected, as I was able, with a brush, under the title of Ecrits, I really began to speak about linguistics, at what moment, and up to when, what I am saying overlaps what Jacobson says. You will see, this is going to develop. Moreover, I do not at all believe that such an operation is a result of my merits. I believe indeed that it is a rather deliberate operation on the part of those directly interested by what I am saying and who would like the people whose business it is to set about proliferating right away

about what can be retained from my statements under the title of thinking. That gives them a little anticipation of what they are hoping for. Namely, that what I am announcing, and which is not necessarily thinking, is without consequences, I mean for them. There is some feeding in it!

Nevertheless, you will see that this has a certain relation with what I am going to tell you today. We are still of course, at the psychoanalytic act. Why, in short, am I speaking about the psychoanalytic act? It is for psychoanalysts. They are truly the only ones who are implicated in it. Moreover, everything is in that. Today, I am advancing onto a terrain which is obviously little designed for such a large public, namely, how the psychoanalytic act can operate to bring about this something that we will call the identification of the psychoanalyst.

It is a way of taking up the question that at least has this interest: it is new. I mean that up to the present nothing sensible or solid has been articulated about what is involved in what qualifies the psychoanalyst as such. People speak, of course, about rules, about procedures, about modes of access, but this still does not say what a psychoanalyst is. The fact that I am speaking about the psychoanalytic act, from which in short I hope we will be able to take a step forward in what is called the qualification of the psychoanalyst, that I should be lead to speak about the psychoanalytic act before a public which is only in part concerned with it, like this one, is something that in itself gives rises to a problem. A problem that, moreover, is not at all insoluble. Because I want once more to mark what justifies - not what conditions: what conditions, is a series of (243) position-effects which, precisely, what we are able to push forward in our discourse today is going to allow us perhaps to specify something about. But in any case, whatever may be the conditioning [Lacan interrupts his seminar to make an intervention directed at the audience "... please! Stop that messing! I have enough of it! I am asking you to put that wherever you want and leave me in peace"] what justifies that, when one is speaking about the act before a wider public than the one interested in it, namely, properly speaking the psychoanalysts, it is obviously because the psychoanalytic act has a particularity. I could do a little more scribbling on the board to show you what it comes from in the famous quadrangle, the one that starts from "either I do not think, or I am not". With what it involves in terms of "I do not think", which is here on the top left, and "I am not", which is here on the bottom right. And you know that the psychoanalytic act takes place on this axis, culminating in this ejecting of the o

which has devolved, in short, to the charge of the psychoanalyst who has posed, has allowed, has authorised the conditions of the act, at the price of coming himself to support this function of the little o-object. The psychoanalytic act is obviously what gives this support, authorises what is going to be realised as the psychoanalysing task, and, it is in as much as the psychoanalyst gives to this act his authorisation that the psychoanalytic act is realised.

Now there is something quite curious in the fact that this act whose trajectory, in a way, ought to be accomplished by the Other, with this at least presumed result that what is properly speaking act, in so far as we might be lead to ask ourselves what an act is, is obviously not either in this condition, nor in this quite atypical trajectory that there ought to be drawn at least on this quadrangle, but in this one (-φ). Namely, in as much as the psychoanalysing subject, for his part, having come to this realisation of castration, it is a return achieved to the inaugural point, which in truth he never left, the statutory one, that of the forced choice, the (244) alienating choice between "either I am not" and "or I do not think", which ought, by his act, accomplish this something finally realised by him. Namely, what makes him divided as subject. In other words, that he accomplishes an act while knowing, being fully aware, why this act will never realise him fully as subject.

The psychoanalytic act then, as it presents itself, is of a nature to - because it introduces another dimension of this act which does not act of itself, as I might say - may allow us to throw some light on what is involved in an act, the one that I drew just now crossways, the act without qualification. For I am not all the same going to call it human. I am not going to call it human for all sorts of reasons which this little hooking term that I quoted at the beginning can give you an inkling of, since it grounds man in principle. Or rather it grounds him again, or that it grounds him again every time the act in question, the act just by itself, the act that I am not naming, takes place ... which does not happen often.

At this point, naturally, I all the same tried to give some definitions so that we know what we are talking about. Specifically, that the act is a matter of the signifier (un fait de signifiant). It is indeed from this that we started when we began to stammer about it. A matter of the signifier where there takes its place the return of the effect described as the subject-effect which is produced by the word, in language of course, a return of this subject-effect in so far as it is radically divided. This is the novelty brought as a challenge by the psychoanalytic discovery that posits as essential that this subject-effect is a division-effect. This division-effect is that in as much as it is once realised, something can be its return. There can be a re-act. We can speak about act and this act that the psychoanalytic act is, which, for its part, is posited in such a curious fashion, because it is quite different in this sense that nothing requires it to be produced after what, in psychoanalysis, leaves the subject in the position of being able to act. Nothing implies that this, henceforth isolated by the action of the Other who guided him in his psychoanalysis, by a psychoanalysis whose act

allowed the task to be accomplished, nothing explains this leap through which this act which allowed the realising task, the psychoanalysing task, the psychoanalysand, as one might say, to assume what? The programme.

As regards the act - this is a little reflexive parenthesis that I will give here at the start and which is important, which refers moreover to the words by which I (245) began concerning the future of all thinking - all organised thinking is situated in a bivium, or starting from a bivium, which in our day is particularly clear. Either it rejects this subject-effect I am starting from by linking it once more to itself in a moment which would be original. This is the sense that the cogito had historically, the cogito is its model, and the honest model as one might say and it is honest because it posits itself as origin. When you see someone beginning to speak about the phantasy of the origin, you can know that he is dishonest. There is no phantasy to be grasped except hic et nunc. From now on this is the origin of the phantasy, after that, we can talk about it when we have found out where we are with it. As regards the cogito it did not posit itself as origin. Nowhere does Decartes say: "at the origin, the one who thinks gives rise to being". He says: "I think, therefore I am". And, starting from there, it is a good thing in fact, there is no need to be worried about it any more. He completely freed up the entry of science which will absolutely never worry again about the subject. Except, of course, at the required limit where this subject is found, when it has, after a certain time, to notice what it is operating with, namely, the mathematical system and, at the same time, the logical system.

It will do everything then in this logical system, to systematise it without having to deal with the subject, but it will not be easy. In truth, it will only be at these logical frontiers that the effect of the subject will continue to make itself felt, to make itself present and to create some difficulties for science. But for the rest, by reason of this initial approach of the cogito, one can say that to science everything was given, and, in short, in a legitimate way. Everything fell into its hands, it has to be said, with a immense field of success. But it is in a way at the price that science has absolutely nothing to say about the subject of the act. It does not impose one. It allows a lot to be done. Not everything that one might wish, it can do what it can, what it cannot do, it cannot. But it is able to do a lot. It is able to do a lot but it does not justify anything, or, more exactly, it gives no explicit reason for doing anything. It only presents itself as a temptation to do (de faire), an irresistible temptation, it is true. Everything that we can do with what science has conquered for three centuries, is not nothing, and we do not deprive us (246) ourselves of doing it. But it is in no way said that any act will measure up to it. Where it is a matter of act, where it is decided, where one makes use of it knowingly for ends that appear justified, it is a matter of a completely different style of thinking. It is the other part of the bivium. Here thinking gives itself up to the dimension of the act and, for that, it is enough for it to touch the subject-effect.

An example: the fundamental remark of a doctrine that is easy, I think, for you to recognise. The subject does not recognise itself, namely, is alienated in the order of production which conditions his work. This by reason of the subject-effect called exploitation. No need to add "of man by man", because we have seen that one must be a little suspicious of man on this occasion, and then everyone knows that it was possible to turn this usage into an agreeable witticism. This by reason of the subject-effect then, which is at the foundation of all exploitation, here is something that has consequences as act. That is called the revolution. And, in the act consequences, thinking has the greatest difficulty in recognising itself as has been demonstrated to you, I think, your whole life long, since for a certain number of you it had even begun before your birth. The difficulties that what is called the intelligentzia had, continues to have, with the Communist order.

All thinking, then, of this category which touches on the subject-effect participates in the act. To formulate it indicates, as one might say, the act and its reference. Only as long as the act has not got going, it is a reference, of course, that is difficult to sustain in the whole measure that it is only isolated at the end, as everyone knows. Any thinking that, in the past, gave rise to a school - the things that remain, like that, pinned up in university herbariums, the Stoic school, for example - had this end of act. This sometimes stops abruptly. I mean that, for the moment, for example, in the circle to which I made allusion, the act which in our time is pinpointed by the term revolutionary, the result is not there yet. It is not isolated nor isolatable, this reference to the act. But anyway, for the Stoics as I evoked them earlier, the fact is that this stopped short, that at a moment, people had nothing more to take than what had been taken from those who were engaged in this path of thinking. Starting from which the necrophagia that I spoke about earlier can begin, and, thank God it cannot go on forever either since there do not remain that many things as wrecks, as debris of this Stoic thinking. But in any case that keeps people busy!

(247) Having said this, let us come back to our psychoanalytic act. And let us take up again this little cross-piece exhibited on the board, about which I already made the remark many times, that you do not have to give a privileged value to the diagonals in it. You ought rather, to have a correct idea of it, see it as a sort of tetrahedron in perspective. That will help you to notice that the diagonal has no privilege in it.

The psychoanalytic act essentially consists in this sort of subject-effect that operates by distributing, as one might say, what is going to constitute the support. Namely, the divided subject, the $, in so far as this is the acquisition of the subject-effect at the end of the psychoanalysing task. It is the truth conquered by the subject whatever he is and under whatever pretext he has become engaged in it. Namely, for example, for the most banal subject, the one who comes to it with the goal of getting relief. Here is my symptom. I now have the truth of it. I mean that it is in the whole measure that I did not know everything about what was involved in me. It is in the whole measure that there is something irreducible in this position of the subject that is called, in short, and is quite nameable, the impotence to know everything about it. That I am here and that, thank God, the symptom that revealed what remains masked in the subject-effect reverberates

with a knowledge. What is masked there I had lifted, but assuredly not completely. Something remains irreducibly limited in this knowledge. It is at the price - since I spoke about distribution - of the fact that the whole experience turned around this little o-object of which the analyst became the support. The little o-object in so far as it is what is, was and remains structurally the cause of this division of the subject. It is in the measure that the existence of this little o-object has been demonstrated in the psychoanalysing task, and how? But you all know it. In the transference-effect. It is in so far as the partner is the one who is found to fulfil, from the structure established by the act, the function that, ever since the subject has operated as subject-effect, as caught in the demand as constituting desire, he found himself determined by these functions that analysis pinpointed as being those of the feeding object, of the breast, of the excremental object, of the scybalum, of the function of the look and of that of the voice. It is in so far as it is around these functions, in so far as in the analytic relation they have been distributed to the one who is the partner, the pivot, and to say the word, the support of it, as I said the last time, the instrument, that there has been able to be realised the essence of what is involved in the function of $, namely, the impotence of knowledge.

(248) Will I evoke here the analogy between this distribution and the tragic act? For you sense clearly that in tragedy, there is something analogous. I mean that what there is for us, in tragic fiction as it is expressed in a mythology in which it is not at all ruled out that we should see incidents that are altogether historical, lived, real. I mean that the hero, each and every one who engages himself alone in the act, is doomed to this destiny of finally being only the waste product of his own enterprise. I have no need to give examples. Just the level that I call that of fiction or of mythology suffices to fully indicate its structure. But, all the same, let us not forget, let us not confuse tragic fiction - I mean the myth of Oedipus, or Antigone, for example - with what is truly an acceptation, the only valid grounded one of tragedy, namely, the staging of the thing. In the staging we are obviously closer to this schize as it is supported in the psychoanalysing task. At the end of psychoanalysis, one can support the division of the psychoanalysing subject that has been realised, with the division in the arena in which there could be played out the tragic production in the purest form. We can identify this psychoanalysand, to the divided and related couple of the spectator and the chorus. While the hero, there is no need for there to be a crowd of them, there is never more than one, the hero, is the one who, on the stage, is nothing but that figure of waste product with which there closes every tragedy worthy of the name.

The structural analogy hovers there in such an obvious fashion that it is the reason why it was brought in massively, as one might say, under the pen of Freud. It is why this analogy haunts, as one might say, the whole analytic ideology. Only with an effect of exaggeration which is close to the grotesque and which ensures, moreover, the total incapacity revealed in this literature that is called analytic to make anything other, around this mythical reference, than an extraordinarily sterile kind of circular repetition. With from time to time, all the same, the feeling that there is something there about a division. And people do not see what separates it, people do not see where is the radical insufficiency which makes us inadequate to it.

This strikes certain people. It is not the worst that it strikes. But it gives results that truly cannot go much further than yapping. Let us not forget the Oedipus complex, nor what the Oedipus complex is, nor the degree to which it is the interring, integrally linked to the structure of all our experience. And when one (249) has produced this reminder, one does not have to go much further. It is indeed why, moreover, I do not consider that I am wronging anyone by having sworn to myself never to take up again the theme of the Name of the Father. Upon which, seized by some vertigo or other which has happily abated, I once said I would engage myself in the circuit of one of my years of seminars. Things taken up at this level are hopeless, while we have a much surer way of tracing it concerning the subject effect, and which has to do with logic.

If I led you to the cross-roads of this properly logical effect that modern logic has so well defined under the term of the function of quantifiers, it is obviously for a reason very close to the one that I announced to you as being the question for today. Namely, the relations of the psychoanalytic act to something of the order of a predication. Namely, what is involved, how can we say that it situates the psychoanalyst.

Let us not forget, if it is at the end of an experience of the division of the subject that something called the psychoanalyst can be established, we cannot trust a pure and simple identification of the term of the one which is at the source of the definition of the signifier, that every signifier represents a subject for another signifier. Precisely, the signifier, whatever it may be, cannot be all that represents the subject. Precisely, as I showed you the last time, because the function that we pinpoint as "all" is dependent on a cause which is none other than the little o-object, if this little o-object, fallen into the interval which, as one might say, alienates the complementarity - I reminded you of it the last time - of what is involved in the subject represented by the signifier of the subject $ with the S, whatever it maybe, a predicate that can be established in the field of the Other. So then, that what is involved, through this effect, of the "all" in so far as it is stated, involves something completely different to that towards which, as I might say, identification does not go. Namely, towards the recognition come from the Other, since this is what is at stake, that in nothing of what we can inscribe of ourselves in the field of the Other, can we recognise ourselves.

This "all", what represents us in this business of recognition could have to do with this void, with this hollow, with this lack. Now this is not the way things are.

The fact is that at the source of the establishment of this "all" that is required (250) every time we state anything universal, there is something other than the (im)possibility that it masks, namely, that of having oneself recognised. And this has been proved in analytic experience by something that I will articulate in a very condensed way because it is exemplary: that sex is not an all (pas tout), for this is the discovery of psychoanalysis. It is all very well to see there emerging today all sorts of collections by people who have been delegated to collect a certain number of texts about what is involved, about this famous field so bizarrely preserved, reserved, which psychoanalysis is. A research bursary is given to a gentleman called Brown who wrote something not all that bad: Life against death, once upon a time. He took advantage of it to say rather sensible things about Mr Luther, and since it was for the benefit of the Wesleyan University, all of that was rather well justified. But in the end losing all sense of measure in these collecting operations, he published something called Love's body in which there is a commentary in a note that speaks about Freudian pansexualism. Now precisely, if what Freud said signifies anything, it is of course that there was a reference to what people might expect should be produced from sexual conjunction, namely, a union, a whole (un tout). If there is something that is forced on us, precisely, at the end of the experiment, it is that, in the sense that I am indicating to you and that I am making resonate for you, sex is not everything (tout). The all finds its place, which does not at all mean that this place is the place of the all. The all usurps it by making it believe, as I might say that it, the all comes from sex. This is how the function of truth changes its value, if I can express myself in this way, and that what is found to fit in very well, which is encouraging, with certain discoveries which have been made in the field of logic, which can be expressed as follows, make us put our finger on the fact that the all, the function of the all, the quantifier all, the function of the universal, that the all should be conceived of as a displacement of the part. It is in as much as the little o-object, alone, justifies and gives rise to the function of the all as such, that we find ourselves subjected in logic to this category of the all. But at the same time that there are explained a certain number of curiosities which isolate it in the totality of logical functions, I mean this field in which there reigns the system of the quantifier, which isolates it by giving rise in it to curious difficulties, strange paradoxes.

Of course, there is every interest in the greatest possible number of you - and I am also saying for everyone just as much as for you - should have a certain logical (251) culture. I mean that no one here has anything to lose by going to educate himself in what is taught in places about the already constituted fields of the progress of present day logic. You have nothing to lose in going very precisely to educate yourself in it in order to understand what it is I am trying out here, in outlining a logic functioning in an intermediary zone, in as much as it has not yet been handled in a appropriate fashion. You will lose nothing, by grasping what I am alluding to when I say that even though the logic of quantifiers has managed to obtain its proper and truly quite rigorous status, I mean has every appearance of having excluded the subject from it, I mean can be managed by means of pure and simple rules which depend on the handling of letters, it nevertheless remains that, if you compare the use of this logic of quantifiers with such and such another sector, segment, of logic as they are defined in different terms, you will notice that it is curious that while, for all the other logical systems you can always give a rather large number, for example, of geometrical, economic, conceptual

interpretations, I mean that each one of these manipulations of logical systems is quite multivalent as regards interpretation, it is quite striking, on the contrary, to see that whatever may be the rigour to which people have been able, when all is said and done, to push the logic of quantifiers, you will never manage to remove from it this something which is inscribed in the grammatical structure, I mean in ordinary language, and which makes intervene these functions of all and some.

This has consequences one of which has only been able to be highlighted among logicians, I mean where people knew how to make use of what a deduction is. Namely, that anywhere we underpin a system, an apparatus such as the one at stake in the use of the quantifiers, we cannot create algorithms such that it is enough for it to be settled in advanced, that every problem is purely and simply subjected to the use of a rule, of a calculation fixed once and for all. Once we are in this field, we will always be capable of making the undecidable emerge in it.

A strange privilege. For those here who have never heard tell of the undecidable, I am going to illustrate what I am saying by a little example. What does "undecidable" mean? I apologise to those for whom what I am going to say will appear to be an old refrain. I take an example, there are many. You know - or (252) you do not know - what a perfect number is. It is a number such that it is equal to the sum of its divisors. For example: the divisors of the number 6 are 1, 2 and 3, 1+2+3 = 6. It is also true for 28. It is not a matter of prime numbers, it is a matter of divisors, which means: given a number, into how many equal parts can you divide it? For 28, that will give 14, 7, 4, 2 and 1 that gives you 28.

You see that these two numbers are even numbers. We know lots of them like that. We do not know any odd number that is perfect. That does not mean that they do not exist. The important thing is that one cannot prove that it is impossible that some exist. This is something undecidable. Something undecidable whose link with the structure, the logical function of quantifiers it is not my role here to make you touch. Let us say that if it is really necessary this could be reserved for a closed seminar. I will ask someone whose job it is more than mine to do it in association with me.

But this privilege of the function of quantifiers in so far as it interests us to the highest degree, as you are going to see right away, this privilege - I am raising the hypothesis provisionally, let us say - this impasse in so far as it is, you should note, a fruitful impasse. For if we had the slightest hope that everything could be subjected to a universal algorithm, that in everything we could settle the question of whether a proposition is true or false, this would be rather a closing down. The hypothesis that I am raising depends on the fact that this privilege of the function of quantification depends on what is involved in the essence of the all and its relation to the presence of the little o-object.

There exists something that functions so that every subject believes himself to be all, so that every subject believes himself to be all subject, and through that very

fact the subject of all (tout), from this very fact having a right to speak about everything.

Now what analytic experience shows us is that there is no subject whose totality is not an illusion, because it comes from the little o-object qua elided.

We are now going to try to illustrate it, by showing why this interests us in the most direct fashion. How is there correctly expressed what is involved in the properly analytic dimension if not as follows: all knowledge is not conscious.

(253) The ambiguity, the problematic, the fundamental schize that the function of quantifier introduces in so far as it introduces a "for all" and an "it exists", consists in the fact that it admits but at the same time puts in question the fact that if we say: "it is not true that for all ... what follows, things are such and such", this implies that it exists. That there is, of this all, something which is not, because it is not true that for all that there are some which are not (il y en a qui ne pas).

In other words that, because a negation operates on the universal, something arises from the existence of a particular and that, in the same way, because not all is affected with a not (ne pas), something still more striking, there are some - as they say - who, giving rise to a positive particular existence from a double negation, that of a truth which, withdrawn from the all by not being, will make a particular existence emerge from it.

Now, is it enough that it is not demonstrated that all something for there to exist something which is not? You clearly sense, there is here a danger, a question which, just by itself, is enough to render very suspect this use of negation in so far as it would be enough just by itself to assure the link, the coherence of the reciprocal functions of the universal and the particular. As regards what is involved in knowledge, if from the fact that all knowledge is not conscious, we can no longer admit as fundamental that knowledge knows itself, does that mean that it is correct to say that there is something unconscious (de l'inconscient)?

It is very precisely what, in this article included in my Ecrits called Position of the unconscious, I tried to make tangible by using in it what I was able to construct at that time. Namely, a little parable which was nothing other than a way of imaging in a species that even, if I remember correctly, I called, because I rather like playing on the word homme, "l'homelette" and which is nothing other than the little o-object. Naturally, this may be the opportunity for a future "scholar" to imagine that when I was writing my Position of the unconscious, I had not the slightest idea about logic, as if of course what constitutes the order of my discourses did not consist precisely in adapting them for a certain audience, as it is supposed to be. This is, moreover, not entirely so, because one knows well what the ears of psychoanalysts are capable of receiving or not receiving at a given moment...

(254) As regards qualification, for a very long time, for everything involved in knowledge, the constructive reflection around episteme put in question what is involved for the practitioner when it is knowledge that is at stake. At the level of Plato every time it is a matter of assuring a knowledge in its status it is the reference to the artisan which predominates. And nothing seems to me to prevent it being announced that every human practice - I am saying practice (pratique) because this is not at all to say, because we are making the act predominate that we reject the reference to it - every practitioner supposes a certain knowledge if we want to advance into what is involved in episteme. To know everything about carpentry is what for us will define the carpenter.

This secretly implies that carpentry knows itself as an art - I am not saying as material, of course - which is prolonged for us analysts by the fact that knowing everything about therapeutics qualifies the therapist, which implies, and in a more doubtful manner, that therapy knows itself.

Now if there is something which most - excuse me, I am going to say it! - instinctively repels the psychoanalyst, it is that knowing everything about psychoanalysis qualifies the psychoanalyst, and it is not without reason, very precisely because of the following. Not of course that we know any more in that way about what the psychoanalyst is. But that all knowledge about psychoanalysis depends so much on the reference to the experience of the little o-object, in as much as at the end it is radically excluded from any subsistence as subject. That the psychoanalyst in no way has the right to posit himself as giving an evaluation of the experience of which he is properly speaking only the pivot and the instrument. Any knowledge which depends here on this function of the little o-object assuredly does not guarantee anything, and is precisely not able to answer for its totality, except in a reference to this instrumentation, certainly requires that should be nothing that can present itself as an all of this knowledge. But that precisely this absence, this lack, does not in any way require one to be able to deduce from it either that there has been or that there has not been psychoanalysis. The reflection, the rebounding of negation at the level of the all does not imply any consequence at the level of the particular that the status of the psychoanalyst as such depends on nothing other than the following. That he offers himself to support, in a certain process of knowledge, this role of object of demand, or cause of desire, which means that the knowledge obtained can only be taken for what it is: a signifying realisation linked to a revelation of the phantasy.

If the not all that we put in the not all knowledge is conscious, represents the (255) non-constitution of all knowledge, and this at the very level at which knowledge is required, it is not true that there necessarily exists unconscious knowledge that we can theorise in accordance with just any logical model.

Is the psychoanalyst that the psychoanalysand is, at the end of his task, what it is? A whole way of presenting the theory, because it implies a way of thinking, puts into psychoanalytic action this factor which intervenes as a parasite. The psychoanalyst has the last word about what must be thought of it. Namely, that he is the one who has the thinking out of the whole affair. That the psychoanalysand at the end is supposed to be regularised, which implies that he brings into being a certain subjective conjunction, that he re-posits himself anew with a renewed I do not think only it goes from the special to the general.

Is that how things are? Never. It is not a simple riddle that the psychoanalyst, who knows it better than anyone through experience, should set about conceiving in this form of science fiction, it has to be said, the fruit that he himself obtains from it.

Is it then in the order of pour-soi that the psychoanalysand's trajectory is completed? This is something that is no less contradicted by the very principle of the unconscious, through which the subject is condemned not alone to remain divided from a thinking which cannot be assumed by any I am who is thinking which posits an en-soi of the I think that is irreducible to anything thinking it for itself. It is precisely the end of psychoanalysis that he should realise himself as constituted by this division, this division in which every signifier, in so far as it represents a subject for another signifier, includes the possibility of its inefficacy precisely by bringing about this representation of its failure as a representative. There is no one psychoanalysed, there is someone "who has been a psychoanalysand", from which there results only a subject who has been made aware, of what he cannot think of as constitutive of any of his own actions.

We do not yet have any existing type to conceive of what must be involved in this experienced subject. It can only be judged with regard to an act which is to be constructed like the one that, reiterating castration, is established as a passage à l'acte. Just as its complement, the psychoanalytic task itself, is reiterated by cancelling itself out as sublimation.

But this tells us nothing about the status of the psychoanalyst for, in truth, if its essence is to assume the place, in which the o-object is situated in this operation, (256) what is the possible status of the subject who puts himself in this position? The psychoanalyst in this position may not at all have what I have just developed, namely, not the slightest idea of what conditions it; not the slightest idea of science. This is even the usual thing. In truth, he is not even asked to have it, given the field he occupies and the function that he has to fulfil in it. He will have a lot to learn on the contrary about the logical support of the science. But if I refer in its connection to the statutes of the practitioner whatever they may be, is it to be ruled out that in any of these statutes, as they have been evoked for us since antiquity, in terms of reflection on science, but still in fact present in a certain number of fields, is what can be defined as obvious in the light of, no doubt, and only by, psychoanalysis, in a practical function, by highlighting the presence of the little o-object, not a resource, a value for him?

Why, at the end of the year on the Crucial problems of psychoanalysis, did I make so much here of the function of perspective? It seems that it is a theory, an operation that only interests an architect, if it is only to show, what he himself had

isolated from all time, I mean ever since the time when, we do not know too well how, to justify the ideal which directed, for example, what is bequeathed to us in the grammatismes of a Vitruvius. That what is at stake, what dominates, what we would be quite wrong, given the presence of ideals, to reduce to the utilitarian function of building, for example, what dominates, is a reference that I tried to explain to you in relation to the subject-effect when perspective comes into its proper structure with Dessargue. Namely, when it establishes this other definition of space called projective geometry. And this putting in question of the very domain of vision could it seems, as a first approach, be entirely supported by a patterning of squares. But, on the contrary, there appears there this closed structure, starting from which I was able to try to isolate, to define for you amongst all the others, and because it is the most neglected in the analytic function, the function of the little o-object called the look.

Is it for nothing that at the end of this same year, around the painting of Las Meninas, I made a presentation to you that is no doubt difficult but that must be (257) taken as an apologue, an example, a reference for the behaviour of a psychoanalyst. Because what is involved in the illusion of the subject supposed to know is always around what is admitted so easily by the whole field of vision. If on the contrary, around this exemplary work, the painting Las Meninas, I wanted to show inscribed the function of what is involved in the look, and the fact that it has to operate in such a subtle way that it is at once present and veiled, it is, as I pointed out to you, the very existence of us spectators, that it puts in question. Reducing it to being in a way no more than a shadow with respect to what is established in the field of the painting in terms of an order of representation that does not, properly speaking, have anything to do with what any subject can represent to himself. Is this not the example and the model in which something of a discipline which relates to the very core of the position of the psychoanalyst could be exercised? Is it not the trap to which there yields, in this curious fictitious representation that I tried to give you earlier as that where the psychoanalyst ends up by coming to a halt, with regard to the experience he calls clinical. Could he not find there the model, the reminder, the sign, that nothing can be established in the world, that nothing can be established in the world of his experience without there being, in all necessity, presentified there, and as such, the function of his own look.

Assuredly this is only an indication. But an indication given, as I often do at the end of one or other of my discourse, very much ahead of time. It depends on the fact that if, in psychoanalysis - I mean in the operation situated within the four walls of the office in which it is practised - everything about the little o-object is brought into play, it is with a very curious reserve, and this is not by chance, concerning what is involved in the look. And there, I would like to indicate before leaving you today the proper accent the little o-object takes on from a certain immunity to negation which may explain the way in which, at the end of the psychoanalysis, the choice is made which leads to the establishment of the psychoanalytic act, namely, what is undeniable in this little o-object.

Notice the difference in this negation when it is brought to bear, in predicative logic, on the not-man, as if that existed, but it is imagined, it is supported. "I do not see", the negation depends on something indistinct, where it is a matter of a failure of my sight or a failure of the lighting, that motivates the negation. But, "I am not looking", is this not something that just by itself gives rise to more complementary objects than any other statement. I mean that I am looking at this or that, "I am not looking" means assuredly that there is something undeniable, since I am not looking at him. And the same thing in the four other registers of the little o-object which would be incarnated in a "I am not taking" for what concerns the breast - and we know what that means, the appeal that it realises at the level of anorexia nervosa. Of the "I am not letting go" and we know what that means in this structuring avarice of desire. And will I go on to evoke, at the end of what I have to say to you today, what we make understood with an "I am not saying", is in general understood as, "I am not saying no". Hear it yourselves as that: " I am not saying no".

J Lacan: This seminar does not at all seem to me to have begun under inauspicious conditions. The reduction of your number is certainly favourable for what I would like, namely, that there should be exchanged here some questions and perhaps answers or rectifications. This small number is probably the result of different conditions, up to and including the fact that there are holidays coming and even also examination periods, and a thousand other factors. One cannot but regret that certain senior members of my School who attend my seminars are not here ... I hope that they will show up because I would like them to get into action. But if they are not there we will do without them.

How to proceed? I received a certain number of letters responding to my soliciting questions. We could read a certain number of them. I have to choose because I received a good number. Is Mr Soury there? I begin with his.

"You have attached the effects of the signifier to the possibility of a consequence ..." This in effect is a quotation, I do not know whether everyone caught it in passing in one of my sentences. I did not have the time to verify the moment at which, under what circumstances I pronounced it but this is not too important; I must, at the beginning of a lecture, have put the accent, probably in response to some contradiction that had been glimpsed, on the term of consequence and on the fact that, to connote it by a biographical figure, the essence of what we put forward as the testimony of our experience, is that events have consequences in it. (259) It is quite certain that the term "consequence", at the moment that I put it forward, I must have put it forward with the connotation that it takes on from everything that is brought to us in terms of reflection and of what is presentified for us. The fact is that the very notion of consequence as we are able to apprehend it, in so far as we are taught to reflect, is linked to the functions of logical succession. What is there before any consequence, is the articulation of a discourse with what it involves as a continuation, as an implication. One could say that the first field in which we have the apprehension of a necessity, is that of logical necessity. When we say something, it has its importance (ça tire à conséquence). Namely, that we can be caught at one or other detour of this sentence, a place to land, a conclusion, a way to close or to conclude. This is implicit in the discourse itself.

You say to me: "consequence can be used for temporal succession, for determinist objects" (I do not see very clearly what you mean by determinist objects) " for animal life ..." and you quote right away, to articulate what you are saying: "the consequence of an impact is that the particle has as impulsion ...". Yes, I do not know if it is the best use of the word 'consequence'. We try as far as possible, to express the effect of an impact, namely, the transmission of impulsions, in formulae that will include the least consequences possible, and 'consequence' comes to take its place, we will speak about it again. We will say rather as regards what concerns the law of the transmission of the impact, namely the effect of action and reaction, that all of this will have its importance when we have to speak about it.

In other words, what is important in analysed, analysable experience is not presented at all, in effect, at all at the level of effects which are conceived uniquely from a dynamic function but at the level of a dimension of effects which implies that a question is posed at a level which is locatable as that of language-consequences.

In other words, it is because a subject has not been able in any way, to articulate something primary, that his subsequent effort to give it, I would not even say meaning, sense, but articulation in the sense properly that this articulation is made up of nothing other than a signifying sequence, which takes on a more precise form, the accent of consequence starting from the moment when scansions are established in it. It is in this dimension that there is carried out the whole of this experience which is analytic experience, in so far as what it concerns, is assuredly (261) all sorts of things which have an effect in completely different registers than those of pure and simple discourse. But the fact is that it is in as much as it is a matter of the domain of what takes effect, is caught up in this language articulation, that it interests us, that it creates a question, that we can grasp it in the analysable field.

By their duration, by their persistence, by their adhesive effect on what lasts, on what is maintained in this effect of articulation, we can in effect indirectly measure what is displaced, into the other field that is precisely the field of real forces. But it is always through some knot of consequences, and of signifying consequences, of signifying articulations that we have a hold on what is at stake.

Naturally, this cannot claim in any way to be sufficient. But since you do not seem to be struck by what I wanted simply to give at this level in terms of a brief remark, the fact is that the term "consequence" takes on its true import, its resonance, its ordinary usage at the logical level. And it is indeed because it is a matter of a re-working, of a work, of a logical development that we have to deal with something analysable.

This is a first approach. Naturally, it is in the whole measure that we have been able to push things much further, to give a formulation of these effects that I call subject-effects, to the point of really being quite close to giving them a status, that all of this in tenable.

But this was only a reminder. I am saying this to you as a way of awaking your attention, to accommodate your ear to the inspiration of a discourse.

You then articulate, as if it were convincing: "a child is the consequence of a copulation".

Logically, the use of this term 'consequence' is suspect. In this connection, you appeal to someone to anticipate a little the consequence of his acts. You will say that precisely because you have passed on to the ethical plane. In the case of the mid-wife you are not going to talk about pregnancy as a consequence; that would seem to be superfluous.

And then you add some remarks who have nothing to do with my course but which are personal to you. I read them since, after all, I do not see why I would not take them into account. "Mathematics are diverted into obscurantism because, probably, the rigour in the handling of the signifier becomes the alibi of the absence of rigour in the use of the signifier - social classification, salary indices, examination marks, statistics. The internal concatenation of demonstration, of definitions, is converted into lectures, a concatenation of lectures. Modern mathematics, with its structure, allows there to be formulated the absence of rigour in question, but this possibility is not utilised".

What do you mean by that?

M. Soury: That recent mathematics allows there to be formulated abuses in the use of figures. If one wants to make understood obscurantist usage, an example is the zero in class, which has replaced the dunce's cap. The modern school does not give a dunce's cap, but zero's. The zero has come from figures and benefits from the prestige of figures and from the prestige of the rigour of figures.

How has the zero, coming from this tradition, become an insult at the disposition of the professor, an ignominious label used against pupils.

The astonishing passage is how a rigorous creation like figures, and the zero in particular, has become an insult to pupils, a dunce's cap, but which is more respected than if a real dunce's cap were used?

J. Lacan: Do you believe that we have to bring modern mathematics into play to rise up against this or pose ourselves some questions about the use of the zero?

What I see interesting in what you are saying, what that suggests to me are little points of history that people do not think about, in effect. Since when has zero been used in class? There must be historical testimonies of this. It is obvious that one could only have been able to give a zero in class from the time that the zero functioned in mathematics, which only happened with the adoption of Arabic figures. Namely, that people did not give a zero in the time of the Roman pedants, since the zero did not exist.

Since when were marks given from zero to twenty, might be interesting. Nevertheless, perhaps to extend the reprobation that is inspired in you by the zero conceived of as a weapon to something or other that is supposed to be inherent in the use of mathematics, appears problematic to me.

(263) Soury: Not inherent.

J. Lacan: But in any case you make an allusion to the dimension of modern mathematics. I thought, in truth that your remark was closer to something that I suggested, not that the structures allow there to be formulated absences of rigour, but that, in the logic of this mathematics, we see there arising the necessity that it finds itself brought to by its own development, of elaborating its logic. We find ourselves confronted with knots which are inherent in logic itself and which can for us, appear as a kind of resonance of something that constitutes in our field, the field of analysis, what we have to elaborate in terms of logic from a register that is necessarily different because it is applied to a completely different order. Anyway, let us not go on about this.

I will take other questions. Rudrauf, would you like to make a little choice in what you have written?

M. Rudrauf: In fact I had taken up one of your formulae. You have, it seems to me - this is the way I experienced it - stigmatised a certain inversion of your formula "the unconscious is structured like a language". Someone had said, "why not language is structured like the unconscious"? To which you responded clearly that in logic one should go from the known to the unknown and not from the unknown to the known.

This inversion of your formula seemed to me ... to pose a problem of comprehension about the formula itself, in this sense. To say: "the unconscious is structured like a language", is to suppose language known and the unconscious unknown. Since after all this language - and what language? - in the image of which we see the unconscious being structured, was it so well known? And this unconscious to which we might refer was it so completely unknown?

During a subsequent seminar you made some remarks that seemed to me, where you said: "if I say that the unconscious is structured like a language, that does not mean that I know it".

This is obviously to pose the whole question of the knowledge of the analyst, or of the knowledge through which, or from the angle of which, by means of logical articulation. But all the people who are confronted by analytic problems are (264) confronted with the problem of knowing what is happening, what the sick person knows, what the sick person and ourselves learn about this x, which is the unconscious. After all, this x, why say this x, why do I structure the unconscious

here through x, namely mathematical language or through a mathematical figure ...

J. Lacan: x is not in itself a formulation equivalent to "unknown". It is in the language of novels that one designates an unknown as Mr X or Mr Y. The mathematical usage of x is not at all something which stands for unknown: x designates what is called a variable. It is not the same thing.

M. Rudrauf: In a problem that is posed, x = the unknown in the language of the little pupil.

J. Lacan: Good, let us leave x aside. I do not believe I ever designated the unconscious, in so far as I consider it - as you say very well - as, if not unknown, at least at the start, for us, in its function as unconscious, much less known, and with good reason, than language, I have not for all that identified it to the function usually in use for the letter x in mathematics.

On the contrary you have brought together two things which obviously it is quite legitimate to bring together, which are the fact that I first said that it is not at all the same thing to say that "the unconscious is structured like a language" and to say that "language is structured like the unconscious". First of all, because the second thing does not really have any follow-up. People were trying to formulate things and rather closely to me, in a fashion that is much more pointed, much more important, than that the order of the unconscious is what the possibility of language can be founded on. This has greater pretensions than the other, and it is more dangerous, as I might say. It is not less weak, but it is more insinuating.

On the contrary, when I say that I can implicate in this dimension, in this approach of my teaching, this whole part of my position that is not knowledge, it is a correction, it is more than a correction. It is to try to bring in here that there can be, when it is a matter of an analyst, a teaching which is supported without involving this principle that there is somewhere something which entirely settles (265) the question. There is a subject supposed to know.

I am saying that we can, in effect, advance into this teaching and in as much, very precisely, as it has as a start this formula without it implying that we also put ourselves in this position that I called properly professorial and which is the one that always elides the fact that the subject supposed to know is in a way there; that the truth is already somewhere. What is the point of your remark once you have made this connection which I have told you that I accept?

M. Rudrauf: If I take up again the text as I formulated it there, it means that to say that the unconscious is structured like a language, is to mark on first hearing, the unconscious is represented as an existing field, according to another of your formula, namely, existing before it is known. Thus sending us back to other reversible formulae, to ask: how is the unconscious structured?

One could say: the unconscious is structured like symptoms, because we search for the psychoanalytic meaning of the symptom; that the unconscious is structured like a dream - of course one could say that the dream is structured like a language - that the unconscious is structured like a child's drawing.

J. Lacan: If you contest that the unconscious is structured like a language it does not take you very far. I assure you that there are many reasons to contest that the dream is structured like a language. If the dream is structured like a language, it is in as much precisely as the dream is the royal road to the unconscious, but that it is not the unconscious just by itself. It is a phenomenon that has many other dimensions than that of being the royal road to the unconscious, and one can speak about the dream otherwise than by speaking about the unconscious. It is even regrettable that people are not more attached to the phenomenon of the dream when it has been separated out, extracted from its relation to the unconscious.

There are all sorts of dimensions of the dream that would deserve to be explained. When I see one or other person who, happily, writes in an obscure journal so that it avoids me having to fight against a style of objection that is really lamentable. (266) When a person trots out a certain number of features to which he believes he can give consistency in the form that one of the effects of what he calls the dream work is the violence it exercises on something whose material, when all is said and done, he does not at all contest belongs to language, it is a distortion, implied in a quite summary fashion with respect to what concerns the incidences of desire that characterise the dream. He can find, here and there, with no difficulty, in the text of Freud himself, a support for these remarks. But one cannot say that he contributes anything whatsoever to the essence of the question. I am not denying at all that, in the dream, language, if only because of the Rücksichtsdarstellbarkeit, considerations of representability, and many other things as well, undergoes extremely important distortions, contractions, deformations. Not only am I not denying it, but who would dream of denying it? If the dream interests me in so far as there appears in it, and from the first, this mechanism that I identified to metaphor and to metonymy because it forces itself on us, it is precisely in the measure that the dream is the royal road to the unconscious. It is not something different. It is not to exhaust the substance of the dream, so that it is not an objection to see something else intervening in it.

So then let us not insist too much on this article, except to mark that the confusion of notions of violence undergone with that of work is to say the least strange from the philosophical point of view. The confusion of dream work with violence is supposed to be a kind of representation which I am not denying, when all is said and done, is related to language, but whose whole interest would be to present to us in such a distorted fashion something quite curious and which obviously only draws its source from the fact of coming from a work place, whose principal goal is to distort what I am saying.

I ask myself moreover how it would it have been possible, in this same tender book, to set about distorting anything whatsoever if the material of what I say did not exist. (I am talking very specifically about the course of Mr Ricoeur).

M. Rudrauf: I think that this question of the dream as the royal road to the (267) unconscious is effectively directly linked to this discovery by Freud that the dream speaks, that the dream is structured like a language and that, to understand the dream, to interpret the dream, it is a matter of translating its language, of transforming what up to then appeared like a series of images into a linguistically organised series of signifiers.

The question I thought I was asking (I find it difficult to take up again the synthesis of this question) is the following: this language which is at the same time the path along which we are trying to arrive at the unconscious, and which is at the same time the object that we are searching for, this language what is it? And whose is it? This brings us back to the question of the subject in so far as it is a fact of language, and of language in so far as it is not language except in so far as it is for us revelatory of the subject, an act of the subject. It is at this level more or less that the question is posed.

J. Lacan: Language is not at all an act of the subject. A discourse can on occasion be an act of the subject. But language, precisely, puts us face to face with something as regards which it is altogether to make a jump, and an excessive jump, if you settle this point as regards which I am not saying either that we can say the contrary. I made an allusion to some dimensions. In particular to one of them which is called the undecidable. Why not use it on this occasion? I am not saying that we can prove that it is not an act of the subject. The fact of not being able to prove it, obviously, does not decide anything. But in any case this does not allow us either to affirm in any way that language is an act of the subject, which is obviously implied by the whole position described as the search, whatever it maybe, for the origin of language, which consists in imagining something that up to the present no one has managed to imagine in a satisfying way. Namely, how it could have happened one day that there were people who spoke.

I note simply that, in the history of linguistics, it is very precisely from the day when a certain number of people came together by engaging their honour to one another not to raise this question that linguistics was able to begin. This is simply a historical fact. It has no more of a consequence that one day, someone (he was called Lavoisier) said to himself, in all of these little manipulations by chemists, one should weigh what had gone into the sphere at the beginning and at the end. This does not mean that chemistry is all a matter of weighing, far from it, as was (268) proved by what followed. But here it is of the same order. It is a decisive act at the beginning. We are precisely going to abstain from thinking about everything that could emerge from language as an act of the subject. From that moment on, the extraordinary thing is that people made some valid discoveries in the matter of linguistics, which it must indeed be said, there was no trace of

before. It is all very well point out, there is no need to tickle one's brain to find that Cratylus is not so bad. So there were already people who are capable of saying things that were not bad, but this does not constitute in any way even the beginning of a science of language. Linguistics is born from a certain moment when as in all the moments of the birth of a science, it is a moment of that order, of a practical order, there is someone who began to fiddle with the material by imposing a certain number of exclusive laws on himself and limiting himself to a certain number of operations. From this moment on something is possible; it is no more demonstrative; it begins to become demonstrative from the moment that we pose ourselves questions about what can be called the subject-effect. Namely, how does the prohibition of a certain number of registers happen. Setting them aside allows there to be better determined what is happening as a subject-effect, which is not at all necessarily a subject homogeneous to the one that we have to deal with in the common, ordinary usage language. But when we prohibit precisely something that, when one looks at it closely, comes back to limiting language, not at all dominating it, overcoming it, inscribing it in anything whatsoever that might be called a meta-language or a meta-tongue, but on the contrary by isolating certain fields of it. And then subject-effects are produced which are not moreover necessarily human subjects or speaking subjects.

I think that the term "subject" to indicate the field of a science is not necessarily badly chosen either. I spoke about chemistry or about linguistics. There is a subject of chemistry, or linguistics, just as there is also a subject of modern logic. It is more or less established, it goes more or less far, it is more or less vague, it is altogether capital for us to take this sort of reference to know what we are saying when we are speaking about the status of the subject.

It is quite obvious that the status of the subject that we are dealing with in analysis is none of those subjects, nor indeed any of the other subjects that may be situated in the field of a currently constituted science.

(269) M Rudrauf: I would like to specify that when I said: "language is a act of the subject", I meant that the language that you give us, your act of discourse, is your act. But in the measure that language is not an act of the subject, I think that it ought to be defined as being the locus of the act of the other.

J. Lacan: Yes, it is risky. I will redirect the question to our dear Nassif, but Nassif has done on this point a work of condensing everything that I said last year, adding to it a note that we still have to take great advantage of. I do not want to abuse either him or you by asking him to answer you on this subject. It is very daring in any case what you have just said. It is more than daring, it can be criticised. Unfortunately our time is measured and I cannot give all its development to all of this.

I would like, because I always have a little scruple about making you go out of your way without you leaving with something in your knapsack, to try to take advantage of the fact that today we are an informal group. I insist - it is especially for me that this may be insulting, more than for anyone else - on the absence here, of a certain number of people who at other moments are assiduous in attending what I am putting forward this year in the seminar. Why are they not there? Is it because perhaps I might have summoned them to respond in my place to what is being stated here? Who knows? We do not know. It is perhaps for that reason. It is perhaps also because they have a sense of economising their time. So that if they believe they are going to find themselves fiddling around in what I am stating here, once this is only an attempt at work, they think that they will not get enough benefit from it. Who knows, that is another possibility. In short, I deplore it.

On the other hand, I am delighted at the presence of all of those who have been good enough to come to hear something. And it is for them and because we are in an informal group that after all I would like to be able to give you a sense of things - because there are also here many people I have admitted with pleasure, even though they are not analysts - give a sense of the, of the breadth of what is at stake, and also why I cannot say everything, or indeed particular things before just any audience, I mean before an audience that I can locate less well than I can by (270) looking at your faces, before the one that is here today. We write on the board:

All men love women

All psychoanalysts desire to know

I do not think

I am not

Precisely, this in order to presentify things since what is at stake are subjects, subjects that are obviously much less manageable and about which, luckily, linguistics gives us orientations.

It is quite obvious that we are already a little oriented, thanks to my discourse, not thanks to my language, thanks to my discourse. Here, these are subjects that we find at first sight, designated in Greek as what is usually called the grammatical subject, the subject of the sentence. It is on this occasion the subject that one can quite well introduce into propositional logic and rediscover the Aristotelian formula of predicative logic with the help of tiny changes:

all men are loving to women (sont aimant la femme)

all psychoanalysts are desiring to know (sont desirant savoir)

The interest of the matter is that these are propositions, which because of the presence of the all fall under the heading of what I introduced this year, and not without reason, as the implication of what is called the logic of quantification.

It is obvious that to write all men or to write all psychoanalysts, is a way that is distinct from the one that is going to be marked in the two other articulations underneath, by implying what I always put in question to distinguish it severely, by implying the stating subject in the statement.

This is obviously why the logic of quantification interests us, it is at the level of what is called the universal. And once you make the universal intervene, it is clear that what is interesting, what gives it its relief are things that I present to you here, in short, in a familiar way. I mean that it is not strictly rigorous from the point of view of proof. I mean that the remarks that I am going to make to you before leaving you, are rather things in which I am allowing myself a certain laxity with respect to certain requirements of rigour which are not vain, to which I am absolutely obliged to submit myself in a largely public discourse. Here, since it is on a friendlier basis, I can say things like the one that I am saying just now. Namely, that it is quite obvious for you to sense that the reason why this interests us, a formula like the one that all men, for example, are mortal, is in order to point out that there is something which is always profoundly elided. This gives it in a way its secret charm its sticky side, the side which means that we adhere so much, all the same, that we are so interested in these stupendously inane things, like the exemplary syllogisms that we are given. If truly all that was at stake was knowing that all men are mortal and that Socrates being a man, Socrates is mortal, those who do not understand it like that say - what they have always said: what is all that about? It is a petitio principii. If you have just said that Socrates is a man, how could you deny that Socrates is mortal, except by putting in question what you said first. It was Locke who discovered that it was a petitio principii.

This is a complete idiocy. There is no petitio principii, there is something whose interest lies quite elsewhere. Its interest is obviously in the following - it is in the conjurer's sleeves - that it is not at all vain to speak about Socrates on this occasion since Socrates is not mortal in the way that all other men are. And that this is precisely what, when all is said and done, captures and even excites us. It is not simply by a lateral incidence due to the particularity of the illustration, but because this indeed is what is in question right at the heart of logic. Always to know how one could be rid of this sacred stating subject, which is not done easily, and especially not at the level of quantification which is here particularly resistant.

It is not quite the same thing then as this quantified subject, as this much more disturbing subject that then for its part is qualified, is designated quite specifically and in a way that one could say is unveiled as the stating subject. What (272) linguistics has been indeed forced to recognise by giving to the "I" this definition of being the shifter which is the "chief raté", in other words the index of the one who is speaking. In other words "I" is variable at the level of each discourse, it designates the one who is giving it. From which there result all sorts of consequences, in particular that a whole series of statements that have "I" as subject are very disturbing. People have dwelt at length on the I am lying throughout the ages. That I for my part should have added to it the I do not think and I am not assuredly has its interest, an interest that you are all capable of seeing in all its developments. It is quite certain that it is much more interesting to dwell on how impossible the I am not is, than on the I am lying which is so self-evident that truly one cannot say it, as I might say. This I am not, is worth the trouble of dwelling on a little, especially if one can give it a support which is quite precise as regards what is at stake, namely, concerning the subject of the unconscious.

The fact is that, once you have noticed it - I do not know if you are there yet but it may come to you - it is when you have noticed the impossibility of saying at all that it is so, because it is, precisely, that is that I am not. It is just as true for you as for me, and that starting from the moment that you have noticed it, the I am appears to become not unpronounceable - it can always be pronounced - but simply grotesque.

Now these things are very important to realise, if they appear coherent and strictly coherent, from the introduction into a certain domain which is that of the questions that are posed by the existence or not of the unconscious.

In any case, it is naturally a matter of knowing why I am occupying myself this year with the psychoanalytic act on the one hand, and with the psychoanalyst on the other. Even though it is centred around this act (we are still with familiar language today, I repeat, "centred around" does not mean very much) that all men love women, is obviously false. In our day we have enough experience - it has always been known, precisely - let us say, in one half of society (speaking broadly) this is not true, it is false. But the fact that it is false does not solve anything. The important thing is not at all to know that it is grossly false. The important thing is to notice that if we can simply admit that if it is not true, it is because of the fact that there are some people who make a mistake. I do not know how well aware you are of this, the fact is that this seems to be the (273) hypothesis of psychoanalysis. Let us even say the following, let us be quite precise, I do not mean that psychoanalysis says that, in every case, that it is because there are people who make mistakes that they prefer something else. Psychoanalysis may well (here I am on velvet) allow itself every prudence. It may well say that there are some people, male homosexuals, for whom this is due to organic or grandular things or something or other of that kind. It may say something of this kind; that costs it nothing. Moreover, what is remarkable, is the number of things that do not cost it anything.

But as regards what does cost it, it is much less precise. But it seems that it has never asked itself the question of what is involved for those at least among whom it made the hypothesis intervene. The fact is if it is not true, it is because there are those - I am summarising - who make a mistake. This has its equivalent in analytic theory, but it is from this that it returns.

This is where I would like to remark the following, which is that it is a matter of knowing whether, yes or no, this thing, to which we may give the most subtle body all men love women (you will notice that I said "la femme, the woman") namely, the entity of the opposite sex. It is something that a psychoanalyst holds to be true or not. It is absolutely certain that he cannot hold it to be true because what psychoanalysis knows, is that all men love not the woman but the mother.

This has, of course, all sorts of consequences including that it may happen, in extreme cases, that men cannot make love with the women they love, because it is their mother. Why on the other hand they can make love with a woman on condition that she is a debased mother, namely, a prostitute.

Let us still remain in the system. I would like to pose the following question. In the case that a man can make love to the woman he loves - which also happens, he is not always impotent with the women he loves - I would like to know the following, what the following question implies, which is a slight modification of the universal statement that I wrote all men love women. Is it true that all men desire a woman (there, it is no longer la femme) when she is proposed to them as such, namely qua object within their reach?

(274) Let us suppose that there are no impotent people, let us suppose that there is no debasement of love-life. I am posing a question that clearly shows the distinction between what I will call the naturalist foundation, with what is called the organic reserve. For it is absolutely not the same thing to say, in the cases that we have to deal with in psychoanalysis, that there are cases which belong to the organic. It is not at all in the name of that that we want to pose the question of whether is it self-evident. And here you are going to see that you are forced to put things that sufficiently show the artificiality of what I am raising. Because I first have to tell you that outside every context, namely, the context of his engagements, of his links, of links that the woman previously has, of this or of that, is it a fact that it is, in principle, natural, let us say us, that in the situations which it is rather remarkable that novelists have been forced to give themselves all sorts of trouble to invent, namely, the situation that I will call - I do not know what to call it - it is unthinkable, the situation of the mountain chalet; a man, a woman normally constituted, they are isolated, as they say in nature - you always have to bring in nature on these occasions - is it natural that they should copulate? That is the question. It is a matter of the naturalism of the desirable.

Here is the question that I am raising. Why? Not at all to tell you things that are afterwards going to do the rounds of Paris, namely, that what Lacan is teaching, means that the man and the woman have nothing to do (rien á voir) together. I am not teaching it; it is true. Textually, they have nothing to do together. It is annoying that I cannot teach this without it giving rise to scandal. So then I do not teach it, I withdraw it.

It is precisely because they have nothing to do with one another that the psychoanalyst has something to do with this affair, cette affaire là, (let us write it on the board), Staferla. (You also have to know how to use a certain way of writing).

Naturally I do not teach it. Why? Because even if this is what emerges from a way that is strictly required from everything that psychoanalysis teaches us, namely, that it is never "who has tenus femina", I am saying "femina" not even "mulier" in so far as the "woman" is desired. That desire must be constructed upon a whole order of sources in which the unconscious is absolutely dominant and in which consequently there intervenes a whole dialectic of the subject.

To state in this bizarre fashion, that man and woman finally have no business with (275) one another, is simply to mark a paradox, but a paradox which has no more import but which is of the same order as this paradox in logic that I noted before you. It is of the same order as "I am lying " or Russell's paradox of the catalogue of all the catalogues that do not contain themselves. It is the same dependency.

There is obviously no interest in producing them as if it were a matter, precisely, of the only point at which this would constitute on this occasion no longer simply a paradox but a scandal, namely, if this were a naturalist reference.

When someone writes in a little note or elsewhere that, in the way that Lacan re-interprets Freud, it appears, it is a Freud-Lacan, there is an elision of what there would nevertheless be an interest in preserving, the naturalist reference. I ask on the contrary what can now subsist of the naturalist reference concerning the sexual act after the statement of everything that is articulated in Freudian experience and doctrine.

It is precisely by giving to these terms, "man and woman", a naturalist substratum that people are able to state things which might be presented in effect as follies. That is why I do not pronounce them. But what I am pronouncing today - there is a remarkably inadequate number of psychoanalysts here - is the following question. What does the clinician think "instinctively" - you may well imagine that a word like that never comes from my mouth by chance, - in the name of his clinical instinct - what a clinical instinct is remains to be defined - about the story of the mountain chalet?

You have all only to refer not only to your experience but to your innermost intuition. The chap who comes to tell you that he was with a pretty girl in a mountain chalet, that there was no reason to, not to have a go, simply he did not feel like it. You say "Oh! There is something ... something is not working". You first of all try to find out if he often has little blockages like that. In short, you launch yourselves into a whole speculation which implies that it ought to work.

This simply in order to show you that what is at stake is the coherence, the consistency of things in the mind of the analyst. For it the analyst reacts like that, instinctively, there is no need even to bring into play the clinical instinct. Behind, (276) there is the naturalist resonance, namely, that the man and the woman are made to go together. I am not saying the contrary. I told you: they can go together without having anything to do with one another. I told you that they had nothing to do with one another.

If the clinician, the clinical essence, intervenes to "wince" in a certain way, it is a matter of knowing if it is something that is – perhaps, why not, that does exist - simply of the order of common sense. I am not against common sense. Or it is something else that is at stake. Namely, whether he allows himself, as analyst, who has every reason to know, whether this woman who, I repeat, for the psychoanalyst is not at all automatically desired by the male animal when this male animal is a speaking being, this woman believes herself to be desirable. Because this is the best thing for her to do when she is embarrassed in a certain way. And then that leads us again a little bit further.

We, for our part, we know that as regards the partner, she believes she loves him, this is even what dominates. It is a matter of knowing why this dominates, in what is called her nature. We also know very well that what really dominates, is that she desires him. That is even the reason why she believes she loves him.

As regards the man, of course, we know the tune. For us it is everlastingly repeated. When it happens that he desires her, he believes he desires her but he is dealing on this occasion with his mother, so then he loves her. He offers her what? The fruit of the castration linked to this human drama. He gives her what he no longer has. We know all that. It goes against common sense.

Is it simply holding on to common sense which ensures that the analyst, with this clinical instinct, believes all the same that if on some occasion there is nothing of all that, because the novelist has done everything for it to be no longer on the horizon (the mountain chalet) if it does not work, it is because there is something wrong?

I am claiming that it is not simply because of common sense. I am claiming that something ensures that the psychoanalyst is precisely, in a way, installed, established, in something consistent. He is so for the very precise reason which ensures that all psychoanalysts desire to know, is just as false as what is stated above and we have to know why it is false. Naturally, it is not false because of the fact that it is false, because one can always write it, even if everyone knows that it is false. In both cases there is a misunderstanding somewhere.

(277) After having defined the psychoanalytic act which I defined in a very risky fashion, I even put in the centre this acceptation of being rejected like the o-object, it is enormous, it is new, no one ever said that, it becomes tangible, it is tangible. Someone could all the same try to contradict me, to say the contrary, to bring in something else, to raise an objection. It is curious that, since I said it, it is not so long ago that I put it in the forefront, no one has even simply begun to protest, to say something against it. Even though, in its essence it is absolutely outrageous, one could shout, say: "what sort of carry-on is this! The end of analysis has never been explained to us like that. What is this analyst who is rejected like a piece of shit"? Shit disturbs people enormously. There is not just shit in the o-object, but often it is as a piece of shit that the analyst is rejected. That depends uniquely on the psychoanalysand. It is necessary to know whether for him shit is really what was at stake. But it is striking that all the things I say, I can develop this discourse, articulate it, a whole lot of things can begin to turn around it before anyone dreams of raising the slighted protestation and giving another indication, another theory on the subject of the end of analysis. Curious, curious. This abstention is strange, because on the whole, it is something that involves all sorts of disturbing consequences. This might suggest a sort of inventiveness in contradiction. No, nothing!

So then, if no one brings up the slightest contradiction, it is because, all the same, people sense very well, know very well that the misunderstanding, whether we are dealing with the first proposition or the second, turns around the fact that the psychoanalyst, for his part, does not have to put his tuppence halfpenny in - it a metaphor, it means does not have anything to say about it - except in so far as he joins in the ballet. I mean the psychoanalyst. It is absolutely clear that we are lost if we start from the idea that the psychoanalyst is the one who knows better than anyone else, in the sense that, as regards this whole affair of what is involved in the sexual act and the status that results from it, he is supposed to have the distance which would ensure that he knows something about the matter.

This is absolutely not what is at stake. That is also why he does not have to take sides about whether it is natural or not natural, in what cases it is or in what cases (278) it is not. Simply he sets up an experiment in which he has to put his tuppence halfpenny worth in the name of this third function, this o-object, which plays the key function in the determination of desire. Which means that it is in effect the recourse of the woman, in what is involved in the embarrassment that the exercise of her enjoyment leaves her in her relation to what is involved in the act.

I can go further, I can say "what is forced on her" from elsewhere. Here I seem to be making a feminist claim but do not believe it, it is much wider than that. What is forced on her is in the structure, the one that designates her, in the subjective dramatisation of the sexual act, that forces on her the function of the little o-object. in so far as she masks what is at stake. Namely, a hollow, a void, this thing lacking at the centre and of which one can say - which is this thing that I tried to symbolise - that it seems that the man and the woman together - and hold on to the choice of terms that I have used, have nothing to do with one another (rien à voir ensemble). In other words, since she has no reason, for her part, to accept this function of little o-object, he finds himself simply on this occasion on the occasion of his enjoyment, and from the dependence of this on his relation to the act, noticing the power of deception, but a deception which is not hers, which is something other, which precisely is imposed through the establishment, on this occasion, of the desire of the male.

What the man discovers on his side is nothing other than his own impotence to aim at anything other than what? A knowledge, of course. No doubt there is somewhere and from the origin, to give ourselves over to developmental lucubrations, a certain knowledge about sex. But this is not what is at stake. It is not because all male and female children have sensations that they are not without some hold on and that they can more or less properly channel. What it is a matter of arriving at, knowledge of a sex, this is precisely what is at stake, it is that one never has knowledge of the other sex.

As regards what is involved in the knowledge of a sex, on the male side, it is much worse than on the female side.

You must not believe that when I say that there is no sexual act, I am pronouncing something that signifies in any way that what is happening should be put under the title of radical failure. Let us say that by taking things at the level of psychoanalytic experience, it demonstrates to us, by remaining at this level - you see that here I am making a reservation – that this knowledge of one sex for a male, when it is a matter then of his own, culminates in the experience of (279) castration. Namely, at a certain truth which is that of his impotence, of his impotence to do, let us say, anything full in the sexual act.

You see that all of this can go rather far, namely, this pretty literary hesitation between the power of the lie on the one hand and the truth of impotence on the other; there is an interlacing. You see then how easily all of this might tip over into a type of wisdom, indeed a teaching on sexology, as people might say, anything at all that could be resolved by means of an opinion survey. What I would like to point out, is that what is at stake, in specifying what a psychoanalyst is, is to take note that he has no right to articulate at any level whatsoever this dialectic between knowledge and truth in order to make of it a sum, an evaluation, a totality, by recording some failure or other. Because this is not what is at stake. No one is in a position to master what is at stake, which is nothing other than the interference of the function of subject in this act. And we cannot even say where in our experience - I mean analytic - its reference - let us not say "natural" since this is where it vanishes - but its biological reference is tangible.

The point that I am at when I tell you that the rule for the analyst to escape the vacillation which makes him tip over into a sort of an ethical teaching, is that he should notice what is involved in the question, at the very place of what conditions its essential vacillation. Namely, the little o-object, and that, rather than at the end of his years of experience, considering himself as a clinician namely, the one who, in every case, knows how to measure the cubic content of the affair, he should rather give himself - as I was saying the last time, at the end of my last discourse, at the high point of what I said the last time, before what I

call a larger audience - this reference, that I borrowed from the discourse of a previous year. Namely, I will not say the apologue because I never give apologues, I show you the reality of what is involved for the analyst imaged in other examples. It is not astonishing that these are examples taken from art, for example, something to take one's bearings from. Namely, in order to have a different kind of knowledge than this kind of fictional knowledge he has and which paralyses him, when he questions a case, when he carries out the anamnesis, when he prepares it, when he begins to approach it and once he enters it with the analysis, that he searches in the case, in the history of the subject, like (280) Velasquez in the picture of Las Meninas, where he, for his part was already the analyst at a particular moment and at a particular point of the history of the subject.

This will have one advantage. He will know what is involved in the transference. The centre, the pivot of transference, does not pass at all through his person. There is something that was already there.

This would give him a completely different way of approaching the diversity of cases. Perhaps, from that moment on he might manage to find a new clinical classification to that of classical psychiatry which he has never been able to touch or to shake and for a good reason, up to the now. He has never been able to do anything else than follow it.

I would like to image for you still more what is involved, and I would like to do it in the few minutes that I am accepting and that I thank you for giving me.

People speak about private life (vie privée). I am always surprised that this word "private life" should never have interested anyone, especially among the analysts who ought to be particularly interested by that. A life deprived (privée) of what? One could make rhetorical embellishments.

What is the private life? Why is it so deprived, this private life? That ought to interest you. From the moment one does an analysis, there is no longer a private life. It has to be said that women are furious when their husbands do an analysis, they are right. It is all very well for that to annoy us analysts, you have to recognise that they are right, because there is no longer a private life. That does not mean that it becomes public. There is an intermediary lock: it is a psychoanalysed, or psychoanalysing life. It is not a private life.

This is of a nature to make us reflect. After all why is it so respectable, this private life? I am going to tell you. Because private life, is what allows there to be maintained intact these famous norms that in connection with the mountain chalet, I was in the process of exploding. "Private" means everything that preserves on this delicate point of what is involved in the sexual act and of everything that flows from it, in the pairing of individuals, in the "you are my wife, I am your husband" and other essential devices on another register that we know well, that of fiction, this is what allows there to hold up in a field in which we analysts introduce an order of relativity which, as you see, is not at all easy to (281) master, and which can be mastered on a single condition. If we are able to recognise the place that we hold in it, we, as analysts, not as analysts who are subjects of knowledge but as analysts who are instruments of revelation.

Here there is posed the question of the private life of the analyst. I am only mentioning it in passing because naturally there are works that are widely diffused and which are tissues are stupidity and one of them has had the greatest success, where it is said that the qualification, the pinpointing of the good analyst, the least that one can require, is that he should have a happy life. It is adorable! And what is more, everyone knows the author; I do not want to start speculating. Anyway...

But that an analyst, for example, could maintain what I have just defined as being the status of private life, is really something! It is precisely because the analyst no longer has a private life that it is better, in effect, for him to keep many things under wraps. Namely, that if he, for his part, has to know what place he already was at in the life of his patient, the reciprocal is not inevitably necessary.

But there is a completely different plane on which it operates, this business of private life. It is precisely the one that I have just raised, namely, that of the consistency of discourse. It is precisely because the analyst is not able, up to the present, to sustain to any degree a discourse about his position, that he creates for himself all kinds of other ones. For him everything is good. He gives a sort of teaching that is like every other teaching, even though his ought in no way to resemble the others, no other one, namely, that he is teaching what? What is necessary for the taught who are already that, namely, to teach them, about the subjects in question, what they already know. Namely, precisely everything that is most irrelevant; every reference is the same to him; he will teach everything, anything whatsoever, except psychoanalysis.

In other words, what I took care to begin with by taking things at the lowest possible level, namely, what may seem to be the least contestable, and to show us that psychoanalysis precisely contests it. It is impossible to write, except by way of challenge, the two first lines that are there. What constitutes the status of the analyst is in effect a life that deserves to be called a private life. Namely, the status that he gives himself is properly the one in which he will maintain - it is constructed for that - the authorisation, the investiture of analysis, its hierarchy. (281) Ascending its grades, in such a way that at the level where for him this function, his own, may have consequences, the most risky of all, that of occupying the place of this little o-object, this allows him to preserve, nevertheless, stable and permanent, all the fictions that are most incompatible with what is involved in his experience and the fundamental discourse which establishes it as technique.

Here is what I am ending today for you, and will understand that I reserved it for a more limited audience, which is not obliged to drawn from it a harvest of scandals, of gossip or of bla-bla-bla.

8 and 15 May 1968: Notes

Since Lacan stood by the call for a strike by the S.N.E.S. [the union of teachers in higher education] he refused to give his seminar on the 8th and 15th May, but he was present, knowing that some of his audience would be there. He insisted on the fact that his discourse is addressed uniquely to psychoanalysts, and to them alone, and on the fact that these strikes give him time to read things that usually he only judges on the signature.

Then, as regards contemporary events, he highlights the effect of the shoulder-to-shoulder - of those who are batonned while singing the Internationale - as surface: those who are in this field allow themselves to be carried along by it with the feeling of absolute community.

He asks the question, that the events of the moment have again given rise to, of the responsibility of psychoanalysts. They are not at the university, and nevertheless the question of teaching is crucial for them. He then evokes his 1966 text "Science and truth" as having contemporary relevance for what is not simply unruliness, as Raymond Aron would like us to think. Contrary to the latter, for Lacan what is at stake is a structural phenomenon, in which the relations between desire and knowledge are put in question. These relations, which are those of the transmission of knowledge, psychoanalysis establishes on the level of lack, of inadequacy.

Once there is a question of dialogue, support should be taken on logic, even that of logicians, but in any case not on an energetics.

Evoking then the relations of expectations between psychoanalysts and insurgents, he says that if the psychoanalysts ought to expect something from the insurrection, the insurrection for its part only expects throwers of stones, which, like the tear gas, occupies the function of o-object.

The way for this whole insurrection was prepared in the cité universitiare of Nanterre, by the ideas of Reich. Ideas, says Lacan, that are demonstrably false. And this interests psychoanalysts, because it leads to the fact that anyone can say anything at all. The testimony of psychoanalysts as regards what they can say from a experience of language involving the relations of one sex to the other, is not simply passed over in silence or swamped in a flood of other things by psychoanalysts themselves but, when it is said, is not taken into account. It is all happening as if there never had been psychoanalysts.

Lacan insists on what has always guided him in his teaching: to give reference points, so that what is insisting can be heard. And his failure, with which he opens his publication, is that psychoanalysts make of it something of no importance. Psychoanalysts do not want to be up to what they have taken responsibility for.

Things exist and have their effects. There have to be people to take these effects into account and operate in their fields.

MEETING of 15 May 1968

I came here today, like last week, anticipating that there would be a certain number of people, as a way of keeping contact.

I am not going to give, any more than last week, what I habitually give under the heading of a class or a seminar. This in the measure that I am keeping to the call for strike action that I think exists at this time in the Syndicat Nationale de l'Enseignement Supérieur.

This is a simple question of discipline. It is nevertheless not enough to do what would be desirable – to be worthy of the events that are taking place.

In truth it is not very convenient for many people. Since I for my part have only to concern myself with psychoanalysts – I have always underlined it, I am not going to deny now what I always took care to repeat – am only addressing myself to psychoanalysts. It is for psychoanalysts that I have sustained for several years a work that is not meagre. I would even say up to a certain point that this is an opportunity for me to realise it because the simple fact of not having to prepare one of these seminars (since it was already prepared for the last time) I feel as a great relief for me.

Naturally this opens the door to all sorts of things. By the same token I notice something that effort and work always mask, namely, my dissatisfactions. It also gives me the opportunity also perhaps to read articles that I necessarily let pass like that, and only read their signatures. You have even to read the articles of people that you know in advance there is nothing to be expected (286) from. I have on occasion been very surprised. (I am speaking about articles by my colleagues, of course.)

Anyway, for the moment, to be worthy of the events, I would say that even though psychoanalysts bear witness to their sympathy for those caught up in pretty hard encounters, for which one needs to have – and this should be underlined – great courage. You would have to have received, as we analysts do, the testimony of what is experienced at these moments to measure better and at its true value what is represented by this courage. Because from the outside, like that, you can admire, of course, but you cannot always realise that the merit is no less great because these lads are really at certain moments carried away by the feeling of being absolutely bound to their comrades. They express this as they want to, that it is exalting to sing the International while being battened, this is the surface. The International is a very fine song,

but I do not think that they would have this irrepressible feeling that they could not be anywhere other than where they are if they were not carried along by a feeling of absolute community, there, in action with those they are shoulder to shoulder with. This is something that should be explored - as people say without knowing what they are saying – in depth.

I mean that it does not seem to me, to come back to our psychoanalysts, that the fact of signing, in this connection, even if there also people are very much shoulder to shoulder (but of course it is not quite the same thing), 75 people can, this is the number mentioned last night, sign a text protesting against the regime and its operatives (I mean its police operatives). Of course it is meritorious and one would not turn anyone away from putting his signature at the bottom of such a protest, but it is slightly inadequate, it is clearly not enough. If everyone signs it, people coming from every origin and horizon, fine, but to sign as a psychoanalysts – besides it was very quickly opened to people coming from psychology – appears to me to be a rather comfortable way of doing what I was saying earlier: to consider that one had done one's bit for the events.

It seems that when something of this order occurs, of such a seismic order, one could perhaps question oneself when one has had a responsibility oneself. (287) Because after all psychoanalysts had responsibilities, one cannot say in education because they are not in it, any of them. I am in it like that on the edges, on the margin but none of them is properly speaking in the University. But it is not just the University that has responsibilities in teaching. Perhaps after all one might say to oneself that the psychoanalysts did not concern themselves much with what, after all, by being connoted easily at the level of relationships, that since they are collective relationships, fell no less directly under a certain heading, under a certain field, under a certain knot that is their own. Let us try call that without insisting too heavily on the fact that after all I myself highlighted that somewhere in my Ecrits there is a text called Science and truth which is not completely out of season, since it has a little idea that one cannot reduce what is happening to what we might call the effects of a turbulence that is more or less everywhere.

There is someone whom I could not say I do not esteem, he is a comrade, we sat on the same benches, with links together and we got to know one another. It is a friend, M Raymond Aron, who published an article this morning in a paper that reflects the thinking of honest people who says: it is happening everywhere. But in saying that, for him that means, precisely, they are disturbed everywhere. Everyone must calm them down depending on what is not working out in each place. It is because in all these places there is something that is not working out that they are creating a disturbance. It is beginning as you know in Columbia, namely, in the middle of New York (I had very precise echoes very recently) and now it is going to Warsaw. I do not need to draw a map. What people do not want to ask themselves, or at least want resolutely to put to one side, which is the sense of this article, written in a very fine tone, is that there must be here a much more structural phenomenon. Since I made an allusion to this quarter, this knot, this field, for me it is quite clear that the relationships between desire and knowledge are put in question. Psychoanalysis also allows this to be tied to a level of shirking, of inadequacy that is properly speaking stimulated, evoked by these relationships which are relationships of the transmission of knowledge. As an echo there reverberate all kinds of currents, elements, forces as they say, a whole dynamic. And on this point I allude again to the article I read recently. (288) There was an insistence on the fact that in a certain order of teaching – my own, to name it –the whole dimension of energetics is supposed to be neglected.

I much admire the fact that these energeticists have not noticed the underlying displacements of energy that may be here. Perhaps this energy has a certain interest as a theoretical evocation, and to tie things together at the level of a logical or logicist reference, on an occasion when people are talking a lot about dialogue, might have a certain interest.

In any case I think, and I am it seems to me confirmed by the events in the fact of finding that this is the articulatable, manipulatable part of what we have to deal with. I am not wrong in leaning on it as much as I can. Where this is not done, where people even think they ought not to do it, where people freely talk about intellectualising – this is the big word as you know – we find no proof of a particular sense of orientation as regards what is happening nor a more correct estimate of the weights in question nor of the true and authentic energetics of the thing.

I note in passing, a simple pinpointing for your information. We had at a meeting last night, in this thing called my Ecole, one of the heads of this insurrection, a not too badly shaped head. In any case he is not someone who lets himself be taken in nor does he say silly things. He knows how to give a quick answer and when he was asked a rather touching question, I must say, like the following: "Tell us, my friend, from the point that you are at, what might you expect from psychoanalysts?" This is an absolutely crazy way of posing the question! I kill myself saying that psychoanalysts ought to expect something from the insurrection and there are those who retort: what does the insurrection expect from us? The insurrection answers them: what we expect from you for the moment, this is the time to help throw some paving-stones!

As a way of lightening the atmosphere a little, I point out that in that case – it is a discreet indication – that at the level of dialogue, the paving-stone fulfils exactly a function that has been foreseen, the one I called the o-object. I already indicated that there is a certain variety in the o-object. The fact is the paving-stone is an o-object that that responds to another that is really, for its part, capital for any future ideology of dialogue when it starts from a certain level: the one called a tear-gas grenade!

(289) Let us leave that. We learned in effect, from an authorised speaker (who found himself taking an immediate advantage about what could have unfolded differently) that at the start, all the disturbances at the start in a certain field, and specifically at Nanterre (this was really news) we learned that the ideas of Reich – you can believe me if you like, many of the people here are disposed to believe something because I transmit it to them, that astonishes me but it is true – really opened things up for them. And this in term of the very precise conflicts that manifested themselves in a certain cité universitaire. It is interesting all the same. It is interesting for psychoanalysts who may consider – this is my own position – that Reich's ideas are not simply incomplete, that they are demonstrably, fundamentally false.

The whole of psychoanalytic experience, if we really want to articulate it and not consider it as a kind of locus of whirlpools, of confused forces, an energetics of life instincts and death instincts co-embracing one another, if we really want to put a bit of order into what we objectify in an experience that is a language experience, we will see that Reich's theory is formally contradicted by our everyday experience.

Only since analysts do not testify to absolutely anything of things that might really interest everybody precisely on this subject of the relationships of one sex to another, things of this order are really open. I mean that anybody can say anything he wants. And this is seen at every level.

I was reading yesterday – since I have been left time to read – a little organ called Concilium (this is something done by priests). There were two rather brilliant articles on the accession of women to the functions of the priesthood, in which there were discussed a certain number of categories, that of the relationships of the man and of the woman. It is exactly, of course, as if psychoanalysts had never said anything about it. Not, of course, because the authors do not read psychoanalytic literature. They read everything. But if they read this literature they will find nothing that brings them anything new whatsoever as compared to what has always been discussed about this confused notion: who, the man or the woman, is, with regard to anything you (290) wish, Being, more superior, more worthy and all the rest of it. Because when all is said and done, it is all the same striking that what has been denoted by psychoanalysts at the level of experience, has been so perfectly swamped by them that when all is said and done it is exactly as if there had never been any psychoanalysts.

Obviously, all of this is a point of view that you may perhaps consider a bit personal. It is obvious that in this kind of note with which I believed I should open on a certain tone a certain publication which is mine and that I accentuate with a denotation that I call failure. Namely, that almost everything that I, for my part, tried to articulate - and that I must say it is enough to stand back from a little to see that it is not only articulated but articulated with a certain force and will remain like that attached as a testimony to something in which one can find one's bearings, where there is a north, a south, an east and a west, this will be seen perhaps, in short, when the psychoanalysts are no longer there to surrender it, by the very fact of what they do with it -has absolutely no bearing.

Meanwhile, people sign manifestos of solidarity with the students as would also be done when anyone at all might get beaten up in an affray.

In short, all the same there is this something that is happening, something that can be found well written in advance. I said that in any case even if the psychoanalysts do not want at any price to be worthy of what they have charge of, what they have charge of nevertheless exists, and in any case will make its effects no less felt – the first part of my propositions, we have got there – and it will all the same be necessary for there to be people who try to be worthy of a certain type of effect, those that were there in a way, offered and predestined to be treated by some people in a certain framework. If it is not they it will be certainly others, because there is no example that when effects become a little insistent, it must all the same be noticed that they are there and try to operate in their field.

I said this to you like that, so that you would not have put yourselves out in order to hear nothing.

Lecture of 19th June. 1968

(293) I am not a fake: I did not give notice that I would say a few words to close the present year. as the document of the Ecole puts it. in order to give you what is called a seminar. I will rather say a few words of a ceremonial order.

This year. if I remember rightly. I made an allusion somewhere to the sign of the opening of the year in traditional civilisations. This time. it is for the school year that is ending.

There may remain some regrets that after having opened up a concept like the psychoanalytic act. fate decided that you would only have on this subject half of what I had intended to say about it; half ... in truth a little less because the entry procedures. for something that is so new, which had never been articulated as a dimension, as is the case for the psychoanalytic act, required in effect some time to open it up.

In truth, things do not have the same speed. It is rather something like when a falling body is subjected to the same force, during its fall, its movement, as they say, accelerates. So that you have not had half of what there was to be said about the psychoanalytic act; let us say that you have had a little less than a quarter of it.

It is very regrettable from some points of view, because in truth. it is not my custom to end so late, and in a way by a lucky fluke. something that was interrupted for whatever reason. internal or external.

(294) In truth. my regret is not unaccompanied by another aspect of some satisfaction. Because indeed in this case. the discourse was not interrupted by just something indifferent. but by something which brings into play. certainly at a very baby level. but which brings into play all the same some dimension which is not altogether unrelated to the act. So that. good God. it is not so dissatisfying.

Obviously. there is a little discord in all of that. The psychoanalytic act. this dissertation that I was projecting. was forged for psychoanalysts. as they say. matured by experience. It was destined above all to allow them. and at the same time to allow others. a more correct estimate of the weight that they have to lift. when something precisely marks a dimension of paradox. of internal antinomy. of profound contradiction that does not fail to allow us to conceive of the difficulty that is represented for them in having to bear its weight.

It must be said. that it is not those who best know this weight in practice. who have shown the most lively interest for what I was saying. At a certain level. I must say that they really distinguished themselves by an absence that was certainly not due to chance.

So that, because we are at it, I will tell you by the way a little anecdote to which I already made an allusion, but that I am going to clarify further. One of these people, to whom I had gallantly sent a little letter to ask him whether this absence was an act, replied: "What are you thinking about! Not at all! It is neither an act, nor a parapraxis. As it happens this year, I made an appointment at 11.30 for a long job (he was having work done on his teeth) with a very capable practitioner, at 11.30 every Wednesday". It is not an act, as you can see. It is pure chance.

This tempers for me the regret that something remains as it were in suspense in what I have to transmit to the psychoanalytic community and very especially to the one that goes under the title of my School.

On the contrary, a certain dimension of the act which has, for its part also, its ambiguity, which is not necessarily made up of parapraxes, despite the fact that it gives plenty of work to those who would like to think things out in the traditional terms of politics. All the same, something was found, I mean just now, that the babies brought up one fine day under the heading (295) of act, which may well, like that, give some people work to do in the years to come.

In any case the question - and that is why today I wanted to address a few words to you, precisely to know if I am right to find in this something like a little balance or compensation, to feel myself in a way a little bit relieved of my own responsibility.

For after all, if it is in connection with psychoanalysis, or more exactly about the support it offered me and because this support was the only one, that it was not possible otherwise to grasp a certain knot or, if you wish, a ball, something singular, not located up to then in something that it is not easy to give a label to in our day, given that there are a certain number of traditional terms that are going down the drain: man, knowledge, knowledge, as you wish, this is not quite what is at stake. This particular knot which over there I was able with a red pencil ... on this kind of a knot-bubble that you know well. It is the famous internal eight that I have been producing for some eight years, these terms: knowledge, truth, subject and the relation to the Other, there you are, there is no word to put all four of them together. These four terms have nevertheless become essential for something that is to come, a future that may interest us, those of us who are here, in an amphitheatre not simply to be the plaint in the complaint but precisely with a concern to know. This teaching which showed something or other in terms of dissatisfaction, we can perhaps have a concern for what, after this great tearing apart that makes it so obvious that there is something in that quarter that is no longer working. What was infatuated with a term that is not at all random, the University, that takes its authority from the universe, this precisely is what is at stake.

Does the universe hold up? The universe has made many promises, but it is not sure that it is keeping them. It is a matter of knowing if something that was announced, that was a kind of opening out of the gap of the universe will be sustained long enough for us to see the last word on it.

This question passes by way of what we have seen manifesting itself these last months, in a place, like that, that is bizarrely permanent in history. We have seen the function of place being re-animated. It is curious. It is essential. Perhaps we would not have seen things crystallise so vividly if there had not been a place to which they always returned to be beaten up.

(296) You must not imagine that what is being opened up, what was opened up as a question in this place, is the privilege of our national fabric. I have been, as a way of getting some fresh air, for two days in Rome where such things are not conceivable simply because in Rome there is no Latin Quarter. This is not a simple chance! It is funny but anyway that is how it is.

There were things there that really pleased me. It is easier to pick out there those who know what they are doing. A little group. I did not see a lot of them but even if I had only seen one of them that would have been enough. They are called the Birds, Ucelli.

As I said to one of those close to me, in Italy I am - to my amazement, it has to be said, it is the term that is used: (I am ashamed!) - popular. That means that they know my name. Naturally they do not know anything I have written! But, this is what is curious, they know that the Ecrits exist.

We have to accept that they do not need them, for the Ucelli, the birds in question, for example to be capable of actions like the one that obviously have the same relation to Lacanian teaching that the posters of the Beaux-Arts have with what is at stake politically, truly. But that means that they have a quite direct relation. When the dean of the Faculty in Rome, accompanied by an eminent representative of the Vatican intellgentsia, gives to them, all gathered together because there are general assemblies there also at which people speak to them, people are for dialogue, naturally where it is useful. So then the Ucelli come with one of these big devices that exist, when you go to a restaurant in the country, in the centre of a round table, there is an enormous umbrella, they all go under it for protection, they say, from language!

I hope you understand that that leaves me with some hope. They have not yet read the Ecrits, but they will read them! Do they really need them since they have discovered that? After all, the theoretician is not the one who finds the way. He explains it. Obviously, the explanation is useful to find the rest of the path. But, as you see, I trust them. If I have written some little things that might have been of use to psychoanalysts, this will be of use to others whose place, whose determination is quite specified by a certain field. This field is circumscribed by this little knot (see the scheme) that is constructed in a certain way by cutting into a certain bubble (297) extraordinarily purified by the antecedents of what culminated at this adventure that I tried to map out before you as being the moment that science was engendered.

So then, this year, in connection with the psychoanalytic act, I had come to the moment when I was going to show you what is involved in having to take up one's place in the register of the subject supposed to know, and this precisely when one is a psychoanalyst. Not that he is the only one but that he is particularly well placed to know its radical division. In other words this position, inaugural for the psychoanalytic act, that consists in operating on something to which your act gives the lie. This is why I have reserved throughout the years, kept under covers, put to one side the term Verleugnung that undoubtedly Freud brings up in connection with an exemplary moment of the Spaltung of the subject. I wanted to reserve it, to bring it to life there where undoubtedly it is pushed to its high point of pathos, at the level of the analyst himself.

(298) Because of that, I had to undergo, throughout the years, the harassment of those individuals who followed on the trace of what I contribute to see where they could patch together a little piece, where I might stumble. When I be spoke about Verwerfung, which is an extremely precise term, and which situates perfectly what is involved in psychosis, people reminded me that it would be cleverer to use Verleugnung. In any case you find traces of all that in pathetic lectures and mediocre articles. The term Verleugnung could have taken on its authentic place and its full weight, if I had been able to speak to you this year as I had intended.

It was the next step to take. There were others that I cannot even indicate. Undoubtedly, one of the things that most struck me in the course of a teaching experience which you will allow me today to cast a backward glance at, precisely at this turning point, is the violence of the things that I allowed myself to say. Twice at St Anne's, for example, I said that psychoanalysis was something that at least had this in its favour that in its field - what a privilege! - blackguardism could only turn into stupidity. I repeated it on two consecutive years like that, and I knew what I was talking about!

We are living in an area of civilisation where, as they say, there is free speech, namely, that nothing of what you say is of any consequence. You can say anything whatsoever about someone who may well be at the origin of some of indecipherable murder or other; you can even create a play about it. The whole of America - the New York part, no more - crowds into it. Never previously in history would such a thing have been

conceivable without the theatre being immediately closed. In the land of liberty, one can say everything, because this has no consequences.

It is rather curious that from the moment simply when some little paving stones start flying, for at least a moment everyone has the feeling that the whole of society might be involved in it in the most direct way in its daily comfort and its future.

We have even seen psychoanalysts questioning the future of the trade. To my eyes, they were wrong to question it publicly. They would have done better to keep it to themselves, because all the same, the people who saw them questioning themselves about it, precisely when they were questioning them about something completely different, found this a little funny. In any case one cannot say that the stock of psychoanalysis rose!

(299) I have a crow to pluck with the General. He stole a word from me that for a long time I had - it was certainly not of course for the use that he made of it: psychoanalytic disorder (chienlit). You cannot imagine for how long I wanted to give that as a title to my seminar. Now the chance has gone!

But then I am going to tell you, that I do not regret it because I am too tired. It is visible enough like that. I have no need to add a commentary.

In any case there is one thing all the same that I would really like - not everyone would like it but I really would - teaching psychoanalysis in the Faculty of Medicine.

You know there are some very restless people around, I do not know what has got into them, who push themselves forward to be there, in that place. I am not speaking about anyone from the Ecole Freudienne de Paris. I know well that in the Faculty of Medicine, they know the history of medical doctrines. That means that things have happened there, of the order of, to our eyes, with the perspective of history, of the order of mystification. But that does not mean that psychoanalysis as taught where it is officially taught - they talk to you about libido as if it were something that passed into communicating vessels, as an absolutely unbelievable personage expressed it, at the start of the time when I began to try to change things a little, as a libidinal hydraulics - to teach psychoanalysis as it is taught, let us say the word, at the Institute. That would be marvellous especially at the time that we are living through, when all the same those taught, as they say, are starting to be a bit demanding. I find that marvellous. You should see what is done in certain quarters in terms of a teaching of psychoanalysis. And after having done this little survey you will have been shown the hopes for better times that the course of events reserves for some people. You will tell me, of course, that the personage in question, for example, could always set about teaching Lacan. Obviously it would be better! But again he would have to be able to do it! Because there is a certain article that appeared in Les cahiers de psychoanalyse on the o-object in connection with which, (I regret to say it, this again is going to shock some of my closest and dearest colleagues), it was nothing but a long little squib of laughs for these damned Normaliens, as it happens. For my part, I was forced in a little discreet note, somewhere,

just before my Ecrits appeared, to indicate that, whatever may be the need one may have (300) to work on psychoanalytic marketing, it is not enough to talk about the o-object for it to be quite that!

In any case, I would like to take things from a slightly higher level. And since I have prepared a few words - not these, I must say that I let myself go a little given the warmth, the familiarity, the friendship that I find in this company, namely, faces of which there is not one that I do not recognise because of having seen them from the beginning of this year - since I spoke about these four terms, let us map out, for those who are a little short sighted and who might not be aware of the quite critical importance of a certain conjuncture, let us recall their principal articulations. Namely, first of all knowledge because, when all is said and done, it is all the same rather curious on the side of knowledge, up to the present, in the classics, that people are wise, and one part of the wise position is obviously to keep quiet. That it should be at the level and as is very correctly said at a privileged level of the transmission of knowledge that so many things are happening, makes it perhaps worth the trouble to take advantage of stepping back a little to take a look.

There is a function, naturally, I apologise to the people who are here - there are a few - who are coming here for the first time, and come in order to see a little what I might say if I was questioned about the "events". I am not going to be able to give the theory of the Other, and this is already something that makes such a conversation, such an interview, very difficult. What the Other is must be explained. We begin with it because it is the key. So then for people who do not know what the Other is, I can say that on the one hand I defined it strictly as a locus, the locus where the word has taken its place. That is not self-explanatory: the locus where the word has taken its place. But in any case it is a quite indispensable topological function to bring out the radical and logical structure that is at stake in what I called earlier this knot or this bubble, this hollow in the world in connection with which there is the notion, this old notion of subject. The old notion of subject which is no longer reducible to the image in the mirror, nor to anything whatsoever of the order of an omnipresent reflection. But effectively this bubble still wanders around as a result of which this world is no longer properly speaking a world. This Other has been there for a long period of time, of course. It has not really being separated out because it is a good place and because there had already been installed in it something that is still there for many of you, called God. Il vecchio con la barba! He is still there. The psychoanalysts have not really added very much to (301) the question of whether, an essential point, whether he exists or does not exist. As long as this or is maintained, he will be always there.

Nevertheless, thanks to the bubble we can act as if he were not there. We can deal with his place. There was never any doubt that at his place precisely there lay what was at stake as regards knowledge. All knowledge comes to us from the Other - I am not talking about God I am talking about the Other. There is always an Other where there is a tradition, an accumulation, a reservoir.

No doubt people suspected that things could happen. That was called discovery, or even again one of these changes of lighting, one of these ways of dispensing teaching that, in a way, changed its accent and its sense, which ensured precisely that for a certain time, it still held up. Have you ever noticed that what ensures that a teaching gains a foothold, is perhaps that precisely in a certain way of redistributing it, there is inscribed in its design, in its outline, in its structure something that is not immediately said, but is what is heard? Why after all would the subject not appear a little bit worn out for those on the benches? I mean that what is not said to be understood still needs to be something worth the trouble and not a simple hypocrisy, for example. There is some reason, in fact, that it was in the Faculty of Letters or again in the Schools of Architecture that things really became enflamed.

To this relation of the subject to the Other, psychoanalysis contributes a radically new dimension. It is more than what I called just now, like that, a discovery. A discovery still preserves something anecdotal about. This is a profound modification of the whole relationship.

There is a word that I brought in here a few years ago, into this dialectic. It is the word truth. And then, in truth, before articulating it precisely as I did here on a particular day, the perfectly logical mark of which the article Truth and science, in my Ecrits bears witness to, I had given to the word another function, in an article called The Freudian thing, where one can read these terms: Me, the truth, I speak.

Who? The I that is speaking? This piece, in truth a prosopopoeia, one of these enthusiastic games that I happened to allow myself to articulate for the centenary of (302) Freud, and at Vienna. It was rather a scream of the order of what Münch put so well into a celebrated engraving, this twisted mouth in which we see arising the sublime annihilation of a whole landscape.

A long time ago, in Vienna, I said it especially there where people had not heard for a long time the word truth. It is a very dangerous word. Apart from the use that is made of it when it is castrated, namely, in logical treatises. We know for a long time that people do not know what it means.

What is truth? This is precisely the question that must not be asked. I made an allusion in Lyon when I was speaking there last October to a certain piece by Claudel, a very brilliant one that I recommend to you. I did not have time to find the page for you before coming here - I did not know that I was going to speak about it - but you will find it by searching carefully in the subject index of Claudel's prose, if you look for Pontius Pilate, naturally.

This text describes all the misfortunes that happen to this benevolent colonial administrator for having pronounced in the wrong place at the wrong time this question: "What is truth?"

Among people who for the moment situate themselves in this futile zone of these chaps to whom it is dangerous to state psychoanalytic truth, who give a terrible application to these words picked up in turning one of my pages Me the truth I speak, they are going to tell the truth in places where there is no need for it but where it has its effect.

It is very possible that a particular thing that people succeeded in damping down so well under the name of class struggle all of sudden becomes a very dangerous thing. Naturally, one can count on the healthy functions that have existed from all time to maintain what is at stake, namely, to leave things in the field of the sharing out of power.

Make no mistake, people who know a little bit about the handling of truth are not that imprudent. They have the truth, but they teach: all power comes from God. All. That does not allow you to say that it is only the power that suits them. Even the power that is against God comes from God, for the Church. Dostoyevsky grasped that very clearly. Since he believed in the truth, God put him into a blue funk. That is why he wrote The grand inquisitor. It was the conjunction, in short, foreseen in advance, of Rome and (303) Moscow. I think that all the same some of you have read it. But it is almost done, my little friends, and you see clearly that it is not as fantastic as that! When you are in the order of power, everything can be arranged!

That is why it is useful for the truth to be somewhere, in a strongbox. Privilege, revelation, is the strongbox.

But if you take seriously Me, the truth, I speak this can at first have, alas, great disadvantages for the one who takes this path.

Let us see all the same what novelty we analysts may have contributed to it. Obviously our field is very limited. It is at the level of the bubble.

How is the bubble defined? Its import is very limited. If after so many years, after having shown what is properly speaking its structure, I am now speaking to you about logic, it is not by chance. It is because, all the same, it is clear that this knowledge that interests us analysts is properly speaking only what is said. If I say that the unconscious is structured like a language, it is because this unconscious that interests us is what can say itself and that in saying itself, it generates the subject.

It is because the subject is a determination of this knowledge that it is what runs under this knowledge but does not run there very freely, that it encounters stumbling blocks. It is for this reason and for none other that we have to deal with a knowledge. Anyone who says the contrary is led onto paths that I earlier called those of mystification. It is because the unconscious is the consequence of what has been able to be circumscribed that has shown that this relation to discourse has much more complex consequences than had been seen up to then. It is specifically that the subject by being secondary with respect to knowledge, appears not to say everything that it knows, a point that was not doubted, even if for a long time people suspected it does not know everything it says.

This is the point that allowed the constitution of the bubble: it resides very precisely in the fact that in this connection we grasp how the dimension of truth is produced. The truth. this is what psychoanalysis teaches us. lies at the point where the subject refuses to know. Everything that is rejected from the symbolic reappears in the real. This is the key to what is called the symptom. The symptom. is this real knot where the truth of the subject lies.

(304) At the beginning - very early on - of these little episodes. I told that you: "They are the truth". They are the truth. does not mean that they tell it. The truth is not something that knows itself like that. without labour. This is even why it takes this body that is called the symptom. that it demonstrates where is the lair of what is called the truth.

So then this refused knowledge that you come looking for in the psychoanalytic exchange. is it the knowledge of the psychoanalyst? Illusion. The psychoanalyst knows something perhaps: he knows in any case about the nature of the truth. But for the rest. namely. about refused knowledge, he does not know very much. That is why the teaching of psychoanalysis taken at the level of what is supposed to be substantial appears for what it is. pantaloonary. The libido that I spoke to you about earlier for example. if this means what I call desire. it is really rather piquant that it was discovered. tracked down. in the neurotic. namely. in the one whose desire is only sustained by fiction. To say that they are the truth is certainly not to deliver it to you. neither to you nor to them. But it is perhaps of some importance that one should know this mechanism of an exchange. a strange exchange which ensures that what is said by the subject. whatever it may be. whether he knows it or not. only becomes knowledge by being recognised by the Other. And this precisely moreover is what is meant by the quite primitive. rough-hewn notion. called censorship. It is the Other that for a long time. during the time of authority. always defined what could be said and what could not be. But it would be quite vain to link that to configurations that experience clearly shows. because they can be null and void. already were so when they were functioning.

It is in a structural way that it is only at the level of the Other that what determines the subject is articulated in knowledge. Stating. the subject of which is not at all necessarily the one who was speaking. stating - by the other – designates the one who said it. The Other was first of all the one he always was when the analyst interprets. and who says to the subject "you I" (this I that is you) I am saying: is that. And as it happens this has consequences. It is what is called interpretation. For a time this Other who was a philosopher. forged for his part. the subject supposed to know. It was already a deception as can be seen by simply opening Plato. He made the poor subject say everything that he wanted him to say. At the end. the subject learned. He learnt to say by himself "I say: black is not white", for example. "I say: either it is true or it is false". But (305) the total of what I am saying there. is certainly true because: either it is true or it is false.

Naturally. it is as childish as the movement of the 22nd March. It is not true that: either it is true or it is false. But that can be sustained. The subject has learned to endorse with an I say something that he declared himself ready to answer in a debate whose rules were fixed in advance, and that is what is called logic.

A strange thing. It is from what was purified by this path of the isolation of logical articulation, by the detaching of the subject from everything that can happen between him and the Other (and God knows things can happen, up to and including prayer) that there emerged science, knowledge. Not just any kind of knowledge, a pure knowledge that has nothing to do with the real, nor at the same time, with the truth. Because the knowledge of science is, as compared to the real, what is called in logic the complement of a language. It functions alongside the real. But it bites on the real. It introduces the bubble, namely, after all, something that, from the point of view of knowledge, has no more importance than a gag. But it finally gives the only thing that after all really incarnates Newton's laws, namely, the first Sputnik, which is undoubtedly the best gag that we have seen because it throws everything into question, it Gag...arins it. Because what has it to do with the cosmos, in so far as we have a relation with it, that one can set about turning around the world six times in 24 hours, in a way that undoubtedly completely transcends the understanding of those who believed that movement was related to effort?

Anyway the bubble has made others its own since then. Only there remains a residue of it, in a way. It is that the one who speaks is not always capable of saying I say as is proved - it is in this way that we are witnesses, we psychoanalysts – by the fact that we, psychoanalysts, are capable of telling him what he is saying. W were able in a small number of cases, especially if they put an enormous amount of goodwill into it, if they come to us to speak enormously, it can happen that we interpret something to them and what does it mean to interpret something? We never interpret the world for them; we bring them, like that, a little piece of something that appears to be something that has kept its place in their discourse without them knowing it. Where do we analysts pull this out of? There is something that I would have liked to have made you meditate on this (306) year, it is the frozen words of Rabelais. In truth, like many things, is has already been written for a long time, but no one has noticed it. I put a strong emphasis on a certain Mr Valdemar described by Poe. I made what one could call a satirical use of him. I spoke in this connection about something that is nothing other than what I denounced here one more time, namely, this survival of the Freudian discourse and of the dead societies that it appears to keep talking.

It is a myth that goes much further. What interpretation uncovers is not always very clear as regards what is at stake, whether they are the realities of life or of death. What I would have led you towards this year, if I had been able to speak about the psychoanalytic act up to the end, would have been in order to tell you that it is not for nothing if I spoke to you about the desire of the psychoanalyst. Because it is impossible to draw it elsewhere than from the phantasy of the psychoanalyst. And this is what undoubtedly may give you the shivers. But we are not next or near it in our day - that it is from the phantasy of the psychoanalyst, namely, from what is most opaque, most closed, most autistic in his word that there comes the shock by which the word is unfrozen in the analysand, and in which there comes to be multiplied insistently this function of repetition in which we can allow him to grasp this knowledge of which he is the plaything.

Thus it is confirmed that the truth makes itself known through the Other. This justifies that it has always emerged in this way. What we know more, is that it is in relation to the Other which no longer has anything mystical or transcendental about it that this is produced. And the knot whose curve I drew on the blackboard in the form of this little loop which is there and which can almost, you see, be close to appearing to be nothing more than a circle, to be fused in its duplicity as loop. This is what experience teaches us. Namely, that the subject supposed to know, where it truly is, namely, not us, the analyst, but in effect what we suppose this subject knows. This in so far as it is unconscious is duplicated by what the practice, this practice which is a little bit hedge-hopping, puts in parallel with it, namely, this subject supposed demand. Did I not see someone who appeared very proud to be questioning a member of the movement of the 22nd March, let us not name him, in order to ask him "What are you demanding of us analysts?" I wrote somewhere that the analyst was this privileged personage, a comic (307) one undoubtedly, who with the supply created the demand. It is quite obvious that here it did not work, but that does not prove that we have nothing to do with what is happening at this level. It means that they are demanding nothing of us. And afterwards! It is precisely the error of the analyst to believe that where we have to intervene as analysts, is at the level of demand, which never ceases to be theorised. While what is at stake, is very precisely this interval between the subject suppose to know and the subject supposed demand, and in the fact that it is nevertheless known for a long time that the subject does not know what he is demanding. Which allows him subsequently not to demand what he knows.

If we recognise this interval, this gap, this Moebius strip, where it is, in this little knot scribbled as I was able to do it on the board, in truth and I did not take much care, this is what is called this residue, this distance, this something to which there is entirely reduced for us the Other, namely, the o-object.

This role of the o-object which is of lack and of distance and not at all of mediation, it is on this that there is posed, that there is imposed this truth which is the discovery, the tangible discovery - and may those to have to touch on it not forget it - that there is no dialogue, the relation of the subject to the Other is of an essentially asymmetrical order, that dialogue is a dupery.

It is at the level of the subject in so far as the subject has been purified that the origin of science has been established. That at the level of the Other, there has never been anything more true than prophecy. It is on the contrary at the level of the Other that science is totalled, namely, that with respect to the subject it is completely alienated. It is a matter of knowing where there can still reside at the level of the subject something that is precisely of the order of prophecy.

End.

Lacan's summary of the seminar of 1967-68 for the year book of the Ecole pratique des Hautes Etudes

(311) The psychoanalytic act, neither seen nor heard of before me, namely, never mapped out, much less put in question, we suppose here to be something belonging to the elective moment when psychoanalysand passes to psychoanalyst.

This is the most commonly admitted recourse as regards what is necessary for this passage, all other conditions remaining contingent as compared to it.

Thus isolated from this moment of installation, the act is within the reach of everyone who enters into a psychoanalysis.

Let us say first of all: the act (simply) takes the place of an assertion, whose subject it changes. It is not an act to walk if all one says is "it walks, ça marche", or even "let us walk, marchons", but only if it ensures that "I am getting there, j'y arrive" is verified in it.

The psychoanalytic act seems suited to throw greater light on the act, because it is an act that reproduces itself from the very doing that it commands.

Through this it remits to the in-itself (l'en-soi) of a logical consistency, to decide whether indeed the relay can be taken up from an act which is such that it dismisses (destitue) at the end the very subject that establishes it.

From this step it can be seen that it is the subject here of whom it must be said whether it is knowledge.

Does the psychoanalysand, at the end of the task assigned to him, know "better than anyone" the subjective dismissal to which it has reduced the very one who commanded him to do it? For instance: this in itself of the o-object which at this end is evacuated by the same movement in which the psychoanalysand drops, because he has verified in this object the cause of desire.

(312) There is knowledge acquired there, but by whom?

To whom does it pay the price of the truth that at the limit the subject treated cannot be cured of?

From this limit can a subject be conceived who offers to reproduce what he has been delivered from?

And when this itself subjects him to bringing about the production of a task that he only promises by presupposing the very lure that is no longer tenable for him?

Because it is starting from the fiction-structure in which truth is stated, that from his very being he is going to create the stuff for the production...of an unreal.

Subjective dismissal is not any the less in prohibiting this pass because it must, like the sea, always be recommenced.

One nevertheless suspects that the gap revealed here between the act and the dignity of its purpose, is only to be taken to instruct us about what makes of it a scandal: the fault perceived in the subject supposed to know.

A whole indoctrination entitled psychoanalytic, still does not know that it is neglecting here the point that makes all strategy vacillate because it is still not clear about the psychoanalytic act.

To say that there is an unconscious means that there is a knowledge without a subject. The idea of instinct crushes this discovery: but it survives because this knowledge never proves to be anything but legible.

There is a line of resistance to this work that is as inordinately advanced as a phobia can be. This means that it is hopeless and shows that one has understood nothing about the unconscious, if one has not gone beyond it.

Namely, that what it introduces in terms of a division into the subject because a knowledge that moreover holds up does not determine it, presupposes, simply by being stated in this way, an Other, that for its part knows it before it has been perceived. We know that even Descartes makes use of this Other to guarantee at least the truth of his scientific starting point.

This is why the all the philosophical –logies, onto-, theo-, cosmo-, as well as psycho-, contradict the unconscious. But since the unconscious is only understood by being crushed by one of the most bastard notions of traditional psychology, people do not even attend to the fact that to affirm it makes this supposition of the Other impossible. But it is enough for it not to be denounced, for it to be as if the unconscious never happened.

(313) From which one sees that the worst people can make "a return to general psychology" their slogan.

In order to disentangle this, a structure of the Other must be stated which does not permit it to be overridden. Hence this formula: that there is no Other of the Other, or our affirmation that there is no metalanguage.

Let us confirm the latter by the fact that what is called metalanguage in mathematics is nothing but the discourse from which a language wants to exclude itself, namely, strives for the real. Mathematical logic is not, as cannot be imputed to me except in bad faith, an opportunity to rejuvenate my type of subject. It is from the outside that it bears witness to an Other whose structure, and precisely because it is logical, does not overlap itself: this is the S(Ø) of our graph.

That such an Other should be explored, does not condemn it to know nothing about the effects that it involves for the living being that it carries as being subject-to its effects. But if transference appears to be already sufficiently justified by the signifying primarity of the unary trait, there is nothing to indicate that the o-object does not have a consistency that is sustained by pure logic.

It must then be advanced that the psychoanalyst in psychoanalysis is not a subject, and that by situating his act in the ideal topology of the o-object, it can be deduced that he operates by not thinking.

An "I do not think" which is the law, de facto makes the psychoanalyst depend on the anxiety of knowing where to give it its place to still think about psychoanalysis without being doomed to miss it.

The humility of the limit in which the act is presented to his experience, blocks by the reprobation of stating it to be missed (manqué) the surest paths to arrive at this knowledge that it conceals..

Moreover we started, to encourage him, from the testimony that science gives of the ignorance it is in as regards its subject with the example of the Pavlovian approach, taken up to make it illustrate Lacan's aphorism: that a signifier is what represents a subject for another signifier. From which it can be seen that it is by holding onto the rail when it was still in the dark, that the experimenter gave himself some cheap hope by putting the hat into the rabbit. This ingenuity of the slip is nevertheless sufficient to account for a rather broad equivalence of Pavlovian statements, in which the deviation of someone who only thinks of the banks between which he wants to force the analytic crisis, finds a good university alibi.

(314) Still more naive then is the one who hears echoes of this whole apologue and corrects it by saying that the subject of science is never where one thinks it is, since that is precisely our irony...

It remains to make an appeal to where the affair takes place. And it can only be in the structure that the psychoanalyst shows as a symptom, when suddenly struck by an inverted Grace, he comes to raise an idolatrous prayer to "his ear", a fetish that has arisen in his breast along a hypocondriacal path.

There is an area of stigmata that living in this field imposes, because of failing to map out the sense of the psychoanalytic act. It presents itself rather painfully in the penumbra of councils in which the collectivity identified by it, takes on the image of a parodied Church.

It is certainly not ruled out that there should be articulated there confessions that are worth collecting. For example this forgery called the self, the first perhaps from this surface to go outside the list of morphemes which make it taboo that they should have come from Freud.

The fact is that it took on its weight or even its very discovery from the doings of the psychoanalyst you have to meet in order for there to be imposed on you the respect for the imprint received from the passion for psychoanalysis.

We have brought to life the writing where in the light of the self there is honed, and made tangible by proving to be an effect of compression, the avowal that passion has only place and strength by going beyond the very clearly recalled limits of the technique. They would serve it better, nevertheless, by being inscribed in the charter of the act once it has been restored to this page that can only be turned by a gesture changing the subject, the very one by which the psychoanalyst is qualified in act.

This self that has been launched will be nevertheless – the theme proliferates and in the sense of the auspices under which it was born - the ruin of the psychoanalyst, who is disqualified by it. The cult element of his profession is, as in other cases, the sign of being unequal to the act.

Moreover the act itself cannot function as a predicate. And to impute it to the subject that it determines, the whole inventio medii has to be put in new terms: this is what the o-object can test itself against.

What can be said of every psychoanalyst, except something that makes it obvious that none at all exists?

If on the other hand nothing can ensure that a psychoanalyst exists, except the (315) logic by which the act is articulated with a before and an after, it is clear that predicates take on a dominance here, unless they are linked by an effect of production.

If the psychoanalysand makes the psychoanalyst, there is still nothing added except the bill. For it to be due, we must be assured that there is something of the psychoanalyst.

And this is what the o-object responds to.

The psychoanalyst is constituted by the o-object. Is constituted, to be understood as: is produced: from the o-object: with the o-object.

These remarks are too close to the place where logical quantifiers appear to stumble, for us not to have flirted with them as instruments. We feel the psychoanalytic act yielding by breaking hold in the universal that they have the merit of not satisfying.

(And this is what is going to excuse Aristotle for oscillating, in a still more inspired way than in isolating the upokeimenon, in not being able to avoid retrieving the ousia now and then.)

Because what this act perceives is the kernel constituted by the hollow by which the idea of the whole is justified, by circumscribing it in the logic of quantifiers.

From then on perhaps it allows it to be better named as a désaïfication [deconsecration?]

Here the psychoanalyst finds company in carrying out the same operation. Is it at the level of the open field offered to discourse for this purpose?

Such indeed in effect is the horizon traced out by the technique, but its artifice depends on the logical structure that it rightly trusts, because it never loses its rights. The experienced impossibility of a pulverulent discourse is the Trojan Horse through which there enters into the city of discourse its master who is the psychotic.

But there again, as we see, the corporeal deduction is already made from which something of the psychoanalyst is to be made, and this is what the psychoanalytic act must be harmonised with.

We can only outline the abrupt logic of the act by tempering the passion it gives rise to in the field that it commands, even if it only does so by withdrawing from it. It is no doubt because he failed to include this tempering that Winnicott believed he had to contribute to it something of his own self. But also to receive from it this transitional object from the more distant hands of the child, that I must indeed render to him here, since it is starting from it that I first formulated the o-object.

(316) Let us reduce the psychoanalytic act then to what leaves to the one that it alleviates what it has begun for him: it is that there remains declared to him that enjoyment (jouissance), privileged in that it commands the sexual relationship, is offered by a forbidden act, but that this is to mask the fact that this relationship is only established by not being verifiable because it requires the middle term that is distinguished as lacking in it: this is what is called making a subject of castration.

The benefit of this is clear for the neurotic because it resolves what it represented as passion.

But the important things is that to whomsoever it gives only the enjoyment held to be perverse, is well and truly permitted by this, since the psychoanalyst makes of it the key, in order to withdraw it, it this true, at the end of his operation. Which means that it has only to be taken away from him in order to restore to it its proper use, whether he makes use of it or not.

This cynical outcome should clearly mark the secondary nature of any benefit with regard to the passions. That the axiology of psychoanalytic practice proves to be reduced to the sexual contributes to the subversion of the ethics that depends on the inaugural act only because the sexual is shown by negativities of structure.

Pleasure barrier to enjoyment (but not the inverse). Reality constructed from transference (but not the inverse). And the principle of supreme vanity because the verb is only worthwhile under the gaze of death (gaze to be underlined, not death which slips away).

In the ethics inaugurated from the psychoanalytic act, less ethiquette, if you will forgive me, than was ever glimpsed because of starting from the act, logic commands, this is certain because one finds its paradoxes in it.

Except, which is also certain, that types, norms, are added to it as pure remedies.

In order to maintain its own chicane, the psychoanalytic act must not become diluted by them.

Because from its reference points it becomes clear that sublimation does not rule out the truth of enjoyment, which is why heroisms, by being better explained, are organised according to whether they are more less alert

Moreover the psychoanalytic act itself is always at the mercy of acting out and we have sufficiently depicted above the figures in which it grimaces. And it is important to highlight the degree to which the approach of Freud himself is of a nature to warn us about it, when it is not so much from myth that he first (317) supported it, but from a recourse to the stage. Oedipus and Agamemnon represent stage productions. Today one sees the full import of a feebleminded clinging to it, in someone who put his signature to a mishap, by venturing on an exegesis of the o-object.

Because if the moral act is organised from the psychoanalytic act, it is because it receives its In-I (En-Je) from the fact that the o-object is co-ordinated from an experience of knowledge.

It is from it that there takes its substance the insatiable requirement that Freud was the first to articulate in Civilisation and its discontents. We are highlighting this insatiable with a different accent by the fact that it finds its balance in the psychoanalytic act.

Why put it to the credit of this act that we have reduced introduced its very status in time?

Nor push back this in-time, by having uttered it six months ago in the proposition that anticipated it and unleashed not simply a theoretical, but effective kind of house-breaking in our Ecole that since it got very close to me makes me dare to recognise it as bearing witness to a rendezvous.

Is it enough to remark that in the psychoanalytic act the o-object is only supposed to come in the form of a production for which the means, because it is required for all supposed exploitation, is supported here by knowledge whose proprietorial aspect is properly what precipitates a precise social fault?

Shall we go on to question whether it is indeed the man that an anti-eros would reduce to a single dimension that is distinguished in the May insurrection?

On the other hand putting the In-I into a mass by getting a grip on the knowledge that crushes not so much by its excess as by the auditing of its logic that makes of the subject a pure cleavage, here is where there is conceived a change in the very moorings of anxiety and it must be said that having laid down that it is not without an object, we have here also just grasped what was already disappearing over a ridge.

This is not enough for the act that is required in the field of knowledge, to collapse into the passion for the signifier for there to be some one or no one to take on the job of starter.

There is no difference, once the process has begun, between the subject devoted to subversion to the degree of producing something incurable in which the act finds its own end, and what takes on a revolutionary effect from the symptom, simply by no longer marching under the Marxist baton.

What people believed they were pinpointing here about the virtues of speaking out, is only the suspect anticipation of the rendezvous that is indeed there, but in (318) which the word only comes because the act was there. This should be understood as: was there a little more, even if it only arrived, was there at the very instant that it finally arrived.

This indeed is why I hold that for my part I did not fail to be at the place that the drama of today's psychoanalysts confers on me at this juncture, recognising that I know a little bit more about it than those who ridiculously did not miss this occasion to display themselves as actors in it.

Here, as always, we find the lead I enjoy and it is enough for it to exist for it not to be something slight, when I remember the judgement, made by a particular person, that in the case from which there remains to be found everything that we know about obsessional neurosis, Freud had been "taken in like a tyro (rat)". This in effect was what was enough to read of the Ratman, for someone to be able to sustain oneself with regard to the psychoanalytic act.

But who will understand, even among those who are emerging from my meditation on this act, what is nevertheless indicated clearly in these very lines, where the psychoanalyst will come to be relayed from tomorrow, and also what held this place in history?

I am not a little proud, people should know, of this power of unreadibility that I have been able to maintain unspoilt in my texts to protect against, here for example, what the historialising of a situation offers as a blessed opening for those who are only in a hurry to histrionicise it for their own comfort.

To be too easy to comprehend is to give a way out to avoidance, and it is to make oneself the accomplice of it, in that in the same package which sends each one to his ruin, you provide a supplement from Elsewhere so that he may hurry to put himself into it.

Was I careful enough in approaching what is required to situate the psychoanalytic act: to establish what determines it from enjoyment and the ways at the same time it must protect itself from it? One can judge by the crumbs that have fallen from it onto the following year.

Here again we do not think it an unimportant augury that a cut was made that spared us from doing it.

Let the interest remains on this hither side, since it is not lacking in what is proliferating because of simply ignoring a lemma like this, bequeathed by me, in passing: to the act, of this seminar, "that there is no transference of transference". This nevertheless is what the report in an upcoming Congress stumbles over, for want of having the least idea of what it is articulating (cf. "The non-transference relationship" in IJP, 1969. Part 1, vol. 50)

If it were not irremediable because of having spent so much time in the commerce of the true about the true (the third lack), this Roman Congress might have been able to pick up a little bit more of what, once upon a time, was uttered in act there about the function as well as the field that language determines language.

THE SEMINAR OF JACQUES LACAN

BOOK XVI

From an Other to the other

Translated by Cormac Gallagher from unedited French manuscripts

Seminar 1: Wednesday 13 November 1968

The essence of psychoanalytic theory is a discourse without words.
(L'essence de la théorie psychanalytique est un discours sans parole)
(Written on the board)

We find ourselves here again this year for a seminar for which I chose the title From an Other to the other (D'un Autre à l'autre) to indicate the major reference points around which my discourse ought, properly speaking, to turn. That is why this discourse is crucial at the moment of time that we are at. It is so in as much as it defines what is involved in this discourse called the psychoanalytic discourse, whose introduction, whose coming into play at this time brings so many consequences with it.

A label has been put on this process. It has been called structuralism, a word that moreover was not necessary on the part of the publicist who suddenly, not so many months ago, God knows, put it forward in order to encompass a certain number of people whose labour had for a long time marked out some avenues of this discourse.

Thus it is the doing of what I have just called a publicist - everyone knows the play on words that I have made about "poubellication" – that a certain number of us, thanks to the labour of this agency, find ourselves together in the same dustbin (poubelle). One could have more disagreeable company! In truth, those that I find myself connected to being people for whose labour I have the greatest esteem, I could not in any case find myself uncomfortable in it, especially, since we know little bit about what is involved in dustbins in this period dominated by the genius of Samuel Beckett. For me

personally, after having now lived almost 30 years, in three sections of fifteen, ten and five years, in three psychoanalytic societies, I know a little bit about what is involved in living with household refuse.

As regards structuralism, in truth one can understand the unease that may be produced among some people from the treatment that people pretend to inflict from the outside on our common habitat, and also that people may want to get out of it to stretch their legs a little. It remains, nevertheless, that ever since this impatience seems to all appearances to be taking hold of some people, I notice that I do not find myself all that uncomfortable in this basket, since moreover in my eyes it does not (8) seem to me that this structuralism should be identified to anything other than what I call very simply seriousness, and in no way certainly to anything that resembles in any way what one could call a philosophy, if by this word there is designated a vision of the world, or even some way of assuring on the right or the left the positions of a thinking. Let it suffice, to refute the first case, if it is true that as a psychoanalyst I cannot in any way claim to introduce in any fashion what is ridiculously called a psychoanalytic anthropology - it would be enough to recall, at the very entry into this domain of constitutive truths everything that psychoanalysis brings into this field, namely, that there is no union of man and woman without castration:

a) determining by way of phantasy, precisely, the reality of the partner for whom it is impossible,

b) without castration operating, in this sort of hiding place that posits it as a truth in the partner for whom it has been really spared, apart from some accidental excesses.

Let us strongly insist that, developing this formula from Genesis that God created them - there is also created him - man and woman – make no mistake, God knows why! - in the case of one the impossibility of the accomplishment of castration comes to posit itself as determining her reality; in the other, the worst thing that is threatened as being possible does not need to happen to be true, in the sense that this term offers no recourse.

This simple reminder, it seems, implies that at least at the heart of the field that is apparently ours, no harmony, however we may designate it, is in place, that assuredly

some purpose is required of us which is precisely that of a suitable discourse. In order to sustain it, we will have in a way to ask ourselves the sort of question from which all philosophy started. Faced with so much knowledge, which is not without its value and efficacy, what is it that can distinguish this discourse, guaranteed of itself, grounding itself on a criterion that thinking would take as its own measure, and would make it deserve to be entitled episteme: science. We are brought, even if it is only at first by this challenge that I have just outlined as that put by truth to the real, to a greater prudence in this approach of harmonising thinking with itself.

A rule of thinking that has to guarantee itself from non-thinking as being that which may be its cause, this is what we are confronted with in the notion of the unconscious. It is only in the measure of the beyond-sense of remarks and not, as is imagined and as the whole of phenomenology supposes, from sense, that I am as thinking. My thinking cannot be regulated – whether one adds or not alas! – as I wish; it is regulated. In my act, I am not trying to express it but to cause it. But it is not a matter of the act. In the discourse, I do not have to obey its rule, but find its cause. It is in (9) the inter-sense – and you can understand this in as obscene a way as you may imagine – there is the being of thinking. What has passed through my thinking, is the cause. It allows to pass purely and simply what has been, as being, and this from the fact that always and ever, wherever it has passed, it has always passed producing effects of thinking.

"It is raining, il pleut" is a thinking event each time it is pronounced, and the subject of it is first of all this it (il), this hilum (hile), I would say, that it constitutes in a certain number of meanings. And that is why this "it" finds itself comfortable in everything that follows because by "it is raining" you can understand "it is raining primary truths", "there is some abuse, il y a de l'abus"; especially by confusing rain, a meteor, with pluvia, aqua pluvia, rain and the water that one collects from it. The meteor lends itself to metaphor and why? Because it is already made up of signifiers. It is raining. The being of thought is the cause of thinking qua beyond sense. It was always and ever the being of a thinking before.

Now using this structure rejects any promotion of infallibility. It is only helped precisely from the gap or rather from the very process because there is a process of

gap, and it is the process helped by the structure of the practice, but it can only be helped by it by following it, which does not mean in any way going beyond it, except by allowing it to be grasped in the consequences that fix it to time, to the very point that the reproduction of the process comes to a halt. This means that it is when it stops that the result is seen. And this is what explains, let us say here with a discreet touch in passing, that all art is defective. It is from collecting what, at the point where its failure to be completed is hollowed out, it is from collecting this that it takes its force. And that is why music and architecture are the supreme arts – I mean supreme technically, as being at the height of the basal, producing the relation of the harmonic number with time and space, precisely from the angle of their incompatibility. Because the harmonic number is now only, as is well known, a strainer, since it does not hold on either to the one or to the other, neither to this time nor to this space.

This is what structuralism takes seriously. It takes seriously the fact of knowledge as cause, as cause in thinking and, most usually, it has to be said, in a delusional perspective. Do not be frightened, these are opening remarks, reminders of certainties, not truths. And I would like, before introducing today the schemas from which I intend to start, to mark that if something here and now ought already to be in the palm of your hand, it is what I took the care to write earlier on the board about the essence of the theory. The essence of psychoanalytic theory is the function of discourse and very precisely because of something that may appear new to you, or at least paradoxical, that I am saying that it is without words. It is a matter of the essence of the theory because this is what is at stake.

(10) What is the state of theory in the psychoanalytic field? About this, I hear strange echoes being bruited around me. There is no lack of misunderstanding. On the pretext that by positing a whole field of thought as manipulation, I seem to be putting in question traditional principles. I mean – and this is expressed astonishingly because it is in places or in minds that are close to me – by something or other called "theoretical impossibility". Indeed, did I not find this at a turn in some lines that what I one day announced in a context that clearly said what it meant, that there is no universe of discourse, so then why tire ourselves out, people seem to conclude. No doubt it would be less important in my eyes to correct my statement, because it does not lend itself to any ambiguity, and it is hard to see how the fact that one can state

precisely what has been stated, that there is no point of closure in a discourse, that discourse is for all that, far from that, neither impossible, nor even simply devalued. It is precisely by starting from there that you are responsible for this discourse, and especially for managing it properly, taking into account what is meant by this statement that there is no universe of discourse. There is certainly nothing therefore in this respect to be corrected by me, except simply to come back to it to take the following steps; of what consequences are induced from the discourse that has already been put forward but also perhaps to return to what is meant by the fact that being attached to the degree that an analyst may be to the conditions of this discourse, he can at every moment be in a position to show its flaws.

There was a time – allow me a little interlude before getting into this domain – when I took the example of the pot, not without there being such a scandal that I left this pot, as I might say, in the margin of my Ecrits. What was at stake was the fact that the pot is, in a way, the tangible image that it is this meaning modelled by itself, thanks to which, manifesting the appearance of a form and a content, it allows there to be introduced into thinking the idea that it is the contents that is the meaning, as if thinking showed here this need to imagine itself as having to contain something else, for this is what the term "to contain" designates when it is highlighted with regard to an inopportune act. The pot, and I called it mustard in order to remark that far from necessarily containing any, it is precisely because it is empty that it takes on its value as a mustard pot. Namely, that it is because the word "mustard" is written on it, but mustard which means that there is much delay (moult lui tarde) for this pot before it reaches its eternal life as a pot which begins at the moment when this pot will be holed. Because it is under this appearance throughout the ages, that we find it in digs, namely, by searching in tombs something that will bear witness to us about the state of a civilisation. The pot is holed, it is said, as a homage to the dead person and so that a living person cannot make use of it. Of course it is a reason. But there is perhaps another one which is the following; it is that this hole is intended to produce, so that this hole produces, illustrating the myth of the Danai. It is in this state that, (11) this pot, when we have resurrected it from its burial place, occupies a place of honour on the shelf of the collector and, in this moment of glory, for it just as much as for God, it is in this glory that it reveals its nature. The structure of the pot – I am not saying its material – appears there as what it is, namely, correlative to the function of the tube and the drum. And, if we are going to search for preformations in nature, we will see that for a horn or a shell, it is still there, after the life has been extracted from it, that it shows what its essence is, namely, its capacity for producing sound.

Entire civilisations are no longer represented for us except by these little pots in the form of a head or again of some animal, covered by signs that are impenetrable to us, for lack of correlative documents. And here we sense that the meaning, the image is altogether outside, that what is left to being inside is precisely what lies in the tomb in which we find it, namely, precious materials, perfumes, gold, incense and myrrh as they say. The pot explains the meaning of what is there by virtue of what? By virtue of a use value, let us rather say of an exchange value, with another world and another dignity, of a token value. That it should be in pots that we find the manuscripts of the Dead Sea is something to make us sense that it is not the signified that is within, it is very precisely the signifier. And it is with it that we have to deal when it is a matter of what is at stake for us, namely, the relationship between discourse and the word in analytic efficacy.

Here, I ask you to allow me a short circuit at the moment of introducing what, I think, is going to image for you the unity of the theoretical function in this approach rightly or wrongly called structuralist. I shall appeal to Marx whose remarks I have had a lot of trouble not introducing earlier, importuned as I have been for a long time about him, into a field in which he is nevertheless perfectly in his place. I am today going to introduce in connection with the o-object the place in which we have to situate his essential function. Because it is necessary, I will proceed by way of a homologous stave and I will first of all recall something that was, by labours that are still recent, precisely and up to the disavowal of the author designated as structuralist, was perfectly highlighted, and not too far from here, in a commentary on Marx. The question is posed by the author whom I have just evoked of what the object of Capital is. We are going to see what, in a parallel way, psychoanalytic investigation allows there to be stated on this point.

Marx starts from the function of the market. His novelty is the place that he situates labour in it. It is not the fact that labour is new that allows his discovery, it is the fact that it is bought; that there is a labour market. This is what allows him to demonstrate

what is inaugurating in his discourse - what is called surplus value. As it happens this approach suggests the revolutionary act that we know about, or rather that we know (12) very badly, because it is not sure that taking power resolved what I will call the subversion of the capitalist subject expected from this act. But for the moment it matters little to us. It is not sure that the Marxists did not in fact undergo many inauspicious consequences from it. The important thing is what Marx is designating and what his approach means. Whether his commentators are structuralist or not, they still seem indeed to have demonstrated that he for his part is structuralist. Because it is properly by being at the point, for his part, as a being of thought, being at the point that the dominance of the labour market determines, that there is brought out as cause of his thinking this function, an obscure one it has to be said – if this obscurity can be recognised in the confusion of the commentary – which is that of surplus value. The identity of discourse with its conditions is what I think is going to find some clarification from what I am going to say about the analytic approach.

No newer than labour was in the production of merchandise, is the renunciation of enjoyment (jouissance), whose relation to labour I do not have to define any further. Since, from the beginning and quite contrary to what Hegel says, or seems to say, it is what constitutes the master who clearly intends to make of it the principle of his power. What is new is that there is a discourse that articulates this renunciation and which makes appear in it – for this is the essence of the analytic discourse – what I would call the function of the surplus enjoying (plus de jouir). This function appears because discourse occurs, because what it demonstrates in the renunciation of enjoyment is an effect of discourse itself. To accentuate things, it must be supposed that in the field of the Other, there is this market, if you wish, which adds up its merits, its values, the organisation of choices, of preferences which implies an ordinal, indeed cardinal structure. Discourse holds the means of enjoying in so far as it implies the subject. There would be no reason of subject, in the sense that one can say reasons of state, if there were not a correlative in the market of the Other, which is that a surplus enjoying is established that is captured by some people.

A discourse must be pushed very far to demonstrate how the surplus enjoying depends on stating, is therefore produced by discourse, so that it appears as an effect. But in fact this is not something very new to your ears if you have read me, because it is the object of my writing on Kant with Sade in which the proof is given of the total reduction of this surplus enjoying to the act of applying to the subject the term o of the phantasy, through which the subject can be posited as cause of itself in desire.

I will develop this in the time to come by a return to this wager of Pascal that illustrates so well the relation of the renunciation of enjoyment to this element of wager in which life in its totality is itself reduced to an element of value. A strange way of inaugurating the market of enjoyment, to inaugurate it, I am clearly saying, in the field of discourse. But after all is this not a simple transition from what we have (13) just now seen being inscribed in history in this function of goods devoted to the dead? Moreover do we not have here what is now in question for us. We have to deal with theory in as far as it has been lightened precisely by the introduction of this function of the surplus enjoying. Around the surplus enjoying there is played out the production of an essential object whose function it is now a matter of defining, it is the o-object.

The crudeness of the echoes received at the introduction of this term is and remains for me the guarantee that it is indeed in effect of the order of efficacy that I bestow on it. In other words, there is a well known, well marked and celebrated passage in which Marx savoured, during the time he spent developing his theory, the opportunity to see the survival of the living incarnation of its miscognition!

I stated: the signifier is what represents the subject for another signifier. This like every correct definition, namely, is required. It is required that a definition should be correct and that a teaching should be rigorous. It is quite intolerable, at the moment when psychoanalysis is called on to give to something that you must not think I intend to elide, to the crisis that traverses the relation of the student to the university, it is unthinkable that one should respond by the statement that there are things that one cannot in any way define in a knowledge. If psychoanalysis cannot state itself as a knowledge and be taught as such, it has strictly nothing to do in a place where nothing else is at stake. If the market of knowledge is very properly shaken by the fact that science contributes to it this unit of value that allows there to be plumbed what is involved in its exchange even in its most radical functions, it is certainly not in order for something that can articulate something about it, namely, psychoanalysis should present itself by throwing in the towel. All the terms that may be employed in this connection, whether they are those of "non-conceptualisation" or any other evocation of some impossibility or other, can only designate in any case the incapacity of those who put them forward. It is not because the strategy with the truth in which the essence of therapy may reside does not lie in any particular intervention described as interpretation, a point where undoubtedly all source of particular functions, of lucky operations in the order of the variable can find their opportunity but only have sense by being situated at the precise point where theory gives them their weight.

This is what is well and truly at stake here. It is in the discourse on the function of the renunciation of enjoyment that there is introduced the term of o-object. The surplus enjoying as a function of this renunciation under the effect of discourse, is what gives its place to the o-object, like in a market, namely, because it defines some object of human labour as merchandise. Just as each object carries in itself something of (14) surplus value, in the same way surplus enjoying is what allows the isolation of the o-object.

What are we doing in analysis, if not establishing, by the rule, a discourse of such a kind that the subject suspends what on it? Precisely his function as subject. Namely, that he is dispensed from sustaining his discourse with an "I say" because it is a different thing to speak and to posit "I say what I have just stated". The subject of the statement says "I say", says "I posit", as I do here in my teaching. I articulate this word; it is not poetry; I am saying what is written here and I can even repeat it, which is essential, in the form in which by repeating it, to vary it I add that I have written it.

Here then is the subject dispensed from sustaining what he states. Is it then in this way that he is going to come to this purity of the word, this full word of which I spoke in a period of evangelisation, it has to be said, for the discourse called the Rome discourse. To whom was it addressed if not to ears that were most closed to hearing it. I will not qualify what made these ears provided with these opaque qualities. This would be to make a judgement that could not be in any way other than offensive.

But notice that it is in speaking about The Freudian thing, that I happened to launch myself into something that I myself called a prosopopoeia? It is a matter of the truth

stating: "For you then I am the enigma of her who vanishes as soon as she appears; men who try so hard to hide me under the tawdry finery of your proprieties. But I am prepared to believe that your embarrassment is sincere." I note that the term "embarrassment" was highlighted for its function elsewhere. "For even when you take it upon yourselves to serve as my heralds, you place no greater value on wearing my colours than your own, which are like what you are, phantoms that you are. Where then will I pass into you? Where was I before I entered you? Perhaps one day I will tell you." It is discourse that is at stake here. "But so that you will find me where I am, I will teach you by what sign you will recognise me. Men, listen, I am giving you the secret. Me, the truth, I speak (Moi, la verité, je parle)."

I did not write, "I say". What speaks undoubtedly, if it came, as I also wrote ironically, the analysis, of course, would be closed. But it is precisely what does not happen, or what when it does happen deserves to be punctuated in a different way. And for that reason we must take up again what is involved in this subject that is here put in question by an artificial procedure, of whom it is demanded, in effect, not to be the one who sustains everything that is advanced. It must not be believed nevertheless that he is dissipated, for the psychoanalyst is very precisely there to represent him, I mean to maintain him throughout the time that he is not able, in effect, to place himself as regards the cause of his discourse.

Thus it is that it is a matter now of referring to fundamental formulae, namely, to those that define the signifier as being what represents a subject for another signifier. What does that mean? I am surprised that no one has ever remarked in connection (15) with this proposition that the result, as a corollary, is that a signifier cannot represent itself. Of course this is not new either because in what I articulated about repetition, this indeed is what is at stake. But there we have to pause for a moment in order to grasp it clearly in real life. What can be meant here in this sentence by this "itself" of the signifier? Note well that when I speak about the signifier I am speaking about something opaque. When I say that the signifier must be defined as what represents a subject for another signifier that means that no one will know anything about it except the other signifier. And the other signifier has no head, it is a signifier. The subject is stifled, effaced, immediately, at the same time as it appears. It is a matter precisely of seeing why something of this subject which disappears in emerging, produced by one signifier in order to be immediately extinguished by another, how somewhere this something can be constituted which can at the limit be taken as Selbstbewusstein, for something that is satisfied to be identical to itself. Now, very precisely, what this means, is that the signifier in whatever form it is produced, in its presence as subject of course, cannot connect up with its representative signifier without there being produced this loss of identity that is properly speaking called the o-object. This is what Freud's theory about repetition designates. As a result of which nothing is identifiable from the recourse to enjoyment in which, by virtue of the sign, something different comes to its place, namely, the stroke that marks it. Nothing can be produced there without an object being lost in it .

A subject is what can be represented by a signifier for another signifier. But is this not something traced out on the fact that as an exchange value the subject in question, in what Marx is deciphering, namely, economic reality, the subject of exchange value is represented for what? Use value. And it is already in this gap that there is produced, that there falls what is called surplus value. This loss is all that counts at our level. Henceforth no longer identical to himself the subject certainly no longer enjoys but something is lost that is called surplus enjoying; it is strictly correlative to the coming into play of what then determines everything involved in thinking. And in the symptom what else is involved. Namely, in terms of being more or less at ease in approaching this something that the subject is quite incapable of naming. But if he does not make a circuit of it he will not even know what to do. He does not simply have to deal with relations to his fellows, [but?] with his most profound relation, with the relation that is called vital, and for which economic references and configurations are much more suitable than the often distant, even though of course not completely wrong ones offered to Freud, those of thermodynamics.

(16) Here then is the way, the element that can allow us to advance into what is involved in analytic discourse. If we have a priori posited theoretically and without needing a long recurrence to constitute these premises, if what is at stake in the definition of the subject as caused by the inter-signifying relationship, of something that, in a way, forever prohibits us from grasping it, here also is the opportunity to perceive what gives it this unity, let us call it provisionally preconscious, not unconscious, the one that has permitted up to the present the subject to be sustained in his so-called self sufficiency. Far from being self sufficient, it is around the formula namely, it is around the being of the o, around the surplus enjoying, that there is constituted the relationship that allows us up to a certain point to see there being created this soldering, this precipitation, this freezing which means that we can unify a subject as subject of a whole discourse. I will draw on the blackboard something that images in a certain way what is at stake on this occasion.

This is what happens in the relation of a signifier to another signifier, namely, that it is the subject that is represented there, which here will never know. Once any signifier whatsoever in the chain can be put into relation with what is nevertheless only an object, namely, what is fabricated in this relationship to surplus enjoying, in this something that is able through the opening of the operation of the organism to take on the figure of these vanishing entities that I have already given the list of, which go from the breast to dejections and from the voice to the look, the fabrication of the discourse of the renunciation of enjoyment. The mainspring of this fabrication is the following, it is that around them can be produced the surplus enjoying. That assuredly if already in connection with Pascal's wager I told you that if there were only one life to be wagered to win beyond death, it would be well worth our while labouring enough in this one to know how to behave in the other. In this labour and its exchange as a wager with something, when we know that it is worth the trouble, there is found the mainspring of the fact that at the very foundation of the idea handled by Pascal it appears with the extraordinary blindness of someone who is himself at the beginning of a period of unleashing of the function of the market and its correlative the one that introduced scientific discourse. Let us not forget that he is also the one who wanted, at the most extreme moments of his retreat and his conversion, to inaugurate in Paris a Compagnie des Omnibus Parisienne. If this Pascal, who does not know what he is saying when he speaks about a happy life, we have the incarnation of it, what else is graspable under the term of happy if not precisely this function incarnated in the surplus enjoying? And moreover we have no need to wager on the beyond to know what it is worth.

(17) Where the surplus enjoying is unveiled under a naked form has a name. It is called perversion. And that is why a holy woman has a perverse son. There is no need for the beyond to see what happens in the transmission from one to the other in terms of the operation of an essential discourse.

$$\frac{$}{o} \lozenge ($ \lozenge ($ \lozenge o))$$

Here then is opened the figure, the schema of what allows it to be conceived how it is around the phantasy, namely, of the relationship of the reiteration of the signifier that represents the subject in relation to itself that there is played out what is involved in the production of o. But inversely, by this fact, their relationship takes on consistency and it is from this that there is produced here something that is no longer either subject nor object, but that is called phantasy. Henceforth, the other signifiers can, by linking up, articulating and at the same time here, freezing in the effect of meaning, introduce this effect of metonymy which means that this subject, whatever he may be, whether it is in the sentence, at the level of the child of "A child is being beaten, On bat un enfant", at the level of the on, something equivalent solders this subject and makes of him this solidary being that in the discourse we have the weakness to give the image of as an omnivalent image, as if there could be a subject of all signifiers.

If there is something that, through the analytic rule, can be sufficient relaxed in this chain for there to be produced these revelatory effects, what sense, what accent should we give to it so that it can have some import? The ideal no doubt is that this mythical [critical?] "I speak" which will bring about in analytic experience the effect, the image of the appearance of the truth.

It is here precisely that it must be understood that this emitted truth is suspended there, caught between two registers, those whose two limits I posed precisely in the two terms that figure in the title of my seminar this year. Because this either, a reference to the field where the discourse of the subject would take on its consistency, namely, to the field of the Other that I defined as this locus where every discourse at least posits itself in order to be able to offer itself to what is or not its refutation. That it can demonstrate, and in the most simple form – you will excuse me for not having the time to do it today – that the problem of whether or not there is a God who guarantees as for Descartes the field of truth is completely uncalled for. It is enough for us that it can be demonstrated that in the field of the Other there is no possibility of a complete consistency of discourse and this I hope the next time to be able to articulate for you precisely in function of the existence of the subject.

I already wrote it out once very rapidly on the board. It is a proof that is very easy to find in the first chapter of what is called set theory. But again it would be necessary, at least for part of the listeners here, to show why it is relevant to introduce into the elucidation of the function of a discourse such as ours, we analysts, in some way (18) extract it from a logic that it would be quite wrong to believe is a way of excluding it into the neighbouring amphitheatre to call it mathematical logic. If nowhere in the Other there can be assured in any way the consistency of what is called the truth, where then is it unless this function of the o corresponds to it. Moreover, have I not already on some other occasion expressed what is involved in the cry of the truth. "Me, the truth, I wrote, I speak, and I am pure articulation expressed to your embarrassment". What the truth can say is there to move us. But what the one who is suffering says by being this truth, ought to know that its cry is only a mute cry, a cry into the void, a cry that already at one time I illustrated by the celebrated engraving of Münch, because at this level nothing else can correspond to it in the Other than what gives it its consistency and in the naïve faith that it is like me, namely, that it is its true support, namely, its fabrication as o-object. Faced with it, there is nothing but that, than the additional one (l'un en plus) among so many others, that can in no way correspond to this cry of the truth except that it is very precisely its equivalent, non-enjoyment, misery, distress and solitude. It is the counterpart of this o, of this surplus enjoying that gives its coherence to the subject qua ego.

There is nothing else, unless for today to want to leave you on something that makes one smile a little. I take up again the words that, in Ecclesiastes, an old king who did not see the contradiction between being the king of wisdom and having a harem, who tells you, "All is vanity no doubt, enjoy the woman that you love, namely, make a ring of this hollow, of this void at the centre of your being, there is no neighbour if not this very hollow in you, it is the emptiness of yourself". But in this relationship undoubtedly guaranteed only by the figure that allowed Freud no doubt to hold on throughout this whole perilous path and to allow us to clarify the relationships which,

in this myth, would otherwise not be tolerable, the divine law that leaves in its entire primitiveness this enjoyment between man and woman of which it must be said: "Give her what you do not have, because what can unite you to her, is only enjoyment". It is on this point that in the style of a simple, total, religious riddle, of one that is only approached in the Cabbala that I will discharge you today.

Seminar 2: Wednesday 20 November 1968

The last time, which was a premiere, I made reference to Marx in a relation that, in a first moment, I presented as homologous, with all that this term involves by way of reservations. I introduced alongside, let us say, surplus value what is called, in the original tongue – not that this notion of course was being named for the first time but discovered in its essential function – Mehrwert. I wrote it because God knows what would happen if I only pronounced it, in front of what I have here as an audience, and especially psychoanalysts when they are recruited from among those that are described as being by nature or heredity, double agents. Soon people will be telling me that it is the sour mother (mère verte), that I am rediscovering familiar paths. It is with this, with my "it speaks", people reintegrate the supposedly obstinate desire of the subject to find himself again nice and warm in the maternal womb. So then to this surplus value, I hooked on, I superimposed, I plastered on the other side the notion of surplus enjoying. It is said like that in the original tongue. It was said the last time for the first time, namely, in French. To restore it to the tongue from which the inspiration for it came to me, I would call it, provided no German scholar in this assembly does not oppose it Merhlust.

Naturally, I did not bring forward this operation without making a discreet reference, in the way I sometimes do, an allusive one, a discreet allusive reference to the one, why not, whose researches and thinking led me to it, namely, Althusser. Naturally, as usual, in the hours that followed, this created some stir in the cafes where people gather, and how flattered I am at it, even delighted, to chew the fat over what has been said here. In truth, what can be said on this occasion, and what I do not deny since it was on this plane that I introduced my remarks the last time, namely, this factor, the poubellicant or poubellicatoir factor, whatever you want to call it, of structuralism. I had precisely made an allusion to the fact that according to the last echoes I had Althusser was not very comfortable in it. I simply recalled that, whatever he may avow or renounce in structuralism, it seems indeed to whoever reads it that his discourse makes a structuralist of Marx and very precisely because he underlines his seriousness.

It is to this that I would like to come back since moreover, what I am indicating, is that one would be wrong to see in some mood or other that what is essential here is to (20) rally behind a flag. Namely, that as I already underlined on other occasions, what I am stating at least for myself when we are dealing with structure, I already said, is to be taken in the sense of what is most real, the real itself. And when I said at the time when here, on the board, I drew, indeed manipulated some of these schemas with which there is illustrated what is called topology, I already underlined that in this case, it was in no way a kind of metaphor. Either one thing or the other. Either what we are talking about has no kind of existence, or, if the subject has one, I mean as we are articulating it, well then it is exactly constructed like that, namely, it is constructed like these things that I wrote on the board, on the paper I use. On condition of course that you know that this little image which is all that one can put down, in effect, to represent it, on a page, that this little image obviously is only there to image for you certain connections that cannot be imagined but on the other hand can perfectly well be written. The structure is therefore real. It is determined by convergence towards an impossibility, in general. But that is how it is and it is because of this that it is real. So then there should almost be no need to talk about structure. If here I am speaking about it, if I speak about structure, if I speak about it again today, it is because I am forced to do so. Because of the chit-chat in the cafes! But I ought not to need to talk about it because I say it. What I say sets up the structure because it aims, as I said the last time, it aims at the cause of the discourse itself. Implicitly, and like each and every one who teaches, by wanting to fulfill this function, I defy in principle that I can be refuted by a discourse that justifies discourse differently to the way I have just said it. I am repeating it for those who are deaf. Namely, what it aims at is the cause of discourse itself. That someone should justify discourse in a different way as an expression of or as a relationship to a content for which a form is invented, that's up to him! But I remark then that it is unthinkable, with this position , that you should inscribe yourself under any heading whatsoever in the practice of psychoanalysis. I mean even not as charlatanism. You should understand that the question is whether the psychoanalysis I am indicating here exists. It is precisely this that is at stake.

But on the other hand there is something by which it indisputably affirms itself. It is the symptom of the point in time that we have come to, let us say, in this provisional word that I would call, like that, civilisation. I am not joking! I am not talking about culture. That is vaster! It is moreover a question of convention. We will try to situate culture in the current usage that is made of this term at a certain level that we will call commercial.

Good! Let us come back to my discourse.

To employ a metaphor here that I already used on several occasions to make you (21) sense what I mean by a discourse that is valid, I would compare it to a scissors' cut in this material that I talk about when I talk about the real of a subject. It is through this scissors' cut in what is called structure, in the way that this happens, that it is revealed for what it is. If one makes the scissors' cut somewhere, relationships change in such a way that what is not seen before is seen afterwards.

This is what I illustrated by saying that it is not a metaphor, in recalling to you that the scissors' cut in the Moebius strip makes a strip that no longer has anything to do with what it was previously. To take the next step, one could even say that in grasping this transformation, one perceives that it is the scissors' cut that, in itself, is the whole strip, I mean, as long as it is, in so far as it is, a Moebius strip.

This is a way of speaking about the slightest metaphor. In other words, in principle, whether you call it structuralist or not, let us say that it is not worth the trouble to talk about anything except the real in which discourse itself has consequences. Whether you call that structuralism or not, it is what I called the last time the condition of seriousness. It is particularly required in a technique whose pretension it is that discourse has consequences in it since the patient only submits himself in an artificially defined fashion to a certain discourse regulated in order that there should be consequences. Nothing prevails against these remarks, not even those that one sees displayed in books whose text is otherwise marked by this discourse itself, by saying that I neglect the energetic dimension for example. Things like that, I let pass. I let them pass when it is a matter of polemical responses. But here, we are at the heart of the subject since, as I pointed out the last time, for this exalted reference – especially for those who do not even know what it means – to energetics, I substituted a reference that, in our time, one would have difficulty in suggesting is less materialist, a reference to the economy, the political economy. But let us not disdain energetics on this occasion. For it to have a reference to our field, if we apply what I have just said, it is necessary that the discourse should have consequences in it.

Well then, precisely, it has! I am speaking about real energetics, about where it is situated in science, about physics. I even at one time, and well before these laughable objections were published, put into lectures that those involved were perfectly able to hear because they made use of them afterwards in their own lectures. I precisely underlined that energetics is not even conceivable otherwise than as a consequence of discourse. It is not because it is physics that it is not clear, that, without a signifying mapping out of the dimensions and the levels with respect to which there can be estimated, evaluated the initial function of the labour, naturally in the sense of (22) physics, there is not even the probability of beginning to formulate what is called the principle of all energetics in the literal sense of this term, namely, the reference to a constant, which is precisely what one calls energy, in relation to a closed system which is another essential hypothesis. That one can make with that a physics and one that functions, is indeed the proof of what is involved in a discourse that has consequences.

This implies at the same time that physics implies the existence of a physicist and, what is more, not just anyone whatsoever, a physicist who has a correct discourse in the sense that I have articulated it. Namely, a discourse that is worth the trouble saying and is not simply something that is all of a flutter; which is what energetics becomes when it is applied to a usage as delusional and hazy as that made of the notion of libido when people see in it what is called "a life drive". In short, to say that physics does not labour without the physicist is not, since I hope there will not be found any understanding here to formulate the objection – which would be rather ridiculous with what I have just stated – that this is an idealist postulate. Because what I am in the process of saying, is that it is the discourse of physics that determines the physicist and not the contrary. Namely, that there were never real physicists until this discourse prevailed. Such is the sense that I give to an acceptable discourse in what I am calling science.

Only there you are. Inevitably, people imagine that the realistic argument is to make an allusion to the fact that, whether we are there or not, we and our science, as if our science were ours, and if we were not determined by it, well then people say nature is always there. I absolutely do not dispute it. Nature is there. The way physics distinguishes itself from nature is that physics is worth saying something about, that discourse has consequences in it. In nature, as everyone knows – and that is even why it is so loved – no discourse has any at all! This is what differentiates nature from physics. To be a philosopher of nature was never taken at any period as a certificate of materialism, for example, nor of scienticity.

But let us take things up again, because that is not where we are. If physics does indeed give us a model of a discourse that is worthwhile, the necessities of our discourse ought to be taken at a higher level. Every discourse presents itself as heavy with consequences, but ones that are obscure. Nothing of what we say, in principle, fails to imply some. Nevertheless we do not know which. We notice in language – for it is at the level of language that I will take things up, and to clearly mark the limits – a syntax that is incarnated by a great number of tongues that, for want of boldness, are called positive tongues. Because I am there, and because I have just made a remark about nature that, I think, does not at all seem to you irrelevant, but (23) why, why should we inconvenience ourselves and not call them natural tongues? One would see better in this way what concerns linguistics and what allows it to be situated in the discourse of science. It is quite clear that even vis-à-vis language – whatever prevalence we may accord to it because we forget it as a natural reality – every scientific discourse about the tongue is presented by a reduction of its material. A functioning is highlighted in which consequences are grasped. I would say more, in which there is grasped the very notion of consequence with its varieties of necessary or contingent for example. There is carried out then a discursive split and this is what allows there to be given its whole value to the fact that I first of all affirm that there is no meta-language, which is true in the field of natural language. But why do you carry out this reduction of the material? I have just told you. It is to highlight a functioning in which consequences are grasped, and once you grasp consequences, you articulate them in something that you have the right to consider as meta-language, except for the fact that this "meta" can only create a confusion. And that this is why I would prefer what gives rise to the detaching in discourse of what must be called by its name, logic – I am indicating here nothing more – always conditioned by nothing other than by a reduction of material. And I illustrate here what I mean.

Reduction of material means that logic begins at this precise date in history when, for certain elements of language as functioning in their natural syntax, someone who understands it, who inaugurates logic, substitutes for certain of these elements a simple letter. It is starting from the moment when with, "if this, then that" you introduce an A or a B that logic begins. And it is only starting from there that in language you are able, about the use of this A and of this B, to pose a certain number of axioms and laws of discussion that will merit the title of being articulated as meta- or if you prefer para-language. So then no more than physics extends, like the goodness of God, to the whole of nature, does logic circumscribe the whole of language.

It nevertheless remains, as I have said, that either it is a delusion, absurd folly to dwell on it – this indeed in effect is the whole appearance that one has of it in these publications, most of them – to dwell on psychoanalysis, or what it states is that everything that you are, to be understood as up to now, as a sentient being – I did not say simply as a thinking being, even though after all there is no reason to have any repugnance for this term; is the fact of thinking the privilege of intellectualistic intellectuals who, as everyone knows, are the poison of this nether world, of this nether psychoanalytic world I mean – everything that you are as a sentient being falls under the influence of the consequences of discourse. Even your death, I mean the (24) quaint idea that you may have of it, is not separable from the fact that you can say it, and I mean by that not just to say it naively. Even the idea that I call quaint, because in effect it does not have any great weight for you, that you have of your death is not separable from the maximal discourse that you may weave about it. This indeed is the reason why the feeling that you have of it is nothing but quaint. I would

even say that naively, you cannot begin to say it. Because what I am alluding to, is not at all to the fact that primitive people are naïve and that is why they speak about it in such a funny way. That for them it is always a device, a poisoning, a spell that has been cast, a gadget that is not labouring somewhere, in short an accident, this does not at all prove that they speak about it naively. Do you find that that is naïve! It is quite the contrary. But it is precisely for that reason that they also fall under this law. The feeling they have about their death is not separable from what they can say about it, which was what had to be proved.

There is a person, like that, earlier, among those who might instruct themselves a little bit here and get rid of their nonsense, who left because she finds no doubt that what I am saying are banalities. Apparently it is necessary to say them; otherwise why would I take the trouble, after all I have just said, about the fact that a discourse has consequences or not. It had in any case as a consequence this leaving, which serves as a signal. This indeed is why it is essential that in psychoanalysis we should have some minds formed in what is called - I do not know why - "mathematical logic", like that, through an old constraint, as if there were any other. It is quite simply logic. It happens that it has interested mathematics. This is all that distinguishes it from Aristotelian logic that very obviously did not interest mathematics. It is a progress for logic that it interests mathematics, yes! This mathematical logic, to call things by their name, is altogether essential for your existence; whether you know it or whether you do not know it. It is precisely because you do not know very much about it that things happen that stir things up from time to time, very recent things. People are waiting for me to talk about them, but I will speak about them, I will speak about them! It all depends on the time that I am going to spend in unfolding what I prepared for you today and I would like to have a little point, like that, to give you before leaving you. But it is not sure, because I never know too well. What I bring you is never absolutely measured out.

That is not where the question is. Whether you know it or whether you do not know it, the bizarre question is that obviously I have just alluded to the fact, since I told you that whether you knew it or whether you did not know it, whether it has always been true that mathematical logic has consequences as regards your existence as a subject, (25) which I have just said are there whether you know it or whether you do not know

it. Because then the question is posed, of how it could happen before the logic that is called mathematical came to birth? It is the question of the existence of God. I have already remarked it but I repeat – one cannot repeat oneself too much – was mathematical logic already there, in the divine brainbox, before in your existence as a subject, which would have thus been conditioned from that moment on, you were already affected by it?

It is a problem that has all its importance because it is around this that there takes effect this advance that a discourse has consequences. Namely, that something close to the effects of discourse was required for there to be born that of mathematical logic. And that in any case, even if something could already represent in an existence of a subject something that retroactively we can attach to some facts in this existence of the discourse of logic, it is quite clear, it ought to be firmly held that they are not the same consequences as since this discourse, I mean that of mathematical logic, has been put forward.

Here there is situated the necessary and the contingent in the discourse that is effectively held. This indeed is where I have trouble in seeing why the structural reference is supposed to overlook the dimension of history. It is simply a matter of knowing what one is talking about! History as it is included in historical materialism appears to me to conform strictly to structural requirements. Was surplus value there before abstract labour, I mean what this abstraction is separated out from, I mean as a social means, resulted from something that we will call – I am not guaranteeing the exactitude of the first word but I want to say a word that has weight – the absolutisation of the market. It is more than probable, and for a good reason which is that we have, for that, introduced the surplus enjoying. That one can consider that this absolutisation of the market is only a condition so that surplus value can appear in discourse. There was therefore required this thing that can with difficulty be separated from the development of certain effects of language, namely, the absolutisation of the market to the point that it encompasses labour itself, for surplus value to be defined in the fact that in paying with money or not, with money because we are in the market, for labour, its true price, as the function of exchange value is defined in the market, there is an unpaid value in what appears as the fruit of labour, in a use value, in what is the true price of this fruit. This unpaid labour, even though

paid in a correct fashion with respect to the consistency of the market, this, in the functioning of the capitalist subject, this unpaid labour is the surplus value. It is the fruit of the means of articulation that constitutes the capitalistic discourse from capitalist logic.

(26) No doubt, when it is articulated in this way this involves a claim about the frustration of the labourer. This involves a certain position of the "I" in the system, when this "I" is in the place of the worker, which is more and more generally the case. That this involves that is strange. This is what should be said. Because it is only the consequences of a perfectly well defined discourse, into which the labourer inscribes himself as a labourer, as "I". I said "I" here. Notice that I did not say subject although I spoke about the capitalist subject. I am going slowly because after all I will come back to it, we will look at it again – except I hope those who leave in the middle! – and you will see that it is not for nothing that I am saying here "subject", and that there I say "I". Because that will be found at a certain level, and at a level that must have functioned for a long time because it is that of my graph that I constructed more than ten years ago before an audience of donkeys. They still have not found where the "I" is on this graph! So then I will have to explain it for them. In order to explain it for them, I must prepare. We labour. It is work. Let us hope that I can tell you before the end how the labour, for us, at the level of this discourse, of the teacher, is situated. So then it is strange that this involves the idea of frustration, with the complaints which follow, the little reconstructions that are distinguished under the name of revolution. It is strange. It is interesting.

But I cannot from now on not articulate that at this precise point the conflictual dimension is introduced. It is difficult to designate it otherwise. I said that it was strange, and that it is interesting. That ought at least to encourage you to recognise it, no? I will designate it by this strange word, not less interesting but strange, which is the word truth. You know, the truth is not grasped just like that, huh! Of course I introduced it, like that, at one time, in its junction whose topology I tried to draw, in its junction with knowledge, because it is difficult to speak about anything whatsoever in psychoanalysis without introducing this junction. This clearly shows the prudence that is necessary because God knows what has come back to me in this connection in terms of the idiocies that are doing the rounds!

We are going to try to approach it a little bit more closely and to see how the capitalist reality does not have such bad relationships with science. It can function like that, in any case for some time yet, to all appearances. I would even say that it accommodates itself to it not badly at all. I am speaking about reality, am I not? I did not speak about the Real. I spoke about what is constructed about the capitalist subject, what is generated from the complaint fundamentally made about the recognition – otherwise the discourse of Marx has no sense – called surplus value. This is properly the scientific incidence into the order of something that is the order of the subject. Obviously, at a certain level this does not accommodate itself badly at all (27) to science. People send into the spatial orbs objects that are quite well shaped as well as being habitable. But it is not sure that at a closer level, at the one where there is generated revolution and the political forms that it generates, something is entirely resolved on the plane of this frustration that we have designated as being the level of a truth. No doubt the labourer is the sacred locus of this conflictual element which is the truth of the system. Namely, that a knowledge which holds up all the more perfectly because it is identical to its own perception of being, is torn apart somewhere. So then let us take this step that is allowed us by the fact that what is at stake without any doubt is the same substance. Let us feel what is involved in the structural stuff and let us make our scissors' cut. It is knowledge that is at stake. It is in relation to it, in its scientific form, that I have just given a prudent appreciation about what is involved in the relations, in the two realities that are opposed in our political world.

Knowledge, even though earlier I seemed to begin my discourse from it, knowledge is not labour. It is worth labouring at sometimes but you can get it without labour. Knowledge, at the extreme point, is what we call the price. The price is sometimes incarnated in money, but just as much in knowledge! It is worth money and more and more so. This is what ought to enlighten us! The price of what? It is clear, the price of the renunciation of enjoyment. Originally it is through this that we begin to know a little bit. No need to labour for that. It is because labour implies the renunciation of enjoyment that every renunciation of enjoyment is only accomplished through labour. An illumination like that comes to you provided you know how to hold yourself back, or to contain yourself, as I alluded to it the last time to define thinking.

A little moment of pause. You can perceive for example that the woman does not live on bread alone, but also on your castration, this for the males. After that you will be able to conduct your lives with more certainty. That is a use value, so it is! Knowledge has nothing to do with labour. But in order that something should be clarified in this affair it is necessary that there should be a market, a market of knowledge that knowledge becomes merchandise. Now this is what is being precipitated. If you had no idea of it you ought at least to have a little suggestion of it, in seeing the form that things are taking, in seeing the atmosphere of a fair that for some time it took on in the University for example.

There are things like that, that I spoke about incidentally from other angles. There is no intellectual property, for example. That does not mean that there is not theft. It is even like that that it begins, property! All of this is very complicated. All of this only exists, of course, since lectures given abroad were paid for. I mean that one pays the foreigner. And even in France that is starting. It is from that moment that one can (28) discern what I once called, in an intimate circle, a heart lifting price (prix haut-le-coeur) to whoever shows himself to be specially in view in this sort of speculation. But all of this is only anecdote. Knowledge becomes a market not at all through the effect of corruption or the imbecility of men. You should understand for example that the Sorbonne, this has been known for a long time, is the elective place for this sort of negative quality, this sort of weakness. That was known everywhere throughout history. At the time of Rabelais, they were already swine. At the time of the Jansenists....it never fails, they are always on the right side; which means the wrong one! That is not what is new. That is not it! I looked for the root of what are ridiculously called the "events"; there was not the slightest event in this business. But I will explain this for you another time.

The very process by which science is unified in so far as it takes its node from a consequent discourse that reduces all knowledge to a single market, and this, for what we are questioning, is the nodal reference. It is starting from there that we can conceive that there is something there also that qua paid at its true price of knowledge according to the norms which are constituted from the market of science, is nevertheless obtained for nothing. This is what I called surplus enjoying. Starting from knowledge, what is not new but is only revealed starting from the homogenisation of knowledge on the market, one finally sees that enjoyment is organised and can be established as recherchée and perverse. What is it then on this occasion that represents the discontent of civilisation as it is put? It is a surplus enjoying obtained from the renunciation of enjoyment, there being respected precisely the principle of the value of knowledge. Is knowledge a good [commidity?]? This is the question that is posed because its correlative is the following: non licet omnibus – as I already said – adire Corynthum. Not everybody has for all that access to surplus enjoying.

What is there then in this affair paid or not? Labour as we have seen above. But in this register what is at stake? What I already highlighted earlier as regards what emerges in terms of conflict from the function of plus value puts us on the path, and this is what I already called the truth. The way in which each one suffers in his relationship to enjoyment in so far as he does not insert himself into it only through the function of surplus enjoying, this is the symptom, and the symptom in so far as it appears from the fact that there is no longer anything but an average social truth, an abstract truth. This is what results from the fact that a knowledge is always paid no doubt in accordance with its true price, but below the use value that this truth always generates for other than those who are in the truth. This is what the function of the surplus enjoying, of the Mehrlust involves, this Mehrlust that completely mocks us because we do not know where it is ensconced. Good! That is why your daughter is (29) mute, my dear children, namely, why in May we had our squalls. A great "speaking out, prise de parole" as someone who does not have in my field a negligible place expressed it. Taking the floor, I think that one would be wrong to give to this taking any homology with the taking of any particular Bastille. I would say rather taking tobacco or coke. The fact is that it was positively the truth that was manifested on this occasion. A collective truth, and which must be seen in the sense that the strike did not resonate at all badly with this truth, is precisely this sort of relationship that welds the collectivity to labour. It is even the same. Because one would be completely wrong to believe that a chap caught up in an assembly line works in it collectively in it. After all he is the one who does the work! In a strike, the collective truth of labour is manifested and what we have seen in May, was the strike of truth. There also the relationship to the truth was obvious. The truth was displayed on the walls. Naturally, you should remember at this moment the relationship that happily I had highlighted 3 months before that the truth of stupidity (vérité de la connerie) does not fail to pose the question of the stupidity of truth. There are even stupidities that have been said about Lacan's discourse. It reproduced it like that – it was by chance, of course – almost textually. This obviously depends on the fact that things extracted from their context may well be truths but that does not prevent them being stupidities. This indeed is the reason why what I prefer is a discourse without words.

The strange thing was what one saw in terms of a passionate questioning, the one that emerged in the soul of what I would call – I think that you will see there being profiled his silhouette – the communist priest, the one whose goodness does not have a limit either in nature. Receiving, with him, moral propositions, you can count on it, these are things that come with age. There was one that I pinpointed forever with the title of Mudjer Muddle. This is the name I gave him, I thought it up myself. It evokes the crocodile and the mud that he bathes in and the fact that with a delicate tear he draws you into his well-meaning world. I met Mudjer Muddle on the pavement of Boulevard Saint-Germain. He told me that he was looking for Marxist theory and that he was inundated – by what? By the happiness that all of this bathed in. But it never occurred to him that happiness could come from the strike of the truth. Who would not be happy of course; from the weight that it weighs on us at every moment of our existence, we can be aware of what is involved by no longer having anything but a collective relationship with it.

So then I do not depreciate the fact that these truths displayed on the walls were sometimes stupid. As I told you no one has remarked that they are also in my discourse. That is because in mine they frighten people. But on the walls they frightened people also. And it is indeed from this that it comes, so many stupid things give rise to an unequalled fear. When collective truth emerges you know that any discourse can clear out.

(30) There you are. Things have returned to order a little. But it is smouldering. That is why there is an outflow of capital. Well then! Since I have taken the risk today of giving my interpretation of what are called the events, I would like to tell you, you should not think for all that that this will stop the process. You would be wrong not to notice that, for the moment, there is even no question of it stopping, what I called the market of knowledge! And you yourselves are the ones who will act for it to become more and more established. The appearance in the reform of a notion like that of credits (unités de valeur), in the little bits of paper that you may be granted, the unit of value is that! It is the sign of what that knowledge is going more and more to become in this field, in the market that is called the University.

So then of course things ought to be followed very, very closely in order simply to map out there what is quite onbvious that the truth may have its spasmodic functions here, but that this is not at all what will regulate for each of you your existence as a subject. Of what the truth, I reminded you of it the last time, the truth, my God, in a text, I was very kind, I made it state the most intelligent propositions that I could attribute to it. I loaned it what I say when I am not telling the truth. In other words, no discourse can tell the truth. The discourse that holds up, is the one that can hold up long enough without you needing to account for its truth. Wait there, with your backs to the wall, those who may present themselves to you by saying "psychoanalysis you know, huh, for our part we can say nothing about it." It is not the tone you require if you want to master the world by a value called knowledge. If a discourse is slipping away you have only one thing to do, call it to account. Why? In other words, a discourse that is not articulated to say something is a discourse of vanity.

You must not believe that the fact of saying that all is vanity which is what I left you on the last time, is something other here than a lure on which, as I told you, I wanted you to leave with your souls in pain until I took up this discourse again. And as regards what is involved in those who posit as a principle an essential vanity of all discourse, this is what the one I hold will have to take up with you again the next time.

We arrived the last time at a point that requires me to give you today some clarifications that I would call topological. It is not something new to what I am introducing here. But it is necessary for me to link it to what, precisely, I introduced this year under this form that designated the relation of knowledge to something, certainly more mysterious, more fundamental. To something that runs the danger of being taken to have the function of background as compared to the field of a form, while what is at stake is something quite different. I am talking about enjoyment (jouissance). It is only too obvious that enjoyment is of course the substance of everything we speak about in psychoanalysis. Through it we know well that it is not formless. Enjoyment has here the significance of allowing us to introduce this properly structural function, that of the surplus enjoying. This surplus enjoying appeared, in my last talk, in function of a homology with respect to the Marxist surplus value. Homology, clearly means – and I underlined it – that the relation is not one of analogy. It is indeed the same thing that is at stake. It is a matter of the same stuff in so far as what is at stake is the scissors' mark of discourse.

Am I making myself understood?

If it is quite true that what is involved here in mine – because everyone who has followed for a sufficient time what I am stating here sees what function this relation of surplus enjoying to surplus value turns around

– it is the function of the o-object. If in a certain sense I invented this o-object as one can say that the discourse of Marx invents, what does that mean, it is the lucky find of surplus value, this is not to say, of course, that it was not approached before my discourse. And it was called, but in a frankly inadequate way, as inadequate as was the definition of surplus value before the discourse of Marx made it appear in its rigour. But the important thing is not to underline this equivalence in the order of the importance of the discovery. The important thing is to pose the question of what we can think of the very fact of the discovery if, first of all, I define it as an effect of discourse. Because it is not a matter of theory in the sense that it might overlap something that at a given moment, may become apparent. The o-object is an effect of analytic discourse and, as such, what I say about it is only this very effect.

(32) Does this mean that it is only an artifice created by analytic discourse? This is the point that I designate, which is consistent with the foundation of the question as I am posing it, as regards the function of analysis. If the analyst himself were not this effect, I would say more, this symptom that results from a certain incidence in History, implying the transformation of the relationship of knowledge to this enigmatic foundation of enjoyment, of the relationship of knowledge in so far as it is determining for the position of the subject, there would be neither analytic discourse nor of course a revelation of the function of the o-object. But the question of artifice, as you see clearly, is modified, is suspended, finds its mediation in this fact that, what is discovered in an effect of discourse, already appeared as effect of discourse in History. That psychoanalysis in other words, only appears as a symptom in so far as a turning point of knowledge in History – I am not saying the history of knowledge – a turning point of the incidence of knowledge in History is already there that concentrated, as I might say, to offer us, to put this function within our reach. I am speaking about the one defined by the o-object. It is clear that no one, except one, my Italian translator whose modesty I will not offend,

because she missed the plane this morning and is not here, who very clearly perceived, some time ago, the identity of this function of surplus value and the o-object. Why were there not more? Why not more people to have stated it unless of course it may have happened that the matter was not communicated to me?

This is the strange thing. The strange thing that undoubtedly is tempered by grasping in real life as I do, it is my destiny, the difficulty of the progress of this analytic discourse, the resistance that grows in the very measure that it is pursued. And nevertheless is it not curious, since moreover here I have a testimony that after all takes its value because it comes from someone who is of the youngest generation, is it not curious to see, through an effect, assuredly, that I will not designate as being that of my discourse, but as being that of the growing difficulty that is generated from what I called this absolutisation of the market of knowledge, I am able to touch very frequently, much more easily, in the coming generation, is my exchange with those who after all, through a little experiment of calculation, I was able to give the average age of, let us say with those who are 24 years old.

I would not go so far as to say that at 24 everyone is Lacanian! But surely that in a way, nothing of what I have been able to encounter over time, as they say, in terms of difficulties to make this discourse understood happens any longer, at least not at the same place as where I have to deal with someone or other – I am saying even being in no way a psychoanalyst – who approaches simply the problems of knowledge from their most modern angle and let us say has some openness to the domain of logic....You want me to speak a little bit louder over there? You are making a little gesture, good, good.

(33) Also, since it is in this generation that people are beginning – I have echoes of it already, fruits, results – to study my Ecrits, and even beginning to produce what are called diplomas or theses, anyway,

putting them to the test of a university transmission, I was able recently, and I was not at all surprised by it, to note undoubtedly the difficulty that these young authors have in extracting from these Ecrits what can be called a formula that is acceptable and classifiable in the pigeonholes that are offered to them. Assuredly, what escapes them most is what is in it, what gives it its weight and essence, which is no doubt what grabs these readers that I am always so astonished to know are so numerous, is the dimension of work which, so precisely, is represented there. I mean that each one of them, each one of the Ecrits represents something that I had to displace, to push, to transport in the order of this dimension of resistance which is not at all of an individual order. It is simply, because the generations, already at the time when I began to speak, were recruited already at an older level, were in this slippery relationship to knowledge, in a word, formed, anyway, in such a style that nothing, in itself, was more difficult than to situate them at the level of this annunciating, denunciating experience that psychoanalysis is.

This indeed is why I am trying to articulate today, I am doing it in a certain hope that something can be connected up between what is offered to me in the attention of the younger generation and what is effectively presented as a discourse. Nevertheless, let there be no kind of expectation that this discourse can become an articulated profession of a position of distance with respect to what is really happening in the progress of analytic discourse.

What I am stating about the subject as itself an effect of discourse absolutely excludes that mine should become a system. While what constitutes its difficulty is to indicate, by its very process, how this discourse is itself determined by a subordination of the subject, of the psychoanalytic subject that I am here supporting with respect to what determines it and belongs to all knowledge. My position, as everyone knows, is identical at several points to what under the name of epistemology, poses a question that one could in a way always define as follows: what is involved in the desire that sustains in the most hidden fashion the apparently most abstract discourse, let us say mathematical discourse?

Nevertheless, the difficulty is of a completely different order at the level where I have to place myself for the reason that, if what animates mathematical discourse is uncertain, it is clear that each of its operations is constructed to scupper, to elide and stitch up again, to suture this question at every instant. And remember what already appeared here four years ago about the function of the suture. While on the contrary, what is at stake in analytic discourse is to give its full (34) presence to this function of the subject. This reverses, on the contrary, the movement of reduction in logical discourse which is perpetually centred, and in a way all the more problematic in that it is in no way permitted to us to supply for what is a flaw, except by artifice, and by clearly indicating what we are doing at the moment when we allow ourselves to designate this lack, effect of significance (signifiance) of something that, claiming to signify it, cannot be, by definition, a signifier.

If we indicate the signifier of Ø - S(Ø) - it is in a way to indicate this lack, and, as I articulated on several occasions, this lack in the signifier. What does that mean? What does this lack in the signifier represent if moreover we can admit that this lack is something specific to our misguided destiny? There we designate the lack. It has always been the same, and if there is something that puts us in relationship with History, it is to conceive the degree to which, for so much time, men have been able to protect themselves from it. But this is not the question that I have come to raise before you today; on the contrary, I told you, it is a matter of topology. If there is a formula that I repeated these days, these times with insistence, it is the one that roots the determination of the subject in the fact that a signifier represents it, represents it for another signifier.

This formula has the advantage of inserting into the simplest, the most reduced connection, that of a signifier 1, S_1, to a signifier 2, S_2, $S_1 \rightarrow S_2$. This is what we must start from in order not to lose, no longer be able to lose for a single instant the dependency of the subject. The relation of this signifier 1 to this signifier 2, all those – and it is not at all rare to be able to hope, from a certain moment – all those who have heard something about what is involved in logic, in what is properly involved in set theory, in what is called an ordered pair. Here I can only give an indication of it even if it entails giving a commentary on it later if a demand comes to me. This theoretical reference is nevertheless important to be attached here.

Nevertheless, what I am calling my discourse does not date from today or yesterday. I mean that as I announced the last time to you, there is something that our path leads us to the edge of. It is what is already constructed at the very level of experience and I would say of work, of the work that consists in bringing into my discourse, in an "I say" provoking those who want to overcome the obstacle that is encountered by the simple fact that this discourse, at one time, began in an institution that, as such is designed to suspend it. And I tried to situate, to construct this discourse in its fundamental relation to the relationship of knowledge in something that some of those who may have opened my book may have found at a certain page drawn under (35) the name of graph – ten years! Ten years already since this operation culminated in its coming to birth in the seminar of 1957-58 on The formations of the unconscious. And to clearly mark things in the real life situation that was in question, I would say that it is through a commentary on the Witz, on the witticism as Freud puts it, on the witticism then I am saying that this construction began. In truth I did not work directly at referring myself to this discourse itself – to take up here the point at which I left it the last time – but much more to something that, it has to be said, without being perfect and even without bearing witness to singular carelessness, has the importance nevertheless of bearing witness that at a particular date, namely, this report, this summary was printed in the Bulletin de Psychologie. One can see in it that from that time, so prehistoric with respect to the emergence as such of the o-object that had not yet been designated – at this level which followed what I had done the previous year on object relations – that is not designated – but well and truly prefigured for whoever heard what followed – the o-object was only designated in the function of the metonymical object. Things are put in their place from that moment on and everyone can without referring to unpublished notes, find a testimony to it here in this report on The formations of the unconscious which covers in a first section the lectures of the 6th, 13th and 20th of November 1957. We find a first drawing which is presented as follows (figure 1).

In the clearest fashion it is here at d that this line starts and culminates here at d'; whether we put in d' or whether we do not put it in, it is clear that in looking at the drawing of this curve with this arrow at the end and this little pyramid at the start, there is no question of making it start here to go in the opposite sense. What matter, except for this detail, the testimony of the author of the summary retains its interest. Its interest above all in the fact to which he bears witness that if, since the matter has become banal, that this first outline of the graph has the function of inscribing somewhere what is involved in a unit of the signifying chain in so far as it only finds its completion where it cuts again the intention at the future perfect that determines it. Namely, that, if something is established which is the meaning (le vouloir dire),

(36) let us say that what is unfolded from the discourse will only be achieved by rejoining it, in other words only takes on its full import in the way designated here, namely, retroactively. It is starting from there that one can carry out a first reading of this relation to an O taken as Other, the locus of the code, namely, of what must already be supposed as a treasury of language in order for there to be extracted from it, under the seal of the intention, these elements that have been inscribed one after the other in order to unfold from there in the form of a series S_1, S_2, S_3, in other words a sentence that is only completed when something is firmly realised in it.

What would be more natural, if only in a didactic fashion, than to have articulated then – and after all, why would I myself not tremble now when I think how long this march was – to have let myself then slip into such weakness. Thank God there is nothing of the kind. I read from the pen of the scribe of that time who, despite his carelessness nevertheless very well retained here what is essential: "Our schema represents not the signifier and the signified, but two states of the signifier". The circuit, I am not going to repeat it for you in the way he states it because he states it wrongly, but it is obviously the following; the circuit designated as: ∂ O γ ∂', "represents the signifying chain in so far as it remains permeable to the effects of metaphor and metonymy, that is why we hold it to be constituted at the level of phonemes. The second line – it is the one you see drawn here whatever confusion is introduced into it by a bad mapping out on a schema that is poorly produced here, I am telling you simply almost at the level of literal designations – represents the circle of the discourse, common discourse constituted by semantemes that, of course, do not correspond in a univocal way to something of the signified but are defined by their use". You clearly sense the degree to which this, at the level at which I am constructing it, can be conditioned by the necessity of putting in place – even though it still had to be seen that this was the most evident access – of putting in place the formation of the unconscious in so far as it can produce on this occasion the Witz, what is involved in the formation of the word "famillionnairely". Is it not obvious that this can only be produced in so far as there can be re-cut in a precise structurally definable interference something that operates at the level of phonemes with something that belongs to the circle of discourse, of the most common discourse? When Hirsch Hyacinth – and it is essential here that it is not recounted here by Heinrich Heine the other H. H. – when Hirsch Hyacinth speaking about Solomon Rothschild says that he received him in 'a quite familiar way', familiarly comes into the circle of discourse, coming to say that he received him famillionairely. Namely, that there is inscribed there, that he brings into it supplementary phonemes, that he produces this priceless formula which does not fail to have an import, for anyone at all, this familiarity that, as Freud expresses it somewhere, does not fail to have (37) an aftertaste of millions. This is not a witticism, nobody will laugh if you express it in that way; if it is expressed, if it appears, if it makes a breakthrough in the form of famillionairely, laughter will not fail to be produced.

Why after all will it not fail? It will not fail very precisely because of the fact that a subject is involved in it. When it is a matter of knowing where to place it, and very obviously we can only here – as Freud himself articulates it – notice that the subject is always functioning in a triple register. There is a witticism only with respect to the presence of a third. The witticism does not hold up, as such, between one interlocutor and another. Namely, at the moment when Hirsch Hyacinth tells the thing to his pal, the latter sees himself as being elsewhere, as being ready to tell it to another third person. And effectively this tripleness is maintained when this other third person repeats it. Because in order for it to have its effect on the one to whom he is going to tell it, it is precisely in so far as Hirsch Hyacinthe here remains alone and questions from his place what is involved for the one who recounts it to the one towards whom the message is referred, namely, the new listener. Where is the sensitive point of this "famillionaireness" if not, very precisely in the fact that will escape

each of those who transmit it. It is, namely, this novelty of the subject that I will not hesitate on this occasion to transplant into this field of the relation that I made intervene, that I introduced into our discourse under the term of capitalist subject. What is the function of each of those who pass between the links of the iron network that this constitutes and is insufficiently pinpointed by the notion of the exploitation of some men by others. All those who are not caught in these two extremes of the chain, what are they in this perspective if not employees? It is in so far precisely as each of the interlocutors feels himself, without knowing it, at the passage of this gentle fun of "famillionaireness", involved as an employee or if you wish, as implicated in the tertiary sector, that this causes laughter.

I mean that it is not at all indifferent that it is Heinrich Heine who tells us that he got it from the mouth of Hirsch Hyacinth. But let us not forget that after all if Hirsch Hyacinth had existed, he is also the creation of Heinrich Heine. I already showed what the relations between Heinrich Heine and Baron Betty were, and that whoever is introduced from this angle into this something which appears to be only a point, a sally, a witticism, if he laughs, it is qua involved in this capture exercised, not just by something indifferent, a certain form of riches, certain modes of its incidence in a relation that is not simply that of social oppression, but of the involvement of every position of the subject in the knowledge that it commands.

But the interest of recalling the structure, in recalling that from this point on I distinguished here in a rigorous way the circle of discourse, (38) is indeed to show that in this way there was prepared the true function of what completes this first approximation of what is involved in discourse. Namely, that nothing can be articulated concerning the function of the subject if it does not to duplicate him with what seems, at another level, uniquely in virtue of the dimensions of paper, to be presented as a higher stage, but which is only there – one could just as easily describe it upside down – in so far as it is precisely appended to this function of the big O which is the one that we have to question today.

We question it because there is no part of the discourse that, of itself, does not question it. I said in what well articulated way, so well highlighted by the analytic discourse itself in the way I introduced the hook as I might say, when I began to draw it in this way, stitching onto this simplified graph a question mark on top of it. I called it "Che vuoi?" in a reference to the Diable amoureux. What does it want? What does the Other want? I ask myself.(Figure 2). This duplicity of the relation to the Other which means we have here reduplicated what is presented as discourse or, let us say it in the more refined way, stating that is presented as demand, in a way that is perfectly well indicated here, that this barred subject put into a conjunction, the one defined by what I will call provisionally the diamond shape, ◊, with the demand D, articulated as such (Figure 3). This is moreover what this text and this account bear witness to, that already, it is well and truly as demand that this line is constituted.

If here, what is contributed as homologous to the function s(O), namely, to what is produced as subject-effect in the stating, here then, (39) the indication or the index S(Ø) is now what we have not I would say to interpret for the first time, for I already did it in several forms, but to question again in the perspective that we are introducing today. We must therefore start again from the point that the subject is defined at the lowest point of what here is presented as a ladder, as being what a signifier represents for another signifier.

It is not simply through the superimposition of the function of the Imaginary on the Symbolic that I indicated here in my first schema the presence of the object then simply called metonymical object, to put it in correspondence with something which is its image and its reflection in e, in other words the ego, the image of o. The questioning about the desire of the Other is here the mainspring of Imaginary identification. It is apparently Imaginary, that is why I am putting it in red, but we are going to see it also is articulated in a symbolic way. Here as you know there appeared for the first time the formula of phantasy, in the form of $ diamond o. (Figure 4).

If from this moment on it is clearly indicated that the chain that retroverts this one, $\partial O \gamma \partial'$, is the chain of the signifier, it is indeed because there is here already contained the relation of the signifier 1, S_1, to this minimal form that I called the ordered pair to which there is limited the statement of the signifier as being what represents a subject, a subject for what? For another signifier. This other signifier in this radical connection, is very precisely what represents knowledge, knowledge then, in the first articulation of what is involved in the function of the signifier in so far as it determines the subject. Knowledge is this opaque term in which, as I might say, the subject loses himself, or again is extinguished if you wish and this is what the notion that I underlined by using the term fading always represents. In this relation, in this subjective genesis, at the start, knowledge presents itself as this term in which the subject has extinguished itself; this is the sense of what Freud designated as Urverdrängung. This so-called (40) repression that is said, explicitly formulated, not to be such, but as being this kernel already beyond the reach of the subject while at the same time being knowledge. This is what the notion of Urverdrängung signifies in so far as it makes it possible for every signifying chain to connect up with it, implying this enigma, this veritable contradiction in adjecto, which the subject as unconscious is.

We have therefore sketched out here, from a very early or sufficiently early time in the articulation of this discourse that I find myself supporting in analytic experience, we have already put in question, interrogated, this question of what can be meant, at the level of discourse, of the formation of the unconscious, of the Witz on this occasion, who can say here: "I say". Because I precisely distinguished, and this from the origin of this discourse, what is involved in discourse and the word. And the key formula that I

inscribed this year at the first of these seminars, about what is involved in a discourse without words, the essence as I said of analytic theory, is indeed here to remind you that it is at this joint that there is going to be brought into play, this year, what we have to advance so that, in From an Other to the other who are we allowing to speak? It is not at all the word that is at stake here and I have not yet shown you, though already nevertheless I brought it into play by reminding you of the discourse that I attributed to this essentially ungraspable person that I called the Truth. If I made her say: "Me, I speak.....", it is indeed, as I underlined, because it is a matter of something different to what she says. I am indicating it here to mark that it is in the background, that she is waiting for us as regards what we have to say about the function of discourse. Let us take it up again now and observe that what is involved in the signifying chain – always the same, I am drawing it again – is the relationship of the signifier to another signifier.

Let us be satisfied, it is an artifice of presentation – I have no reason to hide it here – that allows me to avoid an introduction along the path of set theory and the reminder – if I had to do it, I would have to do it in some articulated way – the reminder of this fact that at the first step, this theory stumbles over a paradox, the one called Russell's paradox. Namely, what is to be done in a certain definition, that of sets, namely, what is closest to the signifying relation, a relation of connection. Nothing else is yet indicated in what the first definition of the function of signifier articulates, if not that it is the signifier 1, in a relationship that we can define as we wish, the simplest term will be that of belonging, the relationship of a signifier to another signifier. In this relationship we have said, it represents the subject S_1 S_2. This so simple connection is enough to indicate to us if so many other traits did not indicate it to us, to indicate to us that from mathematical logic, as several linguists have perceived, it is set theory that finds itself most able to treat it. I am not saying to formalise it, but to treat this (41) connection. I remind you, for those who have heard it spoken of a little bit, that the first step that is met with is that with this single

condition of considering as a class – and this can even be proved – every element of such a connection in so far as one can write that it does not belong to itself, is going to involve a paradox. I repeat, I am only giving this introduction here to indicate the place, to develop it would make us rebound onto still more curious statements. Perhaps if we have the time or if we take it later on we will be able to do it.

I am going to proceed differently and only starting from my graph try to show you in a way, a formal one, what we are led to by the fact that we take the formula, the signifier represents the subject only for another signifier, that we take the elements that are offered us by the graph itself at the start, from here. It is S, a signifier that we are going to put here. If we take as other signifier this one constituted by O, if we called it first of all big O, the locus, the treasury of signifiers, do we not find ourselves in a position to question the following arrangement: what is involved in posing as signifier of the relation itself the same signifier that intervenes in the relation? In other words, if it is important, as I underlined, that in this definition of the signifier there only intervenes the alterity of the other signifier, what are we going to be led to? Can it be formalised in a way that leads somewhere, by pinpointing from this same signifier big O, the otherness of O? What is involved in the relation? This way of posing the question – I say it also to reassure those that it may disturb – is not at all foreign to what constitutes the starting point of a certain phylum of formalisation in mathematical logic. This, at this level, would require me to develop sufficiently the difference constituted by the definition of a set as compared to the class. The question is so well posed in mathematical logic that it is a point where it is indicated in this logic that, would to heaven concerned us more closely, because the problems are resolved in it. Namely, that the class of sets that contain themselves – you see here at least indicated an example of it under the form of this inscription – this class does not exist. But we have something different to do than mathematical logic.

Our relationship to the Other is a more burning relationship. And the (42) fact of knowing whether what emerges from the simple fact of the demand that the Other contains already in a way, everything it is articulated around, if it were simply a question of discourse. In other words if there were a dialogue, that very precisely, at the end of last year, I proposed here that there is not this dialogue, if then this Other could be conceived of as a closed code, one whose key you would only have to press for the discourse to be established without fail, so that the discourse can be totalised in it. This is what, in this rudimentary fashion, and in a way in the margin of set theory, I am questioning. In place of this S_I, I could have put a little b like that you would have noticed that it is a matter of b, a, ba. We are at the b, a, ba of the question. And from the ba you are going to see how it is dug out and this topologically. And this is how we have posed the question. It is clear that O in the ordered pair that constitutes this set is taken as identical to the O that designates it. We are therefore going to write as follows, the relationship of S with S in relation to big O, $S \rightarrow (S \rightarrow O)$.

I substitute for this O what this O is in so far as it is the signifier of the set constituted by the relationship of S to O, a relationship of ordered pair. This is quite usual in any development of a set theory whose very foundation is the fact that every element is supposed to be able to be the set itself. You see then what happens. Starting from this process we are going to have a series of – I do not know what the circles that I am drawing are, they helped us to make the set and its designation as such function – we have an indefinite repetition of S without ever being able at the end to stop the withdrawal, as I might say, of the big O.

You must not get it into your head nevertheless that it is reduced, that it vanishes, as I might say spatially, that there is indicated here in any way something that constitutes whether it is of the order of an infinitesimal reduction of distance, or of some passage to the limit. It is only a matter of the ungraspability, even though it remains always (43) the same, of this O as such. This ungraspable character should not surprise us since we have made of this O the locus of the Urverdrängung. It allows us to see precisely that what I was questioning earlier, namely, what was involved in what is designated here as a circular drawing. It is in the measure that the O is multiplied in this way, simply from that fact, we can write it outside and inside, these circles are only indexing this identity. In other words, that this circle, pushed further in one direction, from which there emerges this notation of asymmetry will always in the final analysis join up with the starting circle.' That this flight which ensures that it is in its own interior that an envelope finds its outside, this is what – you may or may not sense the kinship – what we have drawn in one of the previous years in the topological form of the projective plane and illustrated in a materialised fashion for the eye by the cross-cap. That the big O, as such, has in itself this flaw that one cannot know what it contains if it is not its own signifier, is the decisive question in which there is highlighted what is involved in the flaw of knowledge. To the degree that it is at the locus of the Other that there is appended the possibility of the subject in so far as it is formulated, it is most important to know that what guarantees it – namely, the locus of truth – is itself a locus that is holed.

In other words, what we already know about a fundamental experience that is not a random experience, an out of date production of priests, namely, the question does Gòd exist? We perceive that this question only takes on its weight because precisely it depends on a more fundamental structure, namely, at the locus of knowledge can we say that in some way knowledge knows itself? It is always in this way that I tried, for those who listen to me, to displace this question that can only be the object of a wager about the existence of God, to displace it onto something that can be well and truly articulated. Namely, that however we support the function of knowledge, we are not able, it is a fact of experience, to support it except by articulating it in the signifier. Does knowledge know itself or is it gaping wide in its structure?

The circle that draws this shape that, more simply again, I mean O, for you to be able to find your bearings in it, I could - given this character that my drawing has of being a circle that rediscovers itself, but turned inside out, since what is most interior is connected up in order that a sense can be given to it as an index of the difficulty that is at stake - have referred myself, I said, to the Klein bottle, which I made enough drawings of here, I hope, for some people to remember it. What appears from it is what? It is that this structure, and in so far as you see, as we can give it some imaginary support – and this indeed is why we ought to be particularly sober – this structure is nothing other than the o-object. It is precisely because of that that the o-object is the hole that is designated in the Other as such, that is put in question for us in (44) its relation to the subject.

Because let us try now to hold onto to this subject where it is represented. Let us try to extract this S, this signifier that represents it from the set constituted by the ordered pair. It is here that it would be very simple for you to find yourself on familiar terrain, it is Russell's paradox. What are we doing here if not extracting from the set Ω the signifiers that we can say do not contain themselves. It is enough –

and I will let you search in the first pages of any theory at all, naïve or not, of sets – it is enough for you to have consulted it to know that, in the same way as it is perfectly illustrated in the articulation of the sophism, the class of all the catalogues that do not contain themselves cannot in any way be situated in the form of a set for the good reason that it cannot in any way be recognised in the elements already inscribed of this set. It is distinct from it, I already went over this theme. It is well known. It is trivial. There is no way of inscribing in a set this something that you could extract from it by designating it as the set of elements that do not contain themselves.

I am not going to show it here on the board. It is enough simply that what results from simply posing the question of whether S is in O – in so far as contrary to it, it does not start from the fact, that as O, with respect to itself, it contains itself – by simply wanting to isolate it, you do not know, try it out, where to place it. If it is outside it is inside. If it is inside it is outside. In other words that in no way, for any discourse that posits itself as being essentially founded on the relationship of a signifier to another signifier, it is impossible to totalise it as discourse in the measure in which this is said and is posed as a question. The universe of discourse – I am speaking here not simply of the signifier, but of what is articulated as discourse – will always have to be extracted from whatever field whatsoever that pretends to total it.

In other words, that what you will see being produced inversely to this schema, is that, in the measure that you question yourself about the belonging to the set of any S whatsoever first of all posited in this relation, the S will be necessarily excluded from the small o. And that the next S you question – I said small o that was a mistake – the next S that you question is the one reproduced in the relation S(O) that I here showed, reproduced, will also leave it. They will all leave it indefinitely given the essence of what is essentially metonymical in the continuity of the signifying chain. Namely, that every signifying element is extracted from any conceivable totality.

This, I apologise, to end, is no doubt a little difficult. But note that (45) in seeing this process being displayed with successive exits from envelopes that are never unfruitful, and not ever being able to be encompassed in it either, what is indicated, is that what is tangible in terms of the division of the subject emerges precisely from this point – that, in a spatial metaphor we call a hole, in so far as it is the structure of the cross-cap or of the Klein bottle – emerges precisely from this centre where the o is posited as absence.

This is enough to make you apprehend the continuation of the consequence that I will pursue as regards the graph and which may take on its full import as regards the place of analytic questioning between the chain of demand and the enunciating chain. Between the enunciating by which the subject only states himself as "he" and between what appeared not simply in terms of the demand, but of the relationship of the demand to the enunciating chain, as "I" and as "thou". This will be the object of our next meeting.

Seminar 4: Wednesday 4 December 1968

Let us go to the heart of things because we are late and let us take things up by recalling on what, in short, were centred our last remarks about the Other, in short, about what I called the big Other. I ended by putting forward certain schemas, while sufficiently warning, I think, that they were not to be taken uniquely from their more or less fascinating appearance, but were to be referred to a logical articulation, the one properly made up of this relationship of a signifier to an Other signifier, $S_1 \rightarrow S_2$, that I tried to articulate in order to draw out its consequences by starting from the function, elaborated in set theory, of the ordered pair. At least it was on this logical foundation that I tried the last time to make you sense this something that has a point, a point around which there turns the interest - the interest for all I hope - the interest that it should be well articulated, that the Other, this big Other, O, in its function as I already approached it, the Other enclosed no knowledge that one can presume, let us say, will one day be absolute. You see, there I am pointing things towards the future while ordinarily I articulate towards the past, that this reference to the Other is the erroneous support of knowledge as already there. Good! So then here I am highlighting - because in a moment we are going to have to say it again - I am pointing up the use that I made of the function of the ordered pair. Because I had, my God, something that could be called the good luck, to receive from a hand that I regret is anonymous, a piece of paper posing the question of explaining myself perhaps a little more about this use of the ordered pair that, no doubt, to the author of

this note seemed a little precipitous, if not excessive. He perhaps does not all the same go that far – precipitous. I am not going to begin with that, but I take note to say that later then I will come back to it.

That the Other should be put in question, is extremely important for the continuation of our discourse. There is not in this statement, let us say first – this statement that the Other contains no knowledge that is either already there or to come, in an absolute status – there is not in this statement anything subversive.

I read something recently somewhere, at an ideal point that moreover will remain in its corner, as I might say, the term 'subversion of knowledge'. This term 'subversion of knowledge' was there, my God, advanced more or less under my patronage. I regret it because in truth I advanced absolutely nothing of the sort, and such slippages can only (47) be considered as very regrettable and enter into this sort of shoddy usage that can be made of fragments that are not even very well detached from my discourse. A screwing together again of terms that my discourse, precisely, never dreamt of bringing together to make them function on a market which would not be at all happy if it took the turn of being used for university colonisation. Why should knowledge be subverted because it cannot be absolute? This pretension, wherever it shows itself, or wherever it has shown itself, it must be said, has always been laughable. Laughable, precisely, we are here at the heart of our subject. I mean that this new start made in the witticism in so far as it provokes laughter, it provokes laughter, precisely, in short, in so far as it is properly attached to the fault inherent in knowledge.

If you will allow me a little parenthesis, I will recall, I will recall somewhere in – I thought I still had 25 minutes when I began, thank God, to signal that I wanted a taxi to be called, so that I did not find exactly the page of the first chapter of the third part of Capital, The production of absolute surplus value and chapter V on Labour and its

valorisation. It is there I believe that there are found a few pages, something that, make no mistake, I did not wait for the recent researches on the structuralism of Marx to pick out. I mean that this old volume that you see more or less coming apart in pieces, I remember the time when I read it in what was my transportation of that time, when I was 20 years old, namely, the Metro, when I was going to the hospital. And at that time, there was something that caught me and struck me, namely, how Marx, at the moment he introduces surplus value, he introduced a little more, a little surplus value, he did not introduce it, nor value, I am confusing you, but he introduces it and he introduces it after taking some time. Taking time like that, in a gentlemanly way, he allows the person involved, namely the capitalist, to speak. He allows him, in a way, to justify his position through what is then the theme. In any case the service that is rendered, in a way, by putting at the disposition of this man who only has, my God, his work, and at the very most a rudimentary instrument, his jointer, the lathe and the milling machine thanks to which he is going to be able to do marvels. An exchange of good and even loyal services. A whole discourse that Marx takes his time to develop, and what he signals, what struck me at that time, at the time of these good old readings is that he highlights there that the capitalist, a ghostly personage he is confronting, the capitalist laughs.

This is a feature that seems superfluous. It nevertheless seemed to me, it appeared from then on that this laughter is properly something that refers to what at that very moment Marx is unveiling, namely, what is involved in the essence of this surplus value. "My good apostle", he says to him, "keep talking. The service as you understand it, if you wish, of putting the means that you find you have at the disposition of (49) the one who can work. But what is at stake, is that this labour, this labour that you are going to pay for, that he can fabricate with this lathe and milling machine, you will not pay him any more for it than for what he was doing with his jointer that I evoked earlier. Namely, what he would have been able to guarantee by means of this jointer,

namely, his subsistence." What is highlighted in passing, and of course not noted, about the conjunction of laughter with this relationship, this relationship here to a pleading that appears to be nothing but the most honest of discourses, is this relationship to this radically eluded function, whose proper relationship to this characteristic elision in so far as it properly constitutes the o-object, I already sufficiently indicated in our discourse

Here again, I am saying it because of not having been able to do so at the time when I began to construct the graph around the witticism, here is the fundamental relationship around which there still turns the shock, the forcing, a little more, a little less that I spoke about earlier, the conjuring trick, the hey presto that grabs our gut in the effect of the witticism. In short, the radical, essential function of the relation that is hidden in a certain relationship of production to work is indeed, as you see there as elsewhere, at another deeper point which is the one to which I am trying to lead you. Around surplus enjoying there is something like a fundamental gag that depends properly speaking on this joint into which we have to drive our wedge when what is at stake is this relationship that operates in the experience of the unconscious in its most general function. This is not to say – and here again I am going to take up something that may be used for risky formulae – this is not to say that there can in any way be a theory of the unconscious. In what I am doing, trust me, it is nothing of the kind that I am aiming at.

That there is a theory of psychoanalytic practice, undoubtedly, of the unconscious, no. Unless you want to pour in what is involved in this theory of psychoanalytic practice, which what? In the unconscious gives us what can be taken up in this field in the field of this practice, but nothing else. To speak about the theory of the unconscious, is really to open the door to this sort of ridiculous deviation that I am hoping to prevent. This is what has been displayed already, for long years, under the term of 'applied psychoanalysis', and has allowed all sorts of abuse. To apply it precisely to what? In particular to the fine arts! In short, I do not want to insist any more, towards this form of tipping over or dumping on the edge of the psychoanalytic road, the one that ends up in a hole that I find dishonourable.

Let us take things up again. The Other only gives the stuff of the subject, or his topology or that through which the subject introduces a subversion certainly, but that is not only his own in the sense that I have pinpointed when I spoke about the subversion of the subject. The subversion of the subject with respect to what has been stated about it up to now, this is what is meant by this articulation in the title I put it into. But the subversion that is at stake is the one that the subject (50) introduces certainly, but that the Real sticks to, which in this perspective, is defined as the impossible. Now, there is no subject at the precise point where it interests us, except the subject of an assertion (dire). If I posit these two references, that to the Real and that to the assertion, it is to clearly mark that here that you may still vacillate and pose the question, for example, whether this is not what was always imagined about the subject. It is moreover also there that you have to grasp what the term subject states in so far as it is the effect, the dependent (la dépendance) of this assertion. There is no subject except of an assertion, this is what we have to correctly circumscribe in order never to detach the subject from it.

To say moreover that the Real is the impossible, is also to state that it is only the most extreme circumscribing of the assertion in so far as it is the possible that it introduces and not simply that it states. The flaw remains no doubt, for some people, that this subject would then be, in a way, a subject taking its worth from this discourse. That if would only be the deployment, a canker crossing in the middle of the world where the junction takes place that, all the same, brings this subject to life.

It is not just anything in things that makes a subject. This is where it is important to take things up again at the point where we do not tip over into confusion in what we are saying - the confusion that would allow there to be restored this subject as thinking subject, any pathos whatsoever – about the signifier, I mean, through the signifier, does not of itself make a subject of this pathos. What this bathos defines is in every case, quite simply, what is called a fact. And it is here that there is situated the distance in which we have to question what our experience produces. Something different that goes much further than the being that speaks in so far as it is man that is at stake. More than one thing can suffer from the effect of the signifier, everything in the world that does not properly become a fact (fait) unless its signifier is articulated. Not ever, never, does any subject come unless the fact is said. Between these two frontiers is where we have to work. What cannot be said about the fact is designated in the assertion, by its lack, and that is the truth. That is why the truth always insinuates itself, but can be inscribed also in a perfectly calculated way where it simply has its place, between the lines. The substance of the truth is precisely what suffers from the signifier. That goes very far. What suffers from it in its nature. Let us say, when I say that this goes very far, this precisely goes very far in nature.

For a long time people seemed to accept what is called the spirit. It is an idea that got across in some little way. Moreover, nothing ever gets across as much as people think. In any case it got across a little because of the fact that it proves that there is never anything else at stake under the name of spirit than the signifier itself. Which obviously puts a lot of metaphysics out of sync. As regards the relationships of our effort to metaphysics, as regards what is involved in a putting in question that tends not to lose all the benefit of the (51) experience of metaphysics, something of it remains. Namely, the following which is indeed in a certain number of points, of areas more varied and better equipped than one might think at first approach and of very different qualities, it is a matter of knowing what 'structuralism' has to bring about. The question is raised in a collection that has just appeared, I got the first fruits of it, I do not know whether it is in circulation: "What is structuralism?" which we owe to the summons addressed to some people by our friend François Wahl. I advise you not to miss it, it brings a certain number of questions up to date. But undoubtedly this means that it is rather important to mark our distinction from metaphysics. In truth, we have, on this point, marked something that it is not useless to state, that one must not believe too much in what advertises itself as disillusion. The disillusion of the spirit is not a complete triumph if elsewhere it sustains the superstition that would designate in an idealness of matter this very substance that one first puts into the spirit as impassible. I am calling it superstition because after all we know its genealogy. There is a tradition, the Jewish tradition curiously, in which one can indeed highlight what a certain transcendence of matter may be able to sketch out. What is stated in the scriptures, singularly unnoticed of course, but quite clear concerning the corporeality of God. These are things that we cannot develop today. It was a chapter of my seminar on The name of the father, which as you know [the sign of a cross in the air] I have definitively renounced, make no mistake. But in any case, this superstition described as materialist – one may well add popular, that changes nothing at all – deserves the share of love that everyone has for it, because it is indeed what has been most tolerant up to now of scientific thinking. But you must not believe that this will always last. It would be enough for scientific thinking to make people suffer a little in this quarter – and it is not unthinkable – for the tolerance in question not to last!

A sensitivity that is evoked already, my God, towards remarks like the ones I made one day before an honourable member of the Academy of Sciences of the USSR, that cosmonaut appears to me to be a bad name. Because in truth, nothing appeared to me less cosmic than the trajectory that was his support. A kind of disturbance, of agitation for such a gratuitous remark, my God, the properly speaking rash resistance, that it is not sure, after all – that is what I meant to say – that anything whatsoever, whether you call it God in the sense of the

Other, or Nature – it is not the same thing – but it is indeed to one of these two aspects that there must be reserved, attributed a prior knowledge of the Newtonian law for people to have been able properly speaking to talk about cosmos and cosmonaut. This is where one senses the amount of metaphysical ontology that continues to find shelter even in the most unexpected places.

(52) What is important for us is what justifies the rule that sets up psychoanalytic practice, quite stupidly, the one described as free association. Free means nothing other than dismissing (congédiant) the subject. To dismiss the subject is an operation, an operation that does not necessarily succeed; it is not always enough to tell somebody to quit for him to go. What justifies this rule is that the truth, precisely, is not said by a subject but is suffered. Let us pinpoint here what we will call phenomenological infatuation. I already picked out one of these tiny monuments that are displayed in a field where statements easily take on a patent of ignorance. Essence de la manifestation, is the title of a book very well received in the university field, and after all I have no reason to give the author because I am in the process of qualifying him as a conceited ass. The essence of his own manifestation, in any case, from this title as well as the power with which at a particular page there is articulated that there is one thing given to us as certain, it is that suffering, for its part, is nothing other than suffering. I know, in effect, this always does something to you when you are told that! It is enough to have a toothache and never to have read Freud to find that rather convincing. Here after all is why one may think incidentally – but there truly I think that I am also a little traditional – why one may give thanks for such blunders (pas de clercs), make no mistake, to call them that, to promote, as one might say, what is not to be said, for one to clearly mark the difference to what there has to truly be said. It is a little bit too much of a justification to give to error and that is why I am signalling in passing that in saying this, I do not completely adhere to it. But for that, my

God, I would have to re-establish what is involved in an apologia for sophists, and God knows where that would lead us.

In any case, the difference is the following. If what we are doing, we analysts, works, it is precisely because suffering is not suffering and to say what should be said one should say: "Suffering is a fact". This seems to be saying almost the same thing, but it is not at all the same, at least if you have well understood what I told you earlier about what a fact is. Rather let us be more modest; there is some suffering that is a fact, namely, that conceals an assertion. It is through this ambiguity that we refute that it is unsurpassable in its manifestation, that suffering can be a symptom, which means truth. I make the suffering speak, as I made the truth speak in a first approach – the effects of discourse must be tempered – I made them say, although in terms not modulated in the same tone for the one and the other, I speak. I am recalling it since I came back to it recently.

Let us try to be more rigorous as we advance. Suffering has its language and it is quite unfortunate that anybody at all can say it without knowing what he is saying. But, in any case, that is precisely (53) the trouble with all discourse. It is from the moment that it is rigorously stated, since true discourse is a discourse without words, as I wrote this year as a frontispiece, anyone could repeat it after what I have said to you. It no longer has any consequences. This is one of the risky aspects of the situation. Let us then leave suffering to one side and, as regards the truth, let us specify what we are going to have to focus on subsequently.

The truth, for its part, essentially speaks. It speaks "I" and you see defined there two extreme fields, the one in which the subject is only located by being the effect of the signifier, the one in which there is the pathos of the signifier without any mooring point yet being made in our discourse to the subject, the field of fact, and then what finally interests us and what was not even touched on anywhere but on Sinai,

namely, what speaks "I". On Sinai – I apologise, that just slipped out – I did not want to rush on to Sinai but since it has come out I have to justify why. Some time ago, just around this little flaw in my discourse called The name of the father and which remains gaping wide, I had begun to question the translation of a certain – I do not pronounce Hebrew well – "Haye". I think that this is pronounced "Hacher Haye", what the metaphysicians, the Greek thinkers translated by "I am the one who is". Naturally they had to have being. Only that does not mean that. There are middle terms, I am talking about people who say: "I am who am". That means nothing; it has the blessing of Rome. I pointed out, I believe that it should be understood as "I am what I am". In effect, this has all the same the value of a punch in the face. You asked me my name, I answer "I am what I am and go and screw yourself". This indeed is what the Jewish people have being doing ever since that time.

Since Sinai came out there in connection with the truth that speaks "I", it was Sinai that came out of me! But I had already thought about the question. I did not think I was going to speak to you about it today. But in any case since it has happened, let's go. I think it must be translated: "I am what I is" (Je suis ce que je est). That is why Sinai slipped out of me like that. It is to illustrate for you what I intend to question around what is involved in the 'I', in so far as the truth speaks 'I'. Naturally the rumour will spread in Paris, in the little cafes where all the gossip takes place that, like Pascal, I have chosen the God of Abraham, of Isaac and of Jacob. Let the souls from whatever quarter they are carried to welcome this news, put their emotion back in the drawer, the truth speaks "I" but the reciprocal is not true. Not everything that says "I" is the truth, without that where would we be?

This does not mean that these remarks are completely superfluous. Because you should clearly understand that in putting in question the function of the Other, and on the principle of its very topology, what I am disturbing -it is not too great a pretension, it is really the question

on the agenda - is properly what Pascal called the God of the (54) philosophers. Now to put that in question is not nothing! Because all the same, up to the present, he has had a hard life. And in the way that earlier I made an allusion to, he remains all the same quite present in a whole load of modes of transmission of this knowledge when I tell you that it is not at all subverted, even and much more, by putting in question this Other who is supposed to be able to totalise it. This is the sense of what I contributed the last time.

On the other hand, whether he told the truth or not, the other God that we should pay homage to our Pascal for having seen that he has strictly nothing to do with the other, the one who says "I am what I is". That this should have been said had some consequences. And I do not see why, even without seeing in it the slightest chance of truth, we should not enlighten ourselves from some of its consequences in order to know what is involved in the truth in so far as it speaks "I".

An interesting little thing, for example, is to notice that because the truth speaks "I" and because the response is given to it in our interpretation, for us psychoanalysts, it is an occasion for noting that interpretation is not simply our privilege. It is something I already spoke about at one time under the title of Desire and its interpretation. I pointed out that in putting the question around the "I" in this way, we ought, even if only to take a warning or indeed umbrage from it, to perceive that from then on, interpretation ought to be better circumscribed. Because prophetism is nothing else. To speak "I" in a certain furrow which is not that of our suffering is also interpretation. The destiny of the Other is suspended then, I would not say at the question, I would not say at my question, at the question posed by psychoanalytic experience. The drama is that whatever may be the fate this putting in question reserves for it, what the same experience demonstrates, is that it is from the desire of the Other that I am (je suis) - in the two marvellously homonymic senses of these two words in

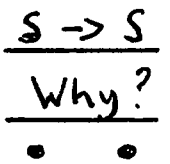
French - that I follow (je suis) the trace. It is moreover precisely for that reason that I am interested in the destiny of the Other.

So then we have another quarter of an hour and the little note that I received goes as follows: "Last Wednesday you related, without specifying, the ordered pair and a signifier represents the subject for another signifier, (S S)". That is quite true. That is why no doubt my correspondent put a bar underneath and underneath the bar "Why?" with a question mark. Underneath the why another bar, then marked by two big points or more exactly two little circles filled in in black. "When the ordered pair is introduced into mathematics some force is necessary to create it." From this I recognise that the person who sent me this sheet knows what she is saying, namely, that she has a least a shadow, and probably more, of mathematical instruction. It is quite true. One begins by articulating (55) the function of what a set is and if one does not introduce into it, in effect, the function of the ordered pair by this sort of force that in logic is called an axiom, well then, there is nothing more to be done with it than what you have first defined as a set. In parenthesis, one adds on – either directly or indirectly – the set has two elements. "The result of this force is to create one signifier that replaces the co-existence of two signifiers". This is quite correct. A second remark "The ordered pair determines the two components, while in the formula a signifier represents the subject for another signifier, it would be astonishing for a subject to determine two signifiers." I only have a quarter of an hour and nevertheless I hope to have the time to clarify as it should be done, because it is not difficult, what I stated the last time, which proves that I did not state it adequately since someone, who as you can see is very serious, questions me in these terms.



I am therefore going to write on the board – whatever may be the inconvenience that was pointed out to me the last time about using the board which ought to be put there so that everyone can see what I am writing and that is not going to happen today given the difficulties that conditioned my arriving late – this: $<S_1, S_2>$ At no time did I subsume the co-existence of two signifiers into one subject. If I introduce the ordered pair, as my interlocutor surely knows, I write for example the following: $< S_1\ S_2 >$, these two signs by a lucky chance find themselves to be the two pieces of my diamond shape when they are connected up, these two signs only serve on this occasion to very specifically write that this is an ordered pair. The translation in the form of a set, I mean articulated in the sense of the benefit expected from the force in question, is to translate this into a set whose two elements, the elements in a set being always themselves the set, you see there being repeated the bracket sign $\{(S_1), (S_1\ S_2)\}$, the second element of this set $\{S_1, S_2\}$, an ordered pair is a set which has two elements, a set formed from the first element of the pair and a second set; they are then both one and the other subsets formed from the two elements of the ordered pair.

Far from the subject here in any way subsuming the two signifiers in question, you see, I suppose, how easy it is to say that the signifier S_1 here does not stop representing the subject as my definition the signifier represents a subject for another signifier articulates it, while the second subset makes present what my correspondent call this "co-existence", namely, in its broadest form this form of relation that one can call "knowledge". The question that I am posing in this (56) connection and in the most radical form, whether a knowledge is conceivable that reunites this conjunction of two subsets in a single one, in such a way that they can be under the name of O, of the big O, identical to the conjunction as it is here articulated in a knowledge of the two signifiers in question.

That is why after having pinpointed by the signifier O a set of S means that I no longer need to put 1, 2.... because I substituted O for $\{S_1, S_2\}$. I questioned what followed from this as regards the topology of the Other and it is following this that I showed you in a way that was certainly too imaged to be logically fully satisfying, but whose necessity as an image allowed me to tell you that this succession of circles involuting in an asymmetrical way, namely, now always in the measure of their apparently greater interiority the subsistence of O, but in so far as this imaging might suggest a topology which is the one thanks to which the smallest of these circles comes to be joined to the largest in this figure and the topology suggested by such an imaging, makes of it the index of the fact that big O, if we define it as possibly including itself, namely, having become absolute knowledge, has this singular consequence that what represents the subject is only inscribed there, is only manifested there in the form of an infinite repetition, as you have seen there being inscribed under the form of this S, big S, in the series of inner walls of a circle in which they are indefinitely inscribed. S (S (S (

Thus the subject, by being inscribed only as an infinite repetition of itself, is inscribed there in such a way that it is very precisely excluded, and not by a relationship that is neither from the inside nor from the outside, from what is posited first of all as absolute knowledge. I mean that there is here something that takes into account, in the logical structure, what the Freudian theory implies as fundamental in the fact that originally the subject, with respect to what refers it to some fall of enjoyment, can only be manifested as repetition and unconscious repetition. It is therefore one of the limits around which there is articulated the link of maintaining the reference to absolute knowledge, to the subject supposed to know, as we call it in the transference with

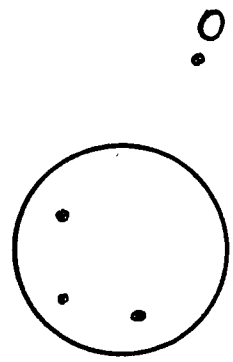
this index of repetitive necessity that flows from it which is logically the little o-object, the little o-object in so far as here its index is
(57) represented by these concentric circles.

On the other hand, what I ended on the last time is the other end of the questioning that we have to pose to big O, to big O in so far as we impose on it the condition of not containing itself. Big O only contains S_1, S_2, S_3 which are all distinct from what big O represents as signifier. Is it possible that in this other form the subject can be subsumed in a way that, without rejoining the set thus defined as universe of discourse, can be sure of remaining included in it? This is the point perhaps that I passed over a little quickly and that is why to end today I am coming back to it.

The definition of a set in so far as it joins elements, means that there is defined as a set every point to which several others are attached. I take point because there is no more tangible way of imaging the element as such. These points, for example, are with respect to this one, elements of a set that this fourth point can only image starting simply from the moment that we define it as element. Within the big Other then in which no O figures as an element, I can define the subject in this ultra-simple way in which it is precisely constituted, which seems to be exhaustive, by any signifier in so far as it is not an element of itself. Namely, that neither S_1 nor S_2 nor S_3 are signifiers like big O, that big O is the Other for all of them?



Am I going, as subject of the assertion – by simply putting forward this proposition that S, any signifier whatsoever, S_w meaning whatsoever, is not an element of itself – am I going to be thus able to assemble something which is this point here, namely, the set that connects all the signifiers thus defined, as I said, by an assertion (dire)? This is essential for you to remember for what follows. Because this "by an assertion" in other words, proposition, that around which we must first make the function of subject turn in order to grasp the flaw, because

whatever use you subsequently give to a statement, even its use of demand, is because of having marked what, as a simple assertion, it demonstrates as a flaw, that you can most correctly, in the flaw of the demand, circumscribe in the stating of the demand what is involved in the flaw of desire.

Structuralism everywhere is logic, which means, even at the level at which you may question desire – and God knows of course that there is more than one way – there are types that bell, there are types that (58) shout, there are types that dramatise! And it is worthwhile! Simply you will never know anything about what that means for the simple reason that desire cannot be said. Of the assertion it is only the ending and that is why this ending must first of all be circumscribed in a pure assertion, there where lay the apparatus of logic can demonstrate the flaw. Now it is clear that what here has the role of the second signifier, in essence – here I call them S alpha, S beta, S gamma – the second signifier, the subject in so far as it is the subset of all the signifiers in so far as they are not elements of themselves, in so far as O is not O, what can we say about it?

We have posited as condition – let us take here to be simple the letters you are already more used to, namely, X is not an element of X. In order that something may be inscribed under the rubric of S_2, the subset formed by this signifier for which the subject is going to be represented by all the others, namely, precisely the one that subsumes it as subject, it is necessary for X, whatever it may be, to be an element of B here, the first condition is, that X is not an element of X and secondly, we take X as element of O, since the big O collects all of them. So then! What is going to result from this? Is this S_2 an element of itself? If it were an element of itself it would not respond in the way in which we have constructed the subset of elements in so far as they are not elements of themselves. It is therefore not an element of itself. It is therefore not among S alpha, S beta, S gamma. It is where I placed it in so far as it is not an element of itself. S_2 is not an element of itself. This is what I am writing here: $S_2 \notin S_2$.

Let us suppose that S_2 is an element of big O, what does that mean? It is that S_2 is an element of S_2 since everything that is not an element of itself while being an element of big O, we have defined as forming a part, as constituting the subset defined by X element of S_2, S_2. It must therefore be written that S_2 is an element of S_2, which we have (59) rejected earlier because the definition of this subset is that it is composed of elements that are not elements of themselves. What results from that?

For those who are not used to these sorts of reasonings which are nevertheless simple, I am picturing it, even though the picturing is here completely puerile. The fact is that S_2 not being an element of big O, can only be pictured here, namely, outside. This demonstrates that the subject in whatever way it intends to be subsumed, either from a first position of the big Other as including itself, or in the big Other by limiting itself to the elements that are not elements of themselves, implies something that, what? How are we going to express this exteriority in which I posited for you the signifier of the subset, namely, S_2? This means very precisely that the subject, in the last analysis, cannot be universalised. There is no proposition that says in any way, even in the form of the fact that the signifier is not an element of itself, that what this defines is an encompassing definition with respect to the subject. And this also demonstrates not that the subject is not included in the field of the Other, but that what can be the point where it is signified as subject, is a point let us say "outside" the Other, outside the universe of discourse. To say, as I also heard being repeated as an echo of my articulation, that there is no universe of discourse, meaning that there is no discourse at all. It seems to me that if I had not sustained here a rather tight discourse, this is precisely what you would have absolutely no idea about. May this serve as an example for you and a support for our method and also a point of expectation for what the next time, 11th December, I hope we will succeed in pushing further in terms of this articulation into what interests us. Not simply in so far as, as psychoanalysts you are the living point of it, but also in so far as psychoanalysands you are looking for it.

I sometimes note, privately, little remarks intended for you. So then, in going through these papers I find one that is going to give me my starting point. "What a pity", I wrote, I no longer know when, "that God is used, by what we call the proscription of his name, to conceal" – this took on the form of a prohibition precisely no doubt where people best knew what is involved in the function of this term, God, namely, among the Jews. You know that among them he has a name that cannot be pronounced – well then! "this proscription, precisely, helps to conceal", I had started to say, "a certain number of references that are absolutely essential for maintaining the "I" in a sufficient light, sufficient for it not to be able to be thrown (jeter) – there is a je in that – to be thrown to the dogs, namely, to professors".

Which is what I started from the last time in order, in short, as you have heard if not seen, almost despite myself, to push forward at first this "I" reference. Through the intermediary of the God in question I translated what was once put forward in the form: Eye acher eye, [Hebrew inscription], by "I am what I is, je suis ce que je est". I told you then that I was myself a little bit overwhelmed by the way this stating that I justified, or believe I justified, came about as a translation. Then I said that, after all, Sinai emerged in spite of me from the ground between my legs. This time I did not receive a little note like the last time. I was expecting nevertheless that someone would point out to me that these words came from the burning bush.

You see what the result would have been if I had told you that the burning bush had come out from between my legs. That is why the sentence orders itself, retroactively. It is indeed because I wanted to define it between my legs that I first of all put Sinai in the place of the burning bush. All the more so because after all, in Sinai, it is the consequences of it that are at stake. Namely, that, as I already remarked in the seminar on Ethics, the one who announced himself – in my assertion at least – as "I am what I is", he, under the form of what ever since has been transmitted in the imperative of the list of the Ten Commandments that are said to be from God, did nothing, I explained it a long time ago, but announce the laws of "I speak". If it is true, as I stated, that the truth speaks "I", it appears to be self evident that: "You will adore the one who has said: I am what I is" and you will only adore him alone, by the same consequence: "You will love", as it is also said, "your neighbour as yourself". Yourself being nothing (62) other than that to which it is said, in the same commandments, what is addressed as a "thou" and even as a "Thou art" (tu es) whose really magical ambiguity in the French tongue I underlined a long time ago. This commandment whose underlying prelude is this "thou art" that establishes you as "I" is also the same slope offered to this "thou-ing [tu-ant]" that is present in every invocation. And you know that we are not far from the order to respond to it. The whole of Hegel is constructed to show what is built on this.

One could take them one by one, by passing, of course, by way of the one the lie, then subsequently to this prohibition on "coveting the wife, the ox, the ass of your neighbour" who is always the one who kills you (qui te tue). It is hard to see what else one could covet! The cause of desire being, indeed, precisely there. It should be pointed out that undoubtedly, through a solidarity that has a certain obviousness, there is no word, properly speaking, except where the closure of one or other commandment preserves it. This clearly explains why, since the world has been the world, no one has exactly observed them. And that is why the word, in the sense that the truth speaks "I" remains profoundly

hidden and only emerges to show a little tip of its nose, from time to time, in the interstices of discourse.

It is necessary then, it is necessary in so far as there exists a technique which trusts this discourse in order to find something there, a path, a way as they say which is presumed not to be unrelated, as it is put – but let us mistrust always the reverse sides of discourse – to truth and life. It would perhaps be well to question more closely what, in this discourse, is grounded as being able to initiate, give us a bridge towards this radical, inaccessible term, that with some boldness the last of the philosophers, Hegel, thought he could reduce to his dialectic.

For us, in an approach that I began to open up, it is before the Other - as allowing a logical failing to be circumscribed, as locus of an original flaw brought to bear on the word in so far as it might respond - that the "I" appears as, firstly subjected (assujetti). a–sujet I wrote somewhere to designate this subject, in so far as in discourse it is never produced except as divided. The speaking animal can only be embraced by the partner by being first of all subjected. It is because he has always been speaking, that in the very approach to this embrace he can only formulate the "thou art" (tu es) by killing himself in it, that he makes the partner other, that he makes of her the locus of the signifier.

Allow me here to come back for a moment to the "I is" (Je est) of the last time, since moreover, and from a well informed mind I saw coming back the objection that in expressing it in this way I was opening the door, let us say, to at least a reference to being. That this "is" was, at least by one ear, heard as an appeal to being. To being, (63) since according to the terminology of tradition, it depends on the fact that I state it – by reason of some order of nature, in the most original sense – as subsistent in this nature. Tradition constructs this supreme being in order to answer in it for all 'beings'. Everything changes, everything turns around the one who takes up the place of pivot of the universe, this x thanks to whom there is a Universe.

Nothing is further from the intention of this translation than what I formulated, that to make understood, I can take up again as "I am what I is". Let us say that here the "is" is better read and that we come back to state what properly gives the foundation of the truth in the 'I' in so far as it simply speaks. These commandments that sustain it, as I said earlier, are properly anti-physical, and nevertheless there is no way, without referring to them, to tell the truth, as they call it. You should try! In no case! It is an ideal point, make no mistake. No one even knows what that means. Once you hold a discourse, what emerge are the laws of logic, namely, a subtle coherence, linked to the nature of what is called signifying articulation. This is what ensures that a discourse is sustainable or not, through the structure of this thing called the sign, that has to do with what is commonly called the letter as opposed to the spirit. The laws of this articulation are what first of all dominate discourse.

What I began to state in my presentation this year is this field of the Other in order to experience it as conceivable under the heading of the field of inscription of what is thus articulated in the discourse. This is not, at first, to give any incarnation to this field of the Other. It is starting from its structure that there can be defined the possibility of "Thou" that is going to reach us and appeal to something, in a third moment, that will have to say it is "I". It is clear that what is going to show itself is what we are expecting, what we know well. This "I" cannot be pronounced, in all truth is always unpronounceable. This indeed is why everyone knows how cumbersome it is and that, as the laws of the word itself to which I referred earlier recall, it is preferable never to say "I swear".

So then, before prejudging what is involved in the Other, let us leave the question open. If it is simply a blank page, even in this state, it will give us enough difficulties. Because what I showed on the board the last time, is that supposing you have written on this blank page, on condition that it is a page, namely, finite, the totality of signifiers,

which after all is conceivable since you can choose a level where it is reduced to phonemes, it can be proved that on the single condition of believing that you can collect on it anything whatsoever about which you can announce this judgement - it is the subject, the term required (64) by this collecting – this choice will necessarily have to be situated outside this totality. It is outside the blank page that the S_2, the one that intervenes when I state that the signifier is what represents the subject for another signifier. This other signifier, the S_2 will be outside the page.

You must start from this phenomenon, that can be proved to be internal to every stating as such, to know everything that we can say subsequently about anything whatsoever that is stated. And that is why it is again worth while delaying on it for an instant.

Let us take the simplest statement. To say that someone announces that it is raining (il pleut), can only be judged, can only fully be judged by pausing at the fact that something emerges in that it is said that there is raining (du "pleut"). This is the discourse-event through which the very person who says it posits himself as secondary. The event consists in a saying; the one no doubt of which the "he/it" marks the place. But you have to be careful. The grammatical subject that,

moreover, can present, depending on the tongue, distinct morphologies, that are not necessarily isolated. The grammatical subject here has a relationship with what I earlier called 'outside the field', more or less individualised as I have just recalled it. Namely, moreover, for example, reduced to an ending, "pleut". The t, this little t moreover that you will find wandering in all sorts of corners of French itself, why does it lodge itself here where it has nothing to do? In an orne-t-il [does he embellish], for example. Namely, where it was not in the conjugation. This grammatical subject then, so difficult to properly circumscribe, is only the place where something comes to be represented.

Let us come back to this S_1 in so far as it is what represents this something, and let us recall that when the last time we wanted to extract this S_2 from the field of the Other, as appeared necessary, because it could not maintain itself in it, in order to collect together the S alpha, S beta, S gamma in which we claim to grasp the subject. It is in so far precisely as in the field of the Other we have defined these three S's by a certain function, let us call it R defined elsewhere, namely, that x was not an element of x and that this R(x) (Fig 5) is what transformed all the signifying elements on this occasion into something which remained undetermined because open, which took on, in a word, the function of a variable. It is in so far as we have specified what this variable must correspond to, namely, a proposition that is not an indifferent one, not, for example, that the variable must be good, or anything else whatsoever, or red or blue but that it ought to be subject, that there arises the necessity for this signifier as Other, that it cannot in any way be inscribed in the field of the Other. This signifier is properly, in the most original form, what defines the function described as knowledge. I will of course have to come back to this, because this place, even as compared to what was stated up to now as regards logical functions, is perhaps not yet sufficiently emphasised. To try to qualify the subject as such puts us outside the

Other. This "puts us" (nous met) is perhaps a form of noumen that will take us further than we think.

Let it be enough for me here to question whether it is not true that the difficulties that come to us, in a logical reduction, from the classical statements, I mean the Aristotelian ones of the universal and particular propositions, come from the fact that people do not perceive that it is there, outside the field, the field of the Other, that there ought to be placed the "all" and the "some". And we would be less embarrassed in perceiving that the difficulties generated by the reduction of these classical propositions to the field of quantifiers results from this. Rather than saying that all men are good, or bad, or whatever, the correct formula would be to state men, or anything else, anything that you can provide with a letter in logic, are all good, or are some good. In short, that by putting the syntactical function of the universal and the particular outside the field, you will find fewer difficulties in reducing them subsequently to the mathematical field. Because the mathematical field consists precisely in working desperately to ensure that the field of the Other as such holds up. It is the best way of testing that it does not hold up. But to test it by articulating all the stages, because it is at many different levels that it does not hold up. The important thing is to see that it is in so far as this Other is as they say technically, "consistent", that stating turns into demand, this before anything whatsoever, that carnally may correspond to it, has even come to lodge itself in it.

The interest of going as far as possible in the questioning of this field of the Other as such, is to note in it that it is at a series of different levels that its failing is perceived. It is not the same thing, and in order to put it to the test mathematics brings us an exemplary field of experience, because it can allow itself to limit this field to well defined functions, arithmetic, for example. It matters little yet, for the moment, what in fact this arithmetical research reveals. You have heard enough (66) about it to know that these fields, even if you choose the most simple, there is great surprise when we discover, for example, that completeness is lacking. Namely, that one cannot say that anything whatsoever that is stated there can either be proved or can be proved not to be. But, more again, that in such a field, and among the most simple, it can be put in question whether something, some statement can be proved in it, that another level is outlined of a possible proof, that a statement cannot be proved in it. But it becomes very curious and very strange that in certain cases this step that can be proved itself escapes for something that is stated in the same field. Namely, that since it cannot even be affirmed that it is not provable, a distinct dimension is opened up, called the undecidable.

These echelons, not of uncertainty but of defect in the logical texture, are the very ones that may allow us to grasp that the subject as such might, in a way, find there his support, his status. In a word the reference that, at the level of stating, is satisfied by adhering to this fault itself. Does it not seem to you that just as, perhaps, - on condition that such a numerous audience would be so obliging - as perhaps we can make it felt in some construction, even if it entails, as already I did in connection with the field of the Other, abbreviating it, it may be, in a way, rendered necessary in a statement of discourse, that there could not even be a signifier there, as, it appears, one can do. Because in tackling this field from the outside, from logic, nothing prevents us, it appears, from forging the signifier by which there is connoted what is wanting in the signifying articulation itself. If this something could, and I am still leaving this in the margin, be articulated, and this has been done, that proves that this signifier with which a subject, in the final analysis, can be satisfied by identifying himself to it as identical to the very lack of discourse, cannot be situated, if you will allow me here this abbreviated formula, are not all of those here who are analysts not aware that it is for want of any exploration of this order that the notion of castration, which is indeed what I hope you have sensed in passing to be analogous to what I am stating, that the notion of castration remains so vague, so uncertain and is handled with the thickness and the brutality that we know? In truth, in practice, it is not handled at all. People substitute for it quite simply what the other cannot give. People speak about frustration when it is something quite different that is at stake. On occasion, it is along the path of privation that people approach it, but as you see, this privation is precisely what participates in this defect inherent to the subject that it is a matter of approaching.

In short, I will only - to leave what today I am only tracing the outline of without being able even to foresee what between now and the end of the year I will manage to get you to tolerate - indicate simply, in (67) passing, that if something was able to be stated in the field of logic, you can, all those, at least, who here have some notion of the last theorems advanced in the development of logic, all of those know that it is very precisely in so far as this S_2, in connection with a particular system, the arithmetical system for example, properly plays its function in so far as it is from outside that it counts everything that can be made into a theory within a well defined O. That it is in so far, in other terms, that a man of genius called Gödel had the idea of perceiving that it was by taking literally "it counts", that on condition of giving to each of the statements of the theorems as situatable in a certain field, their number called the Gödel number that something surer could be approached than had ever been formulated about these functions that I could only make an allusion to in what I have previously stated, when they are called completeness or decidability.

It is clear that everything is different from a time in the past when it could be stated that after all mathematics was only tautology, that human discourse can remain, because it is a field that, according to this assertion, is supposed to have come from tautology, that there is somewhere an O that remains a big O identical to itself. Everything is different from the time that this is refuted, refuted in the surest fashion. That it is a step forward, that it is something that has been learned and that for anyone who finds himself confronted in experience, in an experience which appears to us like a transcendental aporia with regard to natural history as analytic experience does, we do not see the interest in going to find support in the field of these structures. Of these structures, as I said in so far as they are logical structures to situate, to put in their place this x that we are dealing with in the field of a quite different stating, the one that the Freudian experience allows and that moreover it directs.

It is therefore first of all in so far as the Other is not consistent that stating turns into demand and this is what gives its bearing to what in the big completed graph, the one that I drew here (Fig 6), is inscribed in the form of $◇D. All that is at stake is what is stated in a way that is not stated in what distinguishes any statement. The fact is that there is subtracted here this "I say that" which is the form where the "I" is limited. The "I" of grammar can be isolated outside any essential risk, can be subtracted from stating, and by this fact reduces it to the statement since this "I say that", by not being subtracted, leaves it whole and entire that, from the very fact of the structure of the Other, all stating, whatever it may be, becomes demand. Demand of what this Other is lacking. At the level of this $◇D the double question is: I ask myself (je me demande) what you desire, and its double which is precisely the question we are highlighting today, namely: I ask you, not who I am, but further again what I is (ce qu'est Je).

(68) Here there is installed the very knot, the one I formulated in putting forward that the desire of man is the desire of the Other.

Namely, that, as I might say, if you take the vectors as they are defined on this graph, namely, coming here from the start of the pure signifying chain, in order here, from the cross roads designated by $◇D, with this return that completes the retroaction marked out here, it is well and truly at this point described as d of O, desire of the Other, that there converge these two elements that I articulated in the form of I ask myself what you desire. It is the question plugged into the very level of the setting up of O. "What you desire", namely, what you are lacking linked to the fact that I am subjected to you.

And on the other hand, I ask you what "I" is, the status of the "I" as such, in so far as it is here that it is established. I am marking in red this status of the "Thou", constituted by a convergence, a convergence that does occur. If all stating as such, the indifferent stating of analysis, because this is how the rule posits it in principle, turns into demand, it is because it is radically, from its very function as stating to be demand, concerning the "Thou" and the "I". As regards the "Thou", it is a convergent demand, a questioning stimulated by lack itself in so far as it is at the heart of the field of the Other, structured from pure logic. This is precisely what is going to give its value and its bearing to what is outlined, just as vectorised on the other side of the graph. Namely, that the division of the subject is made tangible there as essential to what posits itself as "I". To the demand of "What is I?", the structure itself replies by this signifying refusal of O, as I inscribed it in the functioning of this graph. In the same way the "Thou" here, establishes it from a convergence between the most radical demand, the one addressed to us analysts, the only one that sustains in the final term the discourse of the subject. "I come here to ask you". In the first phase, it is indeed "who I am" that is at stake even though it is at the level of "who is I" that the response is given. It is of course because logical necessity is what gives this step back (recul).

A convergence, then, of this demand and here, something of a promise, of something that, in S_2 is the hope of gathering together this "I". It is (69) indeed what in transference I called the subject supposed to know. Namely, this prime conjunction, S_1 linked to S_2, in so far, as I recalled the last time, in the ordered pair, it is it, it is this conjunction, this knot that grounds what knowledge is.

What does that mean? If this "I" is only tangible in these two divergent poles, one called what I here am articulating as the "no", the refusal that gives form to the lack of the reply, and this something different articulated there as s(O), this meaning, what is it? Because is it not tangible that the whole discourse that I am spinning out to give the framework of the "I" of the questioning from which this experience is established, is it not tangible that I am pursuing it while leaving outside, at least up to this point that we have come to here, any meaning?

What does that mean? That after having formed you for long years to ground, on the differentiation of a linguistic origin, the signifier as material, from the signified as its effect, I am allowing it to be suspected, to appear here that some mirage lies at the source of this field defined as linguistic, the sort of astonishing passion with which the linguist articulates that what he tends to grasp in the tongue is pure form, not content?

Here I am going to bring you back to this point, that in my first lecture, I first brought forward before you, and not unintentionally, in the form of the pot. Nothing, those who are taking notes should know, is unpremeditated in what one could call, at first sight, my digressions. If I came back in an apparently digressive way to the mustard pot, it is certainly not without reason. And you may remember that I gave a place to the fact that, in the first forms of its apparition, it is to be strongly signalled, that there are never lacking, on the surface of this pot the marks of the signifier itself. Is there not introduced here

something in which the "I" is formulated? The fact is that what sustains the whole of human creation, of which no image has ever appeared better than the work of the potter, is very precisely to make this something, the utensil, that pictures for us by its properties, that pictures for us this image that the language of which it is made – for where there is no language there is no worker either – that this language is a content. It is enough to think for a moment that this very fabrication is there to introduce the reference to this philosophically traditional opposition of form and content. It is not for nothing that in my first introduction of this pot I signalled that where it plays the part of an accompaniment to death in burial there is put this addition that properly speaking holes it. It is indeed in effect because its spiritual principle, its origin in language, the fact is that there is that there is somewhere a hole through which everything escapes. When it rejoins at their place those who have gone beyond, the pot for its part also, finds its true origin, namely, the hole that it was designed to mask in language. There is no meaning that does not leak away as regards (70) what a cup contains, and it is quite curious that I made this discovery that was certainly not made at the moment that I stated this function of the pot for you. Searching, my God, in what I usually refer myself to, namely, in the Bloch et von Wartburg, what is involved in a pot, I had, as I might say the happy surprise of seeing that this term - as is testified, it appears, by lower German and Dutch with whom we share it - is a pre-Celtic term. Therefore it comes to us from afar, from the Neolithic no less. But there is better. It is that because of having this idea, at least to give it a little base, we ground ourselves on these pots that are found before the Roman invasion, or more exactly as representing what was established before it, namely, the pots that are dug up, it appears, in the region of Trier. Bloch et von Wartburg express themselves as follows: "We see inscribed there the word Potus". This is enough, for them, to designate the very ancient, because it is a usage that is at stake, that they indicate that Potus, hypochoristically, as they put it, can designate the makers. What matter! The only thing that is important for me is that when the pot appears it is always marked on its surface by a signifier that it supports. The pot here gives us this function distinct from that of the subject, in so far as in the relation to the signifier the subject is not a preliminary but an anticipation. It is supposed, upokeimenon. It is its essence, it is its logical definition, supposed, almost induced, certainly, it is not the support. On the contrary, we can legitimately give to the signifier a fabricated support and even, I would say, a utensil. The origin of the utensil in so far as it distinguishes the field of human fabrication is even properly speaking there.

The meaning as product, this is what serves, and as a lure, to veil from us what is involved in the essence of language, in so far as, by its essence, it properly does not mean anything. What proves it is that the assertion in its essential function is not an operation of meaning and this indeed is how we analysts understand it. What we are seeking is what, not from the Other, but outside the Other as such, suspends what is articulated from the Other, the S_2, as outside the field. Here is the question of knowing what is involved in the subject, and whether this subject cannot in any way be grasped by discourse; here also is the justification for what can be substituted for it.

The sense of what is involved in castration is balanced with that of enjoyment. But it is not enough to grasp this relation as assuredly in what was manifested in a time that is close to us, of something in which at the same time this scream, need for truth, is an appeal to enjoyment. It is assuredly not enough to aspire to enjoyment without hindrances, if it obvious that enjoyment can only be articulated for every individual – himself included in language and the utensils – can only be articulated in this register of remainder inherent to one and the other that I defined as the surplus enjoying. It is here that on 8th of January we will take up our discourse again.

Seminar 6: Wednesday 8 January 1969

(71) So then I wish you a Happy New Year, the New Year of '69. It is a good number! To open it, I am pointing out to you that on one or other occasion I always receive from some horizon a little gift. The last one, the one on this occasion, is a little article that appeared in the January 1st number of the Nouvelle Revue Française in which there is an article entitled "Some extracts from the style of Jacques Lacan". In effect, huh, my style is a problem! This is what I could have begun my Ecrits with. It is an old article that I never re-read, which was precisely on the problem of style. Perhaps if I re-read it, it will enlighten me! Meanwhile, of course, I am the last one to be able to account for it, and my God, I cannot see why somebody else should not try. This has happened. It comes from the pen of a professor of linguistics and I do not have to judge personally the result of his efforts. I will make you the judge of them. In general, I rather had an echo that in the present context, where suspicion is thrown, in any case, in some out of the way places, about the general quality of what is dispensed in terms of teaching from the mouths of professors, one might think that it was perhaps not the time to publish this. It is not the most opportune moment. In any case, I have heard that some people did not find it very good.

Anyway, as I said to you, you can be the judge. For my part I am not complaining about it! I find it difficult to see how anyone could get the slightest idea in it of what I have spread as a teaching.

Nevertheless, there is a point; I am supposed to have dared, it appears, to write somewhere: "Freud and me". You see that, huh, he doesn't think that he's a nobody! This has perhaps not quite the sense that the indignation of the author thinks he should give it, but it show clearly the field of reverence, at least in certain domains, in which we live. Why, for this author who admits to not having the slightest idea of what Freud contributed, should there be something scandalous that someone who spent his life at it should say "Freud and me"? I would say more, reverberating myself from this outrage to the degree of respect that I am reproached with here, I could not do otherwise than remember the anecdote that I quoted here, about the time when in the company of P'tit Louis, as I recalled, I spent some time in the most difficult way at the tiny industries that people on the coast live on. With these three excellent people whose names are still dear to me, I (72) did many things that I am going to pass over. But I also happened to have with P'tit Louis the following dialogue. It was, as I told you, about a sardine tin that we had just eaten and that was floating next to the boat, and P'tit Louis said these very simple words to me: "Hah, this tin, you see it because you are looking at it. Well then it, for its part does not need to see you to look at you".

The relation between this anecdote and "Freud and me" leaves the question open of where I place myself in this couple. Well then reassure yourselves, I place myself always as the same place, at the place where I was, and where I still remain, alive. Freud does not need to see me in order to look at me. In other words, as a text I already quoted here states, "a living dog is worth more than the discourse of a dead person", especially when this has come to the degree that it has reached of international rottenness.

What I am trying to do, is to give to Freudian terms their function in so far as what is at stake in these terms, is an overturning of the very principles of questioning. In other words – which does not mean, says the same thing – in other words what is involved here is the minimal requirement of the passage to this renewed questioning. The minimal requirement is the following, it is a matter of making psychoanalysts. Because this questioning, in order to be posed, requires the subject to be replaced in his authentic position, and that is why I recalled at the beginning of this year what position was at stake. It is the one that puts it from the beginning into one of dependency on the signifier. So then around this requirement, this fundamental condition, there is organised everything acceptable that is affirmed up to now whose elements existed in the first practice of analysis where people undoubtedly took into account word play and language play. And with good reason! This level, I simply took up again, legalised I might say, by laying hold of what linguistics provided in this foundation that it brought forward called phonology, the operation of the phoneme as such. Because it was really necessary to see that what Freud had opened out quite simply found its status there, with some delay certainly, but obviously with less delay than that of the public in general, and at the same time psychoanalysts.

This is not a reason to remain there. This is why you see me, whatever might otherwise have been the degree of competence I previously showed in this use of what is, after all, only a part of linguistics, pursuing this work that consists in grasping everywhere already established disciplines offer the opportunity, pursuing this research that, from the level where it was really a matter of a coincidence, because it is really phonematic material itself that is at stake in the operations of the unconscious, pursuing it at the level where another discipline allows us to map out an isomorphism of approach between this status of the subject and what it develops, but that may just as well (73) reveal itself as covering an identity of material, as I already affirmed.

And what is this discipline? I would call it logical practice (la pratique logicienne) a term which does not seem to me a bad one to designate what exactly is involved, because it is from a place where this practice is exercised that it now finds what makes it necessary. But it is not inconceivable that it should find itself being brought to bear elsewhere. The place where effectively it is exercised, where something has happened that detached logic from the tradition in which, throughout the centuries, it remained enclosed, is the domain of mathematics. It is certainly not by chance, it was altogether foreseeable, unfortunately, subsequently, that it would be at the level of mathematical discourse that logical practice would find itself being exercised. What could be more tempting, in effect, than this place where discourse, I mean the demonstrative discourse, seemed to be based on a complete autonomy, an autonomy with respect to what is called experience. It seemed, it could not [?] have seemed that this discourse only took its certainties from itself, namely, from the requirements of consistency that it imposed.

What are we going to say about this reference? Are we going, in order to give a sort of image of this logic that has attached itself to the mathematical domain, to designate it as a recess of what would only be itself, in a certain style of thinking for mathematics, also something separated off, even though sustaining the scientific current. Something that, with regard to a certain progress, would be that and then that again: recessus. It is an image, but an image that it is worthwhile exorcising because we are going to see that nothing of the kind is at stake.

It is an opportunity to recall that the recourse to the image to explain metaphor is always false. Any domination of metaphor by the image ought to be suspect, its support being always the specular, anthropomorphic body image, which is faulty. Because it is very simple to illustrate again that it is only an illustration, this image simply masks the function of orifices. Hence the value as an apologue of my holed pot on which I left you last year. It is quite clear that one does not see the hole in this pot in the mirror if one looks through the aforesaid hole. Hence the inverted value of this utensil that I only put forward, I recalled it also in leaving you, to indicate the fact that under these simplest, most primary shapes what human industry fabricates is constructed properly speaking to mask what is involved in the true effects of structure. It is with this name that I return - and my digression was constructed to introduce it - to this explicit distinction by recalling that form is not formalism. It happens in certain cases that (74) even the linguists – I am not speaking of course about those who do not know what they are saying – make little errors on this point. The author of whom I spoke earlier, who gives me no proof of his explicit competence, charges me with having spoken about Hjelmsev, which is precisely what I never did. On the contrary, the name of Jakobson, as far as I could see – because I read his article, as he puts it himself, diagonally – is remarkably absent, which no doubt avoids him having to judge whether yes or no the use that I made of the functions of metaphor and of metonymy is relevant.

To return to this crucial point about the distinction between form and formalism, I will try, because this is what is first necessary to illustrate it from some forms. It is very necessary for whoever is engaged as is the case for the psychoanalyst in the cuts that, by affecting a field to which the body is exposed, culminate indeed at the fall of something that has some form. Nevertheless, I would recall – to touch on one of these images that psychoanalytic experience isolates and one does not know how – the cup/cut (coupe) that contains the milk, the one that evokes its being taken inside out under the name of breast, the first of the o- objects, this cut is not the structure through which the breast is affirmed as homologous to the sticking on of the placenta, because it is the same physiologically, and, unless the word comes into play, its reality. Only even to know what I have just said, namely, before this breast is implicated in the dialectic of the o-object, even to know what it is there, I mean physiologically, a rather advanced zoology is necessary. And this by the explicit use, otherwise it is not visible, of a classification whose relations to logic one would be wrong to minimise. Aristotelian logic has been reproached for having, with its use of the terms of genus, species, simply stuck onto a zoological practice the existence of individuals zoologically defined. One must be consistent and, if one states this more or less reprehensible remark, note that inversely this zoology itself implies a logic, made up of a structure, and of a logical structure, of course. As you see, it is the frontier between what every explorative experience already implies and what is going to be put in question about the emergence of the subject.

In mathematics, formalism will be brought out better in its function as cut. And in effect, what do we see as regards what is involved in the way it is used? Formalism in mathematics is characterised as follows. It is grounded on the attempt to reduce this discourse that I announced earlier, mathematical discourse, a discourse of which people have been able to say – and certainly not from the outside, it has also been said from the outside, it was what Kojève said but he was only taking it up from the mouth of Bertrand Russell – that this discourse has no sense and that one never knows whether what is said in it is true. An extreme, paradoxical formula regarding which it is worth recalling that it comes from Bertrand Russell one of the initiators of the logical (75) formalisation of this discourse itself. This attempt to take this discourse and to submit it to this test that we could define in short in these terms, to take one's assurance from what indeed it appears to be, namely, functioning without the subject. Because indeed to make even those who are not immediately with it sense what I am designating here, who then will ever speak, as regards what guarantees mathematical construction, of any incidence whatsoever of what can be detached from it as observer? There is no conceivable trace there of what is called "subjective error", even if it is here one can give the systems that allow it to be given a measurable sense elsewhere. This has nothing to do with mathematical discourse itself; even when it discourses about subjective error, it is in terms – I mean the terms of the discourse – for which there is no middle. They are exact, irrefutable, or they are not so. Such is at least its requirement; nothing will be accepted that is not indispensable as such.

It nevertheless remains that there is the mathematician. The use, the search for the formalisation of this discourse consists, as I said just now, in assuring oneself that even if the mathematician completely evaporates, the discourse holds up of itself. This implies the construction of a language that is very precisely the one called rather appropriately then, as you see, mathematical logic. It would be better to say practice of logic, logical practice in the mathematical domain, and the condition for realising this test is presented in a double form that may appear an antinomy. On one point this language seems to have no other concern than to reinforce what is involved in mathematical discourse whose character I have just reminded you of, namely, to refine its unequivocal character. The second condition, and this is why it appears antinomical, is that this unequivocal concerns what? Always something that one can call object, naturally not an indifferent one. And that is why, in the whole attempt to extend this new logical practice beyond the field of mathematics – to illustrate what that means, I am speaking about Quine's book Word and object, for example – when it is a matter of extending this practice to common discourse, people feel themselves required to start from what is called object-language, which is nothing other than to satisfy this condition of a language without equivocation. An excellent opportunity moreover to highlight what I always put the emphasis on from the start of my reference to language. It is of the nature of discourse, of fundamental discourse, not simply to be equivocal, but to be essentially made up of the radical slippage of meaning, essential for any discourse.

A first condition then, I said, to be unequivocal. This can only be referred to a certain object aimed at, of course, in mathematics, not an object like others. And that is why, once Quine transfers the handling of this logic to the study of common discourse, he speaks about "ob" (76) language, stopping prudently at the first syllable! But on the other hand, the second condition is that this language must be pure writing. That nothing of what concerns it ought to be constituted only by interpretations. The whole structure – I mean that one can attribute to the object – is what constructs this writing. Hence there is nothing in this formalisation that is not posited as interpretation. To the nevertheless fundamental equivocation of common discourse there is opposed here the function of isomorphism, namely, what constitutes a certain number of domains as falling under the capture of one and same written formula.

When one enters into the experience of what is thus constructed, if one takes a little trouble that I did not believe was unworthy of me to take, as the article evoked above seems to suppose, and if one approaches Gödel's theorem, for example – and after all it is within the reach of each of you, it is enough to buy a good book or go to some good places. We have gone multi-disciplinary, after all it is perhaps a requirement that did not emerge from nothing. It is perhaps from seeing the trouble one has from what is improperly called mental limitation – a theorem like this, moreover there are two of them, will tell you that as regards the domain of discourse that seems to be most assured, namely, arithmetical discourse, two and two are four all the same, there is nothing on which one is more securely based. Naturally people did not remain at that! Since that time, many things have been glimpsed, but which in appearance are only in the strict development of this two and two are four, in other words, that starting from there, there is a discourse that, to all appearances, can be called consistent. This means that when you state a proposition in it, you can say yes or no, this is acceptable, is a theorem, as they say, of the system. This one is not and is its negation which is, on this occasion, if one thinks one should take the trouble of making a theorem of everything that can be posited there as negative. Well then, this implies that this result is obtained by way of a series of procedures on which no doubt is brought to bear and that are called proofs.

The progress of this logical practice has allowed to be assured, but only thanks to the use of formalisation processes, namely, by putting into two columns, as I might say, what is stated from the first discourse of mathematics, and this other discourse subjected to this double condition of getting rid of equivocation and of being reduced to a pure writing. It is starting from there and only starting from there, namely, from something that distinguishes the first discourse, the one in which mathematics has boldly made all this progress and without having, a curious thing, to correct it epoch by epoch, in a way that ruins the acquisitions generally accepted in preceding epochs, in opposition to this discourse pinpointed on this occasion, and very wrongly in my view, by the term of meta-language – the use of this formal language (77) called, for its part, no less wrongly, language – because it is from something that a practice isolates as a closed field in what is quite simply language, the language in which mathematical discourse could not properly speaking be stated. It is starting from there, I am saying, that Gödel shows that in this apparently most certain system of the mathematical domain, that of arithmetical discourse, the very supposed consistency of discourse implies what limits it, namely, incompleteness. Namely, that by starting even from the hypothesis of consistency, there will appear somewhere a formula, and it is enough for there to be one for there to be many others, to which it cannot, by the very paths of the accepted proof qua law of the system, be answered yes or no. The first phase, the first theorem.

The second phase, the second theorem. Here I must abbreviate. Not simply can the system, I mean the arithmetical system, not therefore assure its consistency except by making of it its very incompleteness, but it cannot, I am saying in the very hypothesis grounded on its consistency, demonstrate this consistency within itself.

I took a little trouble to get across here something that is not assuredly properly speaking our field, I mean the psychoanalytic field, if it is defined by some olfactory apprehension or other. But let us not forget that at the moment of telling you that it is not properly speaking about what the sentence implied that I am finishing with another subject, you see clearly where I land, on this vital point. Namely, that it is unthinkable to operate in the psychoanalytic field, without giving its correct status to what is involved in the subject.

What do we find in the experience of this mathematical logic? What, if not precisely this residue where the presence of the subject is designated? At least is this not what a mathematician himself, certainly one of the greatest, Von Neuman, seems to imply in making this rather imprudent reflection that the limitations, I mean the logically tenable ones, it is not a matter of any antinomy, of any of these classical mind games that allow it to be grasped that the term obsolete, for example, is an obsolete term. And that starting from there we are going to be able to speculate on the predicates that are applied to themselves and those that are not so applied, with all that this involves as a paradox. That is not what is at stake. What is at stake is something that constructs a limit that uncovers nothing, no doubt, that mathematical discourse has itself not discovered since it is on this field of discovery that it tests out a method that allows it to question it about something that is all the same essential. Namely, up to what point can it account for itself, up to what point can its coincidence with its own domain be affected if these terms had a sense, while it is the very domain in which the notion of content had properly speaking been (78) emptied. To say with Von Neuman that after all this is all very fine because it bears witness to the fact that mathematicians have still a reason to be there, since it is with what presents itself there in its necessity, its proper ananke, its necessities of detour, that they will indeed have their role. It is because something is missing that the desire of the mathematician is going to come into play.

Well then, I think that here indeed Von Neuman is going a little too far. Namely, I believe that the term residue is wrong, and that what is revealed here about this function that already I have evoked from several angles under the title of the impossible has a different structure than the one that we have to deal with in the fall of what I call the o-object. Much more, I believe that what is revealed here in terms of lack, even though no less structural, reveals no doubt the presence of the subject, but no other subject than the one that brought about the cut, the one that separated out the so-called meta-language from a certain mathematical field, namely, quite simply its discourse, the cut that separates this language from another isolated language, from an artificial language, from formal language. That is why this operation, the cut, is no less fruitful in so far as it reveals properties that are indeed the very stuff of the mathematical discourse, in that whether it is a question of whole numbers on the status of which you know people have not finished and that people will scarcely finish cavilling about for some time as to whether these numbers have such a place ontologically or not is a question that is totally foreign to the experience of discourse in so far as it operates with them and that can perform this double operation, 1) construct itself and 2) formalise itself.

We are far, no doubt, at first sight, from what interests us at the centre, and I do not know, given the little time that remains to me, how I can bring you back to it today. Nevertheless, allow me to recall rapidly, to sketch out here that the point that we had got to at the end of our last session was the following: the truth speaks "I". What about this "I"? If the "I" is here to be strictly distinguished from the subject that as you see one can somewhere can be reduced to the function of the cut, impossible to distinguish from the one called unary trait in so far as it isolates a function of the One as simply unique, and simply a cut in numeration. The "I" is not for all that in any way assured, because we can say the following about it. That it is and that it is not according to whether, as subject, it operates, and that operating as subject, it is exiled from the enjoyment which for all that is no less "I".

And it is here that I must remind you that in this graph (fig 6), constructed to respond very precisely to the constitutive questioning of analysis, what lies between the two lines called stating and stated, namely that, cut again by that of signifying material, by the elementary differential chain of phonemes, it allowed us to guarantee these four (79) crossing points whose status is given precisely in terms of writing. Here the $◊D, here the O, the field of the Other, here the small s of O, namely meaning, and here finally the big S of Ø, the signifier of something approached several times, but never completely elucidated called the O barred. You know that here, homologous to the imaginary return line that integrates the narcissistic relation into the field of the statement, homologous, I am saying, you have here, halfway incarnated in this written form what is necessary at the pure enunciating level which is the following, namely, what is articulated as $◊D, which means here as elsewhere, everywhere I write it, demand. Demand, not an indifferent one, "I ask myself". And let us write here in this form, "what you want", the desire of the Other, in this complete ambiguity that still allows there to be written "I ask you...what I want", since my desire is the desire of the Other. There is no distinction here, except one induced by the very function of stating in so far as it bears in itself its sense as first of all obscure, as if all stating, as I already said, the most simple, only evokes its sense as a consequence of its own emergence. "It is raining" is a discourse-event and it is only secondary to know what it means about rain. Anyone at all is capable of evoking "It is raining" in a particular context. It can have very different senses. Do I need in this connection to recall that "Get out" does not sound the same everywhere as it does in Bajazet.

If there is something that is more important to map out from this graph than this discourse that accompanies it, it is the structural vectors as they are presented here at the level where the You, as dominating the I, as the you-ing (tu-ant) as I said at the level of the desire of the Other, the vectors that converge. It is around the desire of the Other that the demand of the discourse, of the discourse as we organise it in analytic experience, of the discourse precisely that, under its aspect that fallaciously pretends to be neutral, leaves open the sharpest accent of the demand at its point. It is in a converging fashion around the desire of the Other that everything that is at the source, as the retroactive arrow indicated, everything that is at the source converges towards the desire of the Other.

(80) It is at the point that, as imaginary support, corresponds to this desire of the Other, what I have always written under the form of $◇o, namely, the phantasy, that there lies hidden this function of the "I". The "I" in so far as, contrary to the point of convergence called desire of the Other, it is in a diverging fashion that this "I" hidden under the $◇o, is directed under the form that precisely I called at the beginning that of a true questioning, of a radical questioning, towards the two points where there lie the elements of the answer. Namely, in the line on top, big S, which means a signifier, a signifier of the fact that O is barred, and which is precisely what I took, what I also gave you the trouble to have a support to conceive of what I am here stating. Namely, that the field of the Other does not secure, does not assure at any place, to any degree, the consistency of the discourse that is articulated here, in any case, even the most apparently certain.

And on the other hand, the lower line, a meaning in so far as it is fundamentally alienated. And it is here that you must grasp the sense of my starting this year with the definition of the surplus enjoying and its relationship with everything that one can call, in the most radical sense, the means of production, at the level of meaning, if already the pot, as I have pointed out to you, is only an apparatus to mask the consequences of discourse, I mean the major consequences, namely, the exclusion of enjoyment.

You see that in this way there is put into this Entzweiung, the term is Hegelian, into this radical division which is the very one at which Freud's discourse culminates at the end of his life, the division of the "I" articulated as such. It is nothing less than that between these two terms, namely, the field where the Other in a way, in some imagining, for a long time that of the philosophers, could correspond to any truth and where precisely this is cancelled out by the simple examination of the functions of language. I mean that we know how to make intervene in it the function of the cut that answers "no!", no to the God of the philosophers. And that, on the other hand, on a different register, the one in appearance where enjoyment is waiting. It is there precisely that it is a slave, and in the same way people said that up to now that one could reproach psychoanalysis for overlooking the conditions in which man is subjected to the social, as it is put, without seeing that one is contradicting oneself. The materialism described as historical only has a sense precisely by grasping that it does not depend on the social structure since it affirms itself that it is on the means of production. Namely, only from that with which one makes things that deceive surplus enjoying. Namely, that, far from being able to hope to fill the field of enjoyment, are not even sufficient for what is lost in it, because of the Other.

I was not able, my God, as usual, to go any quicker than my own violins. Nevertheless, I can announce here where I intend to take things up the next time. I will tell you that it is not in vain that from (81) the mouth of the God of the Jews, what I held onto is "I am what I is". It is indeed here that it is time for something to be finally dissipated, something already clearly said by someone called Pascal. If you wish, perhaps this will help you to understand what I am going to tell you the next time, to read a little book that has appeared in Desclée de Brouwer under the title of Pascal's wager by a M Georges Brunet, who knows admirably well what he is saying. As you have seen earlier this is not true for every professor! But he for his part knows. What he says, moreover, does not go very far, but at least he knows what he is saying. On the other hand, it is a disentangling that is indispensable for you about what is involved in this little sheet of paper folded in four, that, as I already said, I already spoke about this, was found in Pascal's pockets, the dead Pascal. I speak a lot about the dead God, it is probably to deliver us from many other relationships with others that I evoked earlier, my relationships with the dead Freud; that has a completely different sense.

But if you would not mind reading this Pascal's wager by Georges Brunet, at least you will know what I am talking about, when I speak about this text, which is scarcely a quarto, as you know. It is a writing that overlaps, that becomes entangled, that criss-crosses, that is annotated. It was a text for the pleasure, of course, of professors. This pleasure is brief, because they were never able to get absolutely anything from it.

There is something that is, on the contrary, quite clear, and it is with this that I will begin the next time. That strictly nothing else is at stake except precisely the "I". People spend their time asking whether God exists as if it were even a question. God is, there is absolutely no kind of doubt about that, that absolutely does not prove that he exists. The question does not arise. But it is necessary to know if "I" exists.

I think I will be able to make you sense that it is around this uncertainty, does "I" exist, that Pascal's wager is played out.

Seminar 7: Wednesday 15 January 1969

(83) I announced the last time that I would talk about Pascal's wager. It is a responsibility. I even learned that there were people who changed their timetable, who came to Paris one more time than they had planned. This is to tell you how heavy such an announcement is to bear. In any case it is certain that I cannot set out here to bring you, to give an exhaustive discourse about everything that has been stated about Pascal's wager. I am obliged then to suppose that you have a certain rough knowledge of what is involved in Pascal's wager. I cannot properly speaking enunciate it again because, as I told you the last time, it is not properly speaking a statement that holds up. This is even what has astonished people: that someone who one is sure is capable of some rigour should have proposed something so untenable.

I think that I introduced sufficiently, just about sufficiently, the last time what justifies in general the use that we are going to make of it. But in any case let us not lose time in recalling it, you are going to see what this use is.

It is not the first time moreover for me to speak about it. On a certain day of February 1966, I believe, I already brought in this wager, and very precisely in connection with the o-object; you will see that today we are going to remain around this object. Already those who remember – perhaps there are some of them, I am even sure of it – what I said at that time can clearly see what is at stake. It happens that

I was asked to go to speak about it again in October 1967 at Yale. And I was so busy with the people who motivate this effort of teaching, namely, the psychoanalysts, that I missed the opportunity of speaking to the people at Yale; I did not know until much later that this created a little scandal. It is true, it was not very polite. We are going to try today to say what I could have said over there, without there being moreover any preparation at all to hear it.

But, let us begin right at the ground level, as if we were at Yale. What is at stake? In general, you must have heard tell of something that is stated and that is written several times in the text of what has been collected under the title of Penseés, Pascal's Penseés, and that at the start there is something rather risky in the use that is made of what is called the wager itself. As you know, these Penseés, were notes taken (84) for a major work. Only this work was never done, so it was done in his place. First of all a work was created – this is the edition of the Messieurs de Port-Royal – it is not at all a work that is badly done. They were pals, and as someone called Filleau de la Chaise who is not properly speaking a luminary but who is very readable testifies, Pascal had very carefully explained to them what he wanted to do and they did what Pascal had indicated. It nevertheless remains that this left out a lot of things in the statements that were written out in notes for the purposes of the construction of this work. So then others ventured on a different reconstruction. And then others said: "Since in short as our culture advances, we perceive that the discourse, is not so simple a thing as that and that in putting it together, well, there is some loss" so then people set about making editions that were called critical, but that take on a completely different import when what is involved is a collection of notes. There again there was some difficulty. We have several editions, several ways of grouping these bundles as they say; that of Tourneur, that of Lafuma, that of X, that of Z. This does not simplify things, but be assured, it certainly clarifies them.

As regards the wager, it is quite separate. It is a little piece of paper folded in four. That was the interest of what I recommended to you, it was for you to grasp this. Since, in this book there is a reproduction of the piece of paper folded in four and then a certain number of transcriptions. Because this too posed a problem given that they are notes, written freehand, with different divisions, a lot of things crossed out, whole paragraphs written between the lines of other paragraphs, and then a utilisation of the margins with references. All of this moreover is rather precise and gives ample material for examination and for discourse. But there is one thing that we can take as certain, it is that Pascal never claimed that he made his wager stand up. This little paper must all the same have been close to his heart since everything indicates that he had it in his pocket, in the same place that I have here this device, this microphone, this absolutely useless thing. In general, you have heard tell of something that sounds like to renounce pleasures. This thing which is said in the plural is also repeated in the plural. And moreover everyone knows that this act is supposed to be at the source of something that might be called the Christian life. It is the background noise. Through everything that Pascal and others around him tell us in terms of an ethics, this can be heard in the distance like the sound of a bell. What we have to know is whether it is a knell. In fact, it is not all that much of a knell. From time to time it has a gayer aspect. I would like to make you sense that it is the very principle on which there is installed a certain morality that one can qualify as modern morality.

To make understood what I am in the process of putting forward, I am going to give a few reminders of what is effectively involved. The (85) reinvestment, as they say, of profits, which is fundamental, this again is what is called enterprise, the capitalist enterprise, to designate it in its proper terms, does not put the means of production at the service of pleasure. Things have even got to the stage that a whole aspect of something that is manifested in the margins is, for example, an effort, a quite timid effort that does not at all imagine sailing

towards success but rather casts doubt on what can be called our style of life. We will call this an effort to rehabilitate spending, and someone called Georges Bataille, a thinker in the margin of what is involved in our affairs, has thought out and produced on this point some quite readable works that are not for all that dedicated to efficiency.

When I say that it is modern morality, what I mean by that, is a first approach to the question, that looking at things historically, this is responding to a break. In any case, there is no reason to minimise it. This does not mean either that like every historical break, one must remain with it to grasp what is involved. And it is just as good to mark its time. The search for well being (bien-être) – I cannot insist a lot, because our time is measured out, of course, as always, on what justifies the use of this term. But in any case all of those who follow, even from time to time, superficially, what I say ought all the same to remember what I recalled in this place about the distinction between Wohl, das Wohl, there where one feels good, and das Gute, the good, in so far as Kant distinguishes them. It is quite clear that this is one of the core points of what I earlier called the break. Whatever may be the justification of Kant's statements, one must find in them the very soul of ethics, or indeed, as I did, illuminate by its relationship to Sade. It is a fact of thinking that this happened.

We have the notion for some time that the facts of thinking have a background, perhaps something that is already of the order of what I recalled. Namely, the structure that results from a certain use of the means of production that is in the background, but, as what I am articulating this year is proposing, there are perhaps other ways of taking it. In any case, by this well-being, I am aiming at what in the philosophical tradition is called hedone, pleasure. This hedone, as it has been used, presupposes that there corresponds to pleasure a certain relationship that we will call a relationship of the right tone, to nature of which we, men, or presumed to be such, would be in this perspective less the masters than the celebrants. It is indeed this that guides those who, let us say, from all antiquity, when they began, in order to ground morality, to take this reference point, that pleasure ought all the same to guide us along this path, that it is the original link in any case, that what is going to be at stake, is rather to pose as a question why certain of these pleasures are outside this correct tone. It is a matter then of pleasuring, as I might say, pleasure itself. Of (86) finding a module with the correct tone at the heart of what is involved in pleasure, and to see what is in the margin and what appears to function in a perverted fashion and is nevertheless justifiable with respect to what pleasure gives the measure of. Something is to be noted, which is that one can quite correctly say that this perspective involves an asceticism, an asceticism to which one can give its escutcheon which is the following: not too much work.

Well then up to a certain moment, that did not seem to do the trick. But I think all the same, all of you in so far as you are here, see that we are no longer in this atmosphere because in order to obtain this "not too much work", we have to make a ferocious effort! The strike, for example, that does not simply consist in folding one's arms but also of starving at the same time. Up to a certain time, people never needed to have recourse to means like that. This is what clearly shows that something has changed for so many efforts to be necessary to have "not too much work". This does not mean that we are in a context that follows its natural incline. In other words, the asceticism of pleasure, was something that scarcely needed to be stressed in so far as morality was grounded on the idea that there was somewhere a good and that it was in this good that the law resided. Things seem to be all of a piece in this sequence that I am designating.

Otium cum dignitate reigns in Horace, as you know – or you do not know; everyone knew it in the last century because everyone worked on Horace, but thanks to the solid education that you have received in the lycée you do not even know what Horace is. In ours, we are at the point when soon otium, namely, the life of leisure - naturally not our leisure which are forced leisures, you are give the leisure to go looking for a ticket in the Gare de Lyon, and then helter-skelter, and then you have to pay it, and then you have to transport yourself to the winter sports. There for a fortnight you are going to apply yourself to a solid pensum, that consists in queuing at the bottom of ski-lifts. You are not there to amuse yourself! The person who only does that, who does not work during his leisure time, is unworthy. Otium, for the moment is cum indignitate. And the further it goes, the more it will be like that unless there is an accident. In other words, to refuse to work, in our day, is something like a challenge. It is posed and can only be posed as a challenge. Excuse me for insisting again. St Thomas, in so far as he formally re-injects Aristotelian thinking – I am only saying formally - into Christianity, can only organise, even he, St Thomas, who may appear to you, like that to be a little grey faced, he can organise the Good as sovereign Good only in terms that in the last analysis are hedonistic. Naturally, this must not be seen in a monolithic fashion, if only because all sorts of misunderstandings are introduced into these (87) sorts of propositions that were already obvious even when they reigned. And it is certain that to follow their trace and see how the different spiritual directors got out of them would imply a great effort of discernment.

What I want to do is simply to recall here where we are centred by the fact that undoubtedly there has been in this respect a radical displacement. And that for us the starting points can only quite obviously be to question the ideology of pleasure through what renders everything that sustained it a little out of date. This by placing ourselves at the level of the means of production in so far as, for us, these are what really condition the practice of this pleasure. It seems to me that I sufficiently indicated already earlier how one can put on one side of a page the publicity for the proper use of holidays, namely, the hymn to the sun, and on the other side the obligatory conditions of the ski-lift. It is enough to add to it that all of this happens completely at the expense of the simple arrangement of ordinary life and of the cankers of sordidness in the midst of which we live, especially in big cities.

It is very important to recall in order to perceive that in short, the use that we make in psychoanalysis of the pleasure principle starting from the point at which it is situated, where it reigns, namely, in the unconscious, means that pleasure, what am I saying, its very notion, are in the catacombs. And that Freud's discovery about this plays the function of the evening visitor, the one who comes from afar to find the strange slippages that have taken place during his absence. "Do you know where I found it, he seems to say to us, this flower of our age, this lightness, pleasure? Now it is panting in the underground Acheronta, says Freud, simply concerned to prevent everything exploding, by imposing a measure on all of these enthusiasts, by slipping into it some lapse or other, because if it worked correctly, where would we be?" There is therefore in Freud's pleasure principle, something like that, a power of rectification, of tempering, of least tension as he puts it. It is like a sort of invisible weaver that is careful that there is not too much heat in the wheels.

What relationship is there between that and the sovereign pleasure of contemplative farniente that we pick up in the statements of Aristotle for example? This may be of a nature – if I am coming back to it, it is not in order to be always be going around in a circle – to make us suspect that there is perhaps all the same here some ambiguity. I mean a phantasy that we must also be careful perhaps not to take too literally, even though of course the fact that it comes to us after so much drifting renders it no doubt very precarious to appreciate what it was in its time. This to correct what in my discourse, up to the point that I have got to, may seem to be like a reference to the good old days. We know that it is difficult to escape from it, but it is not a reason (88) either not to mark that we do not give it too much credence.

In any case, the presentation of pleasure, even in Freud, is struck by an admitted ambiguity, the one precisely of the beyond, as he says, of the pleasure principle. We are not going to develop things here. To be quit of it, we will say that Freud writes, "Enjoyment is fundamentally masochistic". It is quite clear that this is only a metaphor, because moreover masochism is something at a level that is differently organised than this radical tendency. Enjoyment would tend, Freud tells us when he tries to elaborate what is at first only articulated metaphorically, to lower the threshold necessary for the maintenance of life. This threshold that the pleasure principle itself defines as an infimum, namely, the lowest of the heights, the lowest tension necessary for maintaining this. But one can fall still lower, and that is where pain begins and can only be exalted, if really this movement, as we are told, tends towards death. In other words, behind the affirmation of a phenomenon that we can hold to be linked to a certain context of practice, namely, the unconscious, it is a phylum of a completely different nature that Freud opens up with this beyond. No doubt it is certain that here the ambiguity as I have just stated it has not failed to preserve its agency, that a certain ambiguity is profiled between this theoretical death drive on the one hand and a masochism that is only a much more astute practice, but of what. All the same of this enjoyment in so far as it is not identifiable to the rule of pleasure. In other words with our experience, psychoanalytic experience, enjoyment, if you will allow me this to abbreviate, is coloured. There is a whole background, of course, to this reference. It must be said that with respect to space with its three dimensions colour, if we knew how to deal with it, could no doubt add one or two perhaps three to it. Because from this note, you should note that on this occasion that the Stoics, the Epicureans, the doctrinaires of the reign of pleasure with regard to what is opened up to us as a questioning, this still remains black and white.

I have tried, since I introduced into our handling this function of enjoyment, to indicate that it is essentially a relationship to the body but not an indifferent one. This relationship that is founded on the exclusion at the same time inclusion and constitutes our whole effort towards a topology that corrects the statements accepted up to now in psychoanalysis. Because it is clear that at every stage people speak only of this – rejection, formation of the non-ego, I am not going to recall all of them for you – but a function of what is called incorporation and what is expressed as introjection, as if what were at stake was a relationship of the inner to the outer and not a much more complex topology. Analytic ideology, in short, as it has been (89) expressed up to now is remarkably awkward and this is explained by the fact of the non-construction of an adequate topology.

What must be grasped is that this topology, I mean that of enjoyment, is the topology of the subject. It is what poursoit's our existence as subject. The verb poursoir is a new word that emerged just like that. I do not see why, after all the time that we have been speaking about en-soi and pour-soi one could not construct variations. It is extraordinarily amusing, for example you could write the en-soi like that, anse-oie or again en-soie. I will spare you. When I am all alone I have great fun! The interest of the verb poursoir, is that it immediately it finds little friends, pourvoir for example or again surseoir. You have to change the spelling if it is on the side of surseoir you have to write pourseoit. The interest is that if this helps to think out things and in particular a dichotomy: is the subject pursued against enjoyment? In other words does he test himself against it? Is he carrying on his own little game in the affair? Is he master when all is said and done or is he poursised to enjoyment? Is he in a way dependent on it, a slave? It is a question that has its interest, but in order to advance in it, you must start from the fact that in any case our access to enjoyment is commanded by the topology of the subject. And that, I assure you gives rise to some difficulties at the level of statements concerning enjoyment.

I speak from time to time with people who are not necessarily in the public eye but are very intelligent. There is a certain way of thinking that enjoyment can be assured by this impossible conjunction that I stated the last time between discourse and formal language. This is obviously linked to the mirage that all the problems of enjoyment are essentially linked to this division of the subject; but it is not because the subject is more divided that one will discover enjoyment. You must pay very careful attention to this. In other words, the subject creates the structure of enjoyment, but as far as we know, all that one can hope from it, are practices of recuperation. This means that what he recuperates has nothing to do with enjoyment, but with its loss. There was someone called Hegel who already posed these problems very clearly. He did not write "pour-soi" like me, and this is not without consequences. The way that he constructs the adventure of enjoyment is certainly, as it should be, entirely dominated by the Phenomenology of the spirit, namely, of the subject. But the error is there from the beginning as I might say and as such it cannot but have its consequences up to the end of what he says. It is very curious that in making this dialectic start, as it is put, from the relationship of the master and the slave, it is not manifest, and in a quite clear way from the very fact that he begins with, namely, the fight to the death, for pure prestige he insists, that this assuredly means that the master has renounced enjoyment. And since it is for nothing other than for the salvation of his body that the slave accepts to be dominated, it is hard (90) to see why, in such an explanatory perspective, why he should not be left with enjoyment. One cannot all the same have one's cake and eat it. If the master has taken the risk at the start it is indeed because he leaves enjoyment to the other.

Do I have to indicate, to recall, to evoke on this occasion what the whole of antique literature bears witness to, namely, that to be a slave, was not as troublesome as all that. It spared you, in any case, many political difficulties. Please do not misunderstand. I am speaking about the mythical slave, the one at the start of Hegel's phenomenology. And this mythical slave has his correspondents. It is not for nothing that in comedy – open Terence – the young girl destined for the final triumph of marriage with the nice daddy's boy is always a slave. For everything to be correct and to make us look foolish, because it is the function of comedy, it happens that she is a slave but from a very good family. It has happened by accident! And at the end everything is revealed. At that point, daddy's boy has put too much into it to be able to say in all decency "I am not playing the game; if I had known that she was the daughter of daddy's best friend, I would never have got involved with her!" But the sense of ancient comedy, is precisely that. It is to designate to us, when it is enjoyment that is at stake, that the daughter of the master of the allotment next door, is not the one that is recommended. She has something a little bit stiff about her, she is a little bit too attached to the patrimony that is attached to her.

I apologise for where these little fables take us, but it is in order to say that what historical evolution recuperates by freeing the slaves is of a different order. It frees them from something or other. But there is one thing certain. At every stage, it links them, at every stage of recuperation it links them to surplus enjoying which is, as I think I have sufficiently stated from the beginning of this year, something different. Namely, what responds not to enjoyment but to the loss of enjoyment in so far as from it emerges what becomes the cause conjugated by the desire for knowledge and this animation that I recently qualified as ferocious that proceeds from surplus enjoying. Such is the authentic mechanism, and it is important to recall it at the moment when all the same we are going to speak about Pascal, because Pascal like all of us is a man of his time.

Naturally the wager has to do with the fact that in the same years – and on these points of the sidelights of history, trust me, I have gone through everything that can be read. I simply signal to you that my friend Guilbaud has written in the reviews, I have only the offprint but

I will try all the same to know where you can get it, some short, very short little articles that are quite decisive as regards the relationship of this wager. He is not the only one moreover. In Brunet's book the (91) thing is also dealt with. The rules of games (la règle des partis) are something that one should say a lot about to show you its importance in the progress of mathematical theory. You should simply know that there is nothing more up to date with regard to what is at stake, for us, when it is the subject that is at stake. To interest oneself in what is involved in what is called a game, in so far as it is a practice that is fundamentally defined by the fact that it involves a certain number of events that take place within certain rules. Nothing isolates in a purer way what is involved in our relationships to the signifier. Here, in appearance, nothing else interests us than the most gratuitous manipulation in the order of combination. To pose the question, nevertheless, of what is involved in the decisions to be taken in this field of the gratuitous, is designed to underline that nowhere does it take on more force and necessity. It is in this respect that the wager that is made in it takes on its importance, when we see that everything is lacking to it in terms of acceptable conditions in a game. The efforts of authors to rationalise it, in a way, with respect to what was in effect for Pascal the reference – but he was certainly the first to know it – and to demonstrate that it does not work, gives its value to the way Pascal's wager is handled. And there in the text of Pascal and taken up by the authors in a short sighted way that is here the most exemplary thing and of which one can say that after all the authors do us the service of showing how there is installed the impasse that they persevere in, this way of highlighting, with respect to this decision, the relationships of extension to what is at stake. Namely, on the one hand a life whose enjoyment one renounces in order to make of it, in exactly the same way as Pascal signals it in the study of what is called the rules of games, which is that when it is in play, it is lost. This is the principle of the bet, the bet on the other side, on the side of the partner, is what Pascal articulates, an infinity of infinitely happy lives.

I am signalling to you that here a point is opened up of whether this infinity of lives is to be thought of in the singular or the plural. An infinity of life, in the singular, does not mean very much except changing the sense that in this context, the context of the rules of games, the word infinity has. Nevertheless we are here at the mercy of the ambiguity of little sheet of paper. The word happy (heureuse) is not finished; why should the word life (vie) be complete? The 's' that may well also belong to it, the numeral aspect of a comparison promoted here, namely, the numeral relationship between the stakes, with something that has no other name than uncertainty and that is itself taken, as such, numerically. Pascal writes that with respect even to a chance of gain one may suppose an infinity of chances of loss. To introduce then as a numerical element of chance, while it was properly speaking excluded in what he stated about the rules of games, which in order to be stated involves an equality of chances, shows clearly that in any case it is on the numerical plane that the stake ought to be (92) measured.

I insist, because in this little paper, which is in no way something edited or in a definitive state, which is a succession of written signs that are made, it is moreover stated at other points that to stake what is in question, namely, the fundamental uncertainty, namely, is there a partner. At other points Pascal states "there is one chance in two", namely, God exists or does not exist, a procedure that we of course see to be rather untenable and has no need to be refuted. But can it not be seen that in this everything resides precisely at the level of uncertainty? Because it is quite clear that nothing is imposed by this calculation and that one can always oppose to the proposition of the wager "what I have I hold and with this life I already have enough to do". Pascal lays it on and he says that it is nothing, but what does that mean? No, not zero, because there would be neither game, there would be no game because there would be no stake. He says that it is nothing, which is a completely different business, because this is precisely what is at stake when it is the surplus enjoying that is involved. And moreover if there is something that carries to the most essential, to the most radical point our passion for this discourse, it is precisely because this is what is at stake. The opposition no doubt still holds up. By betting in such a game, am I wagering too much?

And this indeed is why Pascal allows it to be inscribed in the argumentation of his supposed contradictor, a contradictor who moreover is nowhere except in himself because he is the only one to know the contents of his little piece of paper. But he answers him: "You cannot not wager because you are engaged". And in what way? You are not at all engaged except if the fact that you have to take a decision dominates. Namely, what is in the game, in games theory as it is called in our day, which is only the absolutely direct continuation of what Pascal inaugurated in the rules of games where decision is a structure. And it is because it is reduced to a structure that we can manipulate it in an entirely scientific way. Only there, at this level, if you have to take a decision, whichever of the two it may be, if you are engaged anyway, it is from the moment that you are questioned in this way, and by Pascal. Namely, at the moment that you authorise yourself to be "I" in this discourse. The veritable ambiguity, the dichotomy is not between God exists or does not exist, whether Pascal likes it or not. The problem becomes of a completely different nature from the moment that he affirmed we do not know, not whether God exists, but neither whether God is, nor what he is. And therefore the business about God will be – our contemporaries have perfectly sensed it and have articulated it – a matter of fact, which, if you refer to the definition that I gave of fact, is a matter of discourse. The only fact is one that is stated. And that is why we are entirely given over to the tradition of the book. What is at stake in Pascal's wager is the following. Does "I" exist or whether "I" does not exist, as I already (93) told you, at the end of my previous discourse. I have spent a time that was as it happens and perhaps I am a little bit too used to doing this, too much time introducing the core of what is involved, but I think that these premises were indispensable. This leads me then in a

not particularly timely way to our cut today. You should know simply that contrary to what is believed, the wager is not on the promise but on the existence of the "I", something that can be deduced beyond Pascal's wager. Namely, if we put in its place the function of the cause as it is placed at the level of the subject, namely, the o-object. It is not the first time for me to write it thus, o-cause. It is precisely in so far as the whole wager has this essence of reducing this thing that is all the same not something that we can, like that, hold in the hollow of our hands, namely, our life of which after all we may have a completely different apprehension, a completely different perspective. Namely, that it comprehends us and without limit, and that we are here a place of passage, a phenomenon. Why should this not be sustained? It has been after all.

That this life should be reduced to this something that can thus be brought into play, is this not the sign that what dominates in a certain rise of the relationships to knowledge, is the o-cause. And it is here that in our subsequent steps we will have to measure what results, beyond this o-cause, in terms of a choice. To say I exist o, with regard to this relationship to the o-cause, a whole succession of consequences perfectly and immediately formalisable. I will do a calculation of it for you the next time. And inversely, the very fact of being able to calculate in this way the other position, the one that speaks in favour of seeking what is involved in the I that perhaps does not exist, goes in the direction of the o-cause, in the sense of what Pascal proceeds to when he invokes his interlocutor to renounce it, here for us there takes on its sense, the direction of a research that is explicitly ours, as regards psychoanalysis.

The most difficult thing to think about, is the One. That people strive to do so is not new. The modern approach is scripturist (scripturaire). There was a day when I extracted, to the astonishment, I remember, of one of my listeners who marvelled at it. "Ah! How did you manage to get your hands on that, einziger Zug", which I translated in a way that has lasted as the unary trait. It is in effect the term with which Freud pinpoints one of the forms of what he calls identification. I showed at that time in a sufficiently developed way for me not to have to come back to it today, except simply to recall that in this trait there is the essential of the effect of what for us analysts, namely, in the field that we have deal with the subject, is called repetition.

This thing, that I did not invent, but which is said in Freud, provided only one pays attention to what he says, this is linked in a way that one can call determining to a consequence that he designates as the lost object. Essentially, to summarise, it is in the fact that enjoyment is aimed at in an effort of rediscoveries and that it can only be so by being recognised by the effect of the mark, that this mark itself introduces into it a blemish from which this loss results. A mechanism that is fundamental and essential to confront with what already appeared in a research that, after all, was pursued along the same path, concerning every essence and culminated at the idea, the pre-existence of every form and at the same time by appealing to this thing that is not easy to think out. This is Plato, it is reminiscence.

These points having been recalled, we are dealing with Pascal's wager. Its relationship to repetition, I think, is not altogether unnoticed by many of you who are here. Why am I now going through Pascal's wager? It is certainly not in order to sound clever, nor as a philosophical reminder, nor of the philosophy of the history of philosophy. What happens at the level of Jansenism, to recall the Pascalian context, is an affair that interests us precisely in this that the historian, as in many other things, is quite incapable of finding his bearings in it.

Read a little Que-sais-je? I apologise to its author for having forgotten his name, but I read the text from beginning to end, and naturally not to inform myself about Jansenism. Besides I will not say anything more about what is involved in my relationship to it, it would be too good an opportunity for you to precipitate yourself into the historical or (96) biographical determinations of my interests. In any case, some time ago, as it happens, I was able to get a grasp of it outside this sort of ghost that remains of it, namely, that they were people that are called rigorist, in other words who prevented you from living the way you wanted to. That is all that remains of it in effect, through one of these surprising effects of silting up that it must not be forgotten is also a dimension of history. But in reading this little book then, I was getting the testimony about what is said of it, simply by taking things precisely as the title of the collection indicates, at the level of Que sais-je? The author knows a lot of things. He starts from the origin, if indeed there was one, of the questions it gives rise to. He ends up at the point where it is drowned in the upheavals of the French Revolution, and he very nicely admits at the end that in the last analysis, you cannot really see, taking everything into account what Jansenism meant. Which is all the same, for a work of historical review, a rather curious but exemplary conclusion.

One thing appears in this history. It is that in taking it at the level of its historical recording, it begins as an affair among theologians. And moreover it is quite true that Jansenius is found to be the most representative of them, let us even say the most worthy to represent them, if only because of this exemplary thing which is that it appears that everything that was being stirred up at the epoch around the debate, about the contradiction and condemnations that followed it, the fundamental question, the one that almost none of the participants in the debate does not bring up, is: "And first of all you have not read him!" And it seems indeed in effect that the very great majority of those who were so passionate at that time, not only had not read him but had not even opened him. Some however, the two or three leaders, the Grand Arnaud must have read him; moreover was there any need to read him? People had read a lot of other things that were fundamental and in particular - before, well before this work that appeared posthumously, as you know perhaps, that is called Augustinus, by the person that I have just named, Bishop Jansenius - there was the thinking of St Augustine that one cannot deny is at the foundation of Christianity. In a word, the question is obvious once it is precisely Christianity that is at stake.

The measure in which Christianity interests us, I mean at the level of theory, can be measured precisely by the role given to Grace. Who does not see that Grace has the closest relationship with the fact that I, starting from theoretical functions that certainly have nothing to with the effusions of the heart, designate as d(O), the desire of the Other. Man's desire, I said at one time when, to make myself understood, I had to risk certain improbable words like Man, for example. I could have contented myself with saying, desire as it concerns you, this desire operates in the field of the Other in so far as it is articulated as the locus of the word. Who does (97) not also see what is implied, if what is stated here is correct, this relation orientated by the vector starting from $◇D on the graph towards this desire, the desire of the Other to question it in an "I ask myself what you want" which is also balanced by an "I ask you what I want". Anything that tends in any manifestation of desire towards a "Thy will be done" deserves to be posited first of all, in any judgement – it is not necessarily the privilege of spiritual people – about what is the nature of prayer. Its inextricable intermeshing with the functions of desire could be clarified from it.

This tutoiement, [Thying], I have said, does not have a simple start, because at the level of the subject, the question of who is speaking remains intact. It is nonetheless essential to note that this Thy is addressed to a faceless Other. There is no need for him to have one at all for it to be addressed to him, if we know how to distinguish this field of the Other from the relationship to one's fellow. Now this is precisely what articulates its definition in my theory. The relationship, the knot, the link between the disputes about Grace, which it seems that those responsible by right, namely, the Church, at the time that we are speaking about, could not get out of in any other way except by prohibiting in a repeated fashion for two centuries that anything whatsoever should be articulated either for or against in this debate. This prohibition of course only made the struggle rebound and multiply the books and the pamphlets. This is something in which what concerns us is that this frenzy that some people say is purely intellectual is completely solidary to a movement whose incidences of fervour there is no question of contesting. Nor in this case the properly convulsive effects. And this was pinpointed at the time. However we may be able to gauge as psychopathological what happened on the tomb of a certain Paris deacon. And when, the doors were closed at the entrance of the cemetery, so that there could be written over them By order of the king God is prohibited from doing miracles in this place the aforesaid convulsions continued elsewhere. It seems that even if it were only to pinpoint things in this ultimate consequence, we can see that this field is close to our own. And that after all, to take it in a way that is not altogether at basic, namely, "should they be interned or not?" we have all the same the right to try to articulate something and why not, in the freest, the most lucid, the most speculative way about the wager precisely of Pascal.

The Name of the Father – I am going to announce it like that at the start because it will perhaps be the best way to detach you from the effort of fascination that emerges from these confusions – the Name of the Father, that I am insisting on to say that it is not by chance that I was not able to speak about it, the Name of the Father takes on here a singular form that I am asking you to carefully locate at the level of the wager. This will change for you perhaps the haggling that the authors on this subject have usually devoted themselves to about whether it is worthwhile to wager. (98) What is worthwhile, is to consider how it is formulated from the pen of Pascal. I would say that this singular form, in the statement of what comes at the top of this little paper, this singular form is what I would call the absolute real; and the absolute real, on this little paper, is what is stated as heads or tails. Heads or tails (croix ou pile), it is not a matter of the cross, you can get that out of your heads. "Croix ou pile" was the way at the time of saying what we would call today heads or tails.

I want you to get the idea that if it is conceivable that we should arrive, at some point, at the final term of any science whatsoever in the modern sense, namely, by the operation of what is called a measure, it can only be very precisely at the point when what is to be said, is "heads or tails", "it is that or it is not that". It is what it is, there, because up to then, nothing confirms for us that we are not just measuring our own measures. It must come to a point, heads or tails, at which it is only the real that is involved as a check.

Pascal's wager contains at its start something that is referred to this pole point, the absolute real. And this all the more in that what is at stake, is precisely something that is defined: that we cannot know either whether He is or is not. This is explicitly what Pascal articulates as regards what is at stake, which of course, at the level of the wager, if the question of its act is posed, may well in effect be expressed by the question of the existence or not of the partner.

But there is not just the partner. There is the stake. And this is the interest of Pascal's wager. The stake, the fact that he can pose in these terms the question of our measure with respect to the real, the stake

supposes that a step has been taken that, whatever the amateurs of historical ferreting out may say, namely, that already Raymond Sebond, Père Sirmond and Pierre Charron had brought up something of the order of this risk. Overlooking that if Pascal can advance in a fashion that makes it not at all a matter of chance that it has been so profoundly felt in the field of where it thinks, it is because he profoundly modified the approach of what is involved in the "I say", I mean of the I of the gambler. And this by proceeding as I might say to something that might be called an exorcism, the day he discovered the rules of games.

The resistances he encounters after having posed the problem of the just way to divide up the stake when, for some reason or other, necessary or by mutual consent, an interruption takes place during a game whose rules had already been given, the pivot of what allows him to settle it in such fruitful way, that it is through this that he articulates the foundation of what is called the mathematical triangle. This assuredly, of course, had already discovered by someone called Tartaglia. But he did not necessarily have to know that, moreover, besides, he draws different consequences from it. Because it is through it that he rejoins, takes up again and gives a new push to what, in the laws of the maximum and the (99) minimum in Archimedes, a prelude to what is going to be born from integral calculus. All of this rests on this simple remark, to settle what is at stake, which is that the essence of the game, in what it involves in terms of logic because it is regulated, depends on the fact that what is bet is lost at the start. While the question of the lure of gain distorts, refracts, in a way that does not allow theoreticians not to be weakened in their articulations, this initial purification allows there to be stated in a proper way what has to be done in order to carry out at every moment a sharing out of what is there at the centre as stake, as lost.

The question is interesting for us analysts, because it allows us to attach to it the essential motivation for the emergence of such a concatenation. If there is an activity whose starting point is grounded on the assumption of loss, it is indeed because what is at stake in the very approach of any rule -

namely, of a signifying concatenation, of an effect of loss - is very precisely what I have been trying to dot the i's of from the beginning. Because of course our experience, as they say, in analysis confronts us at every instant with this effect of loss. And if one does not grasp what is at stake, one attributes it, under the name of narcissistic wound, to an imaginary injury. This is how innocent experience testifies that this effect of loss is met with at every step. It bears witness to it in an innocent way, namely, in the most harmful way, by referring it to this schema of narcissistic wound, namely, from a relationship to one's fellow that on this occasion has absolutely nothing to do with it. It is not because some fragment that is supposed to be part of the body is detached from it that the wound in question functions, and every attempt at reparation, whatever it may be, is condemned to prolong its aberration. What is at stake, the wound, is elsewhere in an effect that at the start, to recall it, I distinguished from the imaginary as symbolic. It is in the gap that is produced or aggravated, because we cannot plumb how much of this gap was already there in the organism, of this gap between the body and its enjoyment. In as much as then, as I have said, what determines it or aggravates it, and it is only this aggravation that is important, is the incidence of the signifier. The very incidence of the mark, the incidence of what I earlier called the unary trait, which gives it its consistency.

So then what is at stake is outlined by measuring the effect of this loss, of this lost object in so far as we designate it by o, at this locus without which it could not be produced, at this still unknown, still unmeasured locus called the Other. What does it mean, that one must first take this measure of which it is enough to have the experience, indeed the passion for gaming to see its relationship with the way we function as desire. What is going to be involved between this proportion that we must now (100) measure? Well then, there is something very strange. This proportion, this measure, is already there in the figures, I mean in the written signs with which we articulate the very idea of measure.

We do not know anything, at this point, about the nature of the loss. I can behave as if we never give it any particular support. We give points, I will not say where we are able to scoop things out, where we get the wood shavings; but there is no need to know. As I said, on the one hand we only know the function of loss and on the other, we undoubtedly do not know what is involved in the 1 because it is only the unary trait. This not knowing is only what we are happy to retain of it. And nevertheless it is enough for us to write 1/o in which the proportion is inscribed. Namely, that the relationship of this 1, determining for the effect of loss, is equal and should be, since it seems indeed that it is a loss that is at stake, to something in which there is connected by an additive "and" this 1 and the written sign of this loss, 1/o = 1+o. Because such indeed in effect is the inscription from which there results what is involved in a certain proportion whose harmony, if it must be evoked, does not depend assuredly on aesthetic effects. Simply I would ask you, in order to measure it yourselves, to allow yourselves to be guided first of all by the examination of what is involved in its mathematical nature. The harmonies in question are not constructed by luck, from a lucky encounter. As I think the bringing together of the series that results from the recurrent function generated from this equality, as I think I can show you that one finds in it the characteristic note, that of o, in a whole other series generated from another starting point, but which interests us just as much. As you will see, it is the one that by taking things from another end would be generated from what we have called the Spaltung or the original division of the subject, in other words from efforts to make two disjointed units connect up. This is a field that must be gone through step by step.

It is necessary to write out in a clear way what is involved in the aforesaid series. We write it in the following form. We put here the o and here the 1, a direction, this direction only exists, I underlined it in passing, from the fact of our starting point. After the 1, we put 1+o. After the o, 1-o. The series is generated from the addition of two terms in order to produce the following term. So here we have:

1-o	1+o
2o-1	2+o
2-3o	3+2o
5o-3	5+3o
5-8o	8+5o

(101) from which you can see that it does not fail to present some relationships with the opposite list. I pass on, I pass on because it is easy for you to check the fact that the continuation of these values represents a proportion that is maintained, namely, that 1+o is to 1 as 2+o is to 1+o. It is very exactly what is written in the initial formula. This might just as well be written:

$$1, 1/o, 1/o^2, 1/o^3, 1/o^4, \text{etc....}$$

a number that, since o is less than 1, will keep on increasing.

Here on the contrary you write o^2, o^3, o^4, o^5, o^6 a number that as I repeat since o is less than one, will always decrease.

Let us not leave our Pascal because, on the little paper where what he is working on is an articulation, therefore there is no need for it to be destined for someone else in order for the exchanges to have a value that is not persuasive but logically constructive. People have seen very clearly in our day that, for certain problems, there is a way to resolve them where the number of attempts counts. Namely, at the end of how many attempts one party has the last word. If he wins because of what one could call, but purely retrospectively, a mistake by the other party, it is clear that the test will consist in connection with the other party in a more risky response. But that, if the result is the same we can attribute to a logical articulation, I mean one that is accepted. It is enough to define it at the start, by way of a demonstration, which would be articulated as follows:

$(1-o)o^2$	$(1+o)$	$\frac{1}{o}$
$(2o-1)o^3$	$(2+o)$	$\frac{1}{o^2}$
$(2-3o)o^4$	$(3+2o)$	$\frac{1}{o^3}$
$(5o-3)o^5$	$(5+3o)$	$\frac{1}{o^4}$
$(5-8o)o^6$	$(8+5o)$	$\frac{1}{o^5}$

It is a pity that people forget at an epoch, ours, which has very well been able to codify the laws of this function of yes or no, refutable yes or no, and to notice that it opens up a greater field than the pure and simply demonstrable. It is in this way - I pointed it out, I already announced it, initiated it the last time - that Pascal's process, the one that first of all made him sound out with regard to a pure "heads or tails" what is rational in the engagement of betting something in life which is precisely not defined against something that is at least an infinity of lives qualified, without specifying what they mean, as indefinitely happy. But perhaps it would be worthwhile, if we come after him, for us to re-question the (102) signs. We see that they are capable of delivering up something that necessarily specifies the sense.

This indeed is what we are in the process of carrying out at the level of these signs. And we perceive that if we lay hold of the o whose value we still do not know but only what it generates as a series in its relationship to 1, we see a series, nothing more. And one might even say that the question of what is involved in o and 1 as such, as terms set up in some way or other, even mathematically, does not have a sense. It is not like when it is a matter of defining whole numbers and what one can do with them, neutral elements. This 1 has nothing to do with the 1 of multiplication. Supplementary actions are necessary to put them to use. Nor is the o. The o and the 1 are everywhere, everywhere there is the relation of 1/o, namely, in the whole series. This is precisely the interest of starting from it because the only reason that requires us to start from it is that it is starting from them that we write. In any real whatsoever that appears to correspond to this scale, they have nowhere a place. Only without them we would not be able to write this scale. It is starting from it, from this scale, that I can allow myself to image, starting from another writing, also the most simple, we remain, it seems, within our limits, within those of the unary trait. Except for the fact that we are going to prolong it indefinitely, to try at least to prolong it indefinitely.

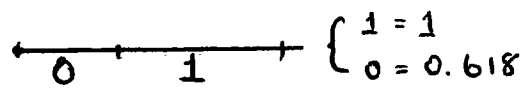
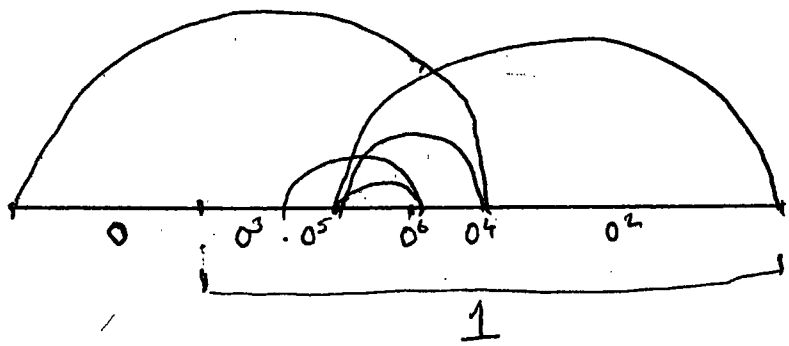
Here is the o, here is the 1. We are not obliged to measure them for them to be correctly written. Here also, I think that you will excuse me for abbreviating and for saying that we project this o onto this field considered in its function as 1. What we have just written indicates to us that what will be here will be o^2. The folding back of the o^2 gives us here an o^3; the folding back of o^3 gives us here an o^4. I hope you are following. You see then that there is going to be added together by operations that go in a certain direction all the even powers of o: o^2, o^4, o^6. And that here there are going to be reproduced, because if we refer the o, we will have o^5, the sequence of the odd powers o^3, o^5, o^7.





[Reconstructed Schema based on Lacan's Commentary]

(103) It is very easy to see that in this way, we will find at the converging meeting point of these powers, one even the other odd, the measure of o as a total for all the even powers, o itself being of course excluded. The measure o^2 as a sum of all the odd powers of o, o^2 and o giving a total of 1. Namely, that it is by this very operation of separated addition of even powers on the one hand and odd powers that we effectively find the measure of this field of the Other as 1, namely, something different to its pure and simple inscription as unary trait.

$$\begin{array}{ll} o^3 & o^2 \\ o^5 & o^4 \\ o^7 & o^6 \\ \hline o^2 + & o \end{array}$$

I only obtained this result by taking in isolation the proportional foundation of o. But if I take its development in the sense of growth, you easily see that by simply adding these already growing powers, if I were to tell you what this gives, at the moment that we can add the 1/o to some power until there has emerged o^{100}. It is very easy to make a calculation, if you have a page, and this takes no more than ten minutes, not about what $1/o^{100}$ is but the addition of the whole series. There are very well known and very easy formulae one can see that it is 2,000,000,000,000,000,000,000,000,000.

I mean that in effect, in a sense, we find what? Nothing more wonderful than a series including a growth that is called infinite of whole numbers, but that is all the same in the final analysis of the order of what is called numerable. A series constituted in this way, which is called a geometrical progression, in other words described as exponential, remains numerable.

When I pointed out to you that it is only in a scripturist way that the point where the 1 and the o lies is important for us, this is not to neglect its incidence now and to say that it is starting from some points that we see a difference. The decreasing infinity is the same in its generation. Only it culminates, instead of culminating at infinity since all the same we know a little bit more about infinity and we have learned to reduce this infinity of whole numbers to its proper and distinct value. Only on the other hand, as I showed you here, by beginning from there, because this has its interest, you will have a limit, a limit that the series can approach as closely as possible, in a way less than any size that is chosen, however small it may be, namely, very precisely $1 + o$.

The starting point of Pascal who in his notes writes simply infinity-nothing is in effect exactly the point where there lies at once his sureness (104) of touch and the really functional point from which everything that follows is determined. Because what he calls nothing, as moreover he indicates in the most explicit fashion in other notations of his, is simply that starting from a point, besides I told you any one whatsoever, we obtain in one direction, the decreasing direction, a limit. But it is not because it has a limit that it is less infinite. On the other hand what we obtain on the other side, namely, a growth that, for its part, has no limit, this does not specify this direction as more specifically infinite.
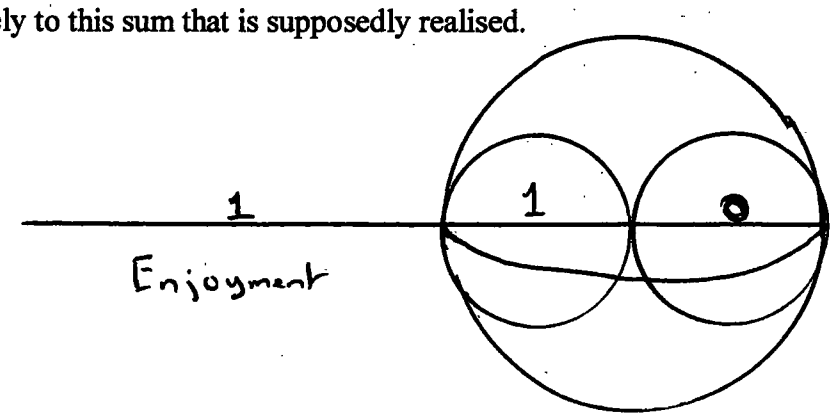
Moreover, when Pascal writes nothing, it is not by chance; he himself suspects, that nothing is not nothing, that it is something that can be put on the scales, and very especially at the level that we have to put it in the wager.

But here does there not appear something, something that must be seen, that in the final analysis, if in the field of the Other there is stated a revelation that promises us, I repeat, an infinity of infinitely happy lives, I am sticking to their numerical statement. And for a while Pascal sticks to it also. Because he begins to ponder, one life against two lives, is that worth the trouble? But yes, but yes, he says; against three lives, still more; and naturally the more of them there are the more worthwhile it is!

Only we see this important thing, which is that in all the cases that we choose even when it is nothing that we lose we are deprived of a semi-infinite. This corresponds to the field of the Other and in the way that we can precisely measure it as 1 by means of the loss. As regards the genesis of this Other, if it is true that we can distinguish it from the 1 before the 1, namely enjoyment, you see that by having affirmed the 1 + o, by having done the addition of it with infinite care, it is indeed about o in its relation to 1, namely, about this lack that we have received from the Other as compared to what we can build up as the complete field of the Other, it is from there, from the o, and in an analogical fashion that we can hope to take the measure of what is involved in the 1 of enjoyment with respect precisely to this sum that is supposedly realised.



(105) We know that; we find that again, we analysts. The most characteristic, the most subtle form that we have given of the function cause of desire, is what is called masochistic enjoyment. It is an analogical enjoyment, namely, that at the level of the surplus enjoying, the subject takes on in a qualified fashion this position of loss, of waste product that is represented by o. And his whole effort is to constitute the Other as the field simply articulated in the style of this law, of this contract which our friend Deleuze has so happily emphasised to supply for the trembling imbecility that reigns in the field of psychoanalysis!

It is in an analogical way and by playing on proportion that there steals away what is approached about enjoyment along the path of surplus enjoying. It is through this point, at least that by tackling things along the starting path that we have taken, we see here that we have a way in that experience justifies. The question no doubt is not without interest as regards the way a certain renunciation functions in Pascal. But do not go too quickly. To treat those who have struggled with this logic without knowing it as universally masochistic, this is the order of short circuiting where there is designated what I called in this field blackguardism that turns into stupidity.

Today I was only able to lead you to the following approach: the proportion already inscribed in the simple entry into a field along the simple scripturist path. We have of course to verify it from other angles. If this o, I have said - and this is even, I underline, the image, the illustration and nothing more - is what conditions the distinction of the "I" as sustaining this field of the Other and being able to totalise itself as a field of knowledge, what has to be known, precisely, is that by being thus totalised, it will never reach the field of sufficiency that is articulated in the Hegelian theme of Selbstbewusstsein. Because precisely in this measure and in the very measure of its perfection the "I" of enjoyment remains completely excluded. What is important for us, is to confirm that not alone would no addition of one to the other not add up in the form of any figure whatsoever, of an added 2, this divided "I" finally connects up with itself. What is most piquant at this point, is to notice, as I will show you the next time, because this field, as you see, far from being interminable is simply long and I need time to articulate it for you, anyone between now and then, and I must say that I hope that there are a good number who will not need to do it, informs himself about what the Fibonacci series means will obviously be better prepared than the others for what I do for the others. That is, explain to them, namely, and it is very important, that a series constituted by the simple addition of 1 to 1, then of this last 1 to what precedes it to constitute the third term, in other words 2, then 1 + 1 = 2, 1 + 2 = 3, then 2 + 3 = 5 etc. 1, 1, 2, 3, 5, 8, 13 etc. You can note in passing that these numbers are already inscribed and (106) that it is not without reason, only the relation of each of these numbers to the other is all the same not the o relationship.

I will start the next time from this fact that in the measure that they grow, namely, for any Fibonacci series – all the Fibonacci series are homologous – you can start from any number whatsoever and make it grow by any number whatsoever, if you simply observe the law of addition, it is a Fibonacci series and it is the same one. And whatever it may be, if you make it grow, you will obtain between these numbers these proportions that are already inscribed, namely, the relationship of 1 to o. And you will notice that it is from o as it was in relationship to 1 that the number leaped from one term to the other. In other words, whether you start from the division of the subject or whether you start from o, you will notice that they are reciprocal.

I wanted to leave you here, on this approach that I am calling that of pure logical consistency. This will allow us to situate better what is involved in a certain number of human activities. That the mystics should have attempted along their path this relationship of enjoyment to the 1, is not a field that I will be tackling here for the first time. Because already in the first years, the obscure times of my seminar, I put forward for you then, for those who were there, three or four, Angelus Silesius. Angelus Silesius is a contemporary of Pascal. Try to explain what his verse means without having his distichs. Le Pélerin Chérubinique, I recommend it to you; you can buy it at Aubier, it is not out of print!

What is involved in it, certainly, does not directly concern our path. But if you want to see the place that the I, the Ich holds in it, you will see that it refers back to the question that is here our real goal and that I am repeating at the end today, do I exist (est-ce que j'existe)? You see how an apostrophe, is enough to falsify everything. If I say, I exist, that's it, you believe it, you think that I am talking about me, simply because of an apostrophe. Does it exist, speaking this time about the "I". But this it, ugh! Third person, we have said that it was an object. There we are making an object of the "I". Simply by omitting the third person, that can be used also to say it is raining. You do not talk about a third person, you do not say "he is raining", it is not your pal that is raining. It is raining. It is in this sense that I am using it exists. Is there something of the "I" (du "Je") that exists?

Seminar 9: Wednesday 29 January 1969

(107) I left you the last time rather firmly advanced into the field of Pascal's wager at the point punctuated by what I have just written on the board. Namely, on the remark about the essential identity of the series that I told you we place at a starting point situated between o and 1 in a completely arbitrary way. Arbitrary takes on its sense with the same accent that de Saussure gives this word when he talks about the arbitrary character of the signifier. I mean that at the point that we have placed the cut between a series decreasing to infinity and an increasing series, in the same way we have no reason to situate this point except from writing. Namely, that here the 1 has no other function than that of the trait, of the unary trait, of a stroke, of a mark. Only, however arbitrary it may be, it nevertheless remains that without this 1, this unary trait, there would be no series at all. This is the sense that must be given in de Saussure – an author who is no doubt super-competent declares that I betray him at my pleasure – that without this arbitrariness, language would not have, properly speaking, any effect.

So then, this series is constructed on the fact that each of its terms is produced by the addition of the two terms that precede this term. This is the same as saying that in the other direction, each is made up of the subtraction of the smaller of the two that follow it from the greater. It is constructed on the principle that the relationship of one of these terms to the following is equal to the relationship of the following one as it is produced by being added to it, which seems to add a second condition to it. To posit that the o, the term I have just spoken about, is equal to the following 1, in its relationship to what again is going to follow it, namely, to the addition of this 1 to o, seems to specify this series by a double

condition. Now, this is precisely what is erroneous as can be seen by the fact that if you posit as a law of a series that each of its terms should be formed from the addition – no doubt the function of addition here deserves to be specified in a more rigorous fashion but since it is not a matter here, in this connection, of me having to go into extensive considerations about what is involved in set theory, we will stick to the operation commonly known under this term and which is already, moreover, given at the source of what we have posited, at the source of this series, I mean the first one.

Here then is the series 1, 1. It is enough to establish it to write that in this (108) series U_o will be equal to 1, that U_1 will be equal to 1 and subsequently that any U_n will be the sum of U_{n-1} and of U_{n-2}. This series is called the Fibonacci series and you see that it is subject to a unique condition. What is going to be produced in this series demonstrates that it is essentially the same as the series first posited. Namely, that if you operate between them by any defined operation whatsoever, if you add for example term to term, if you multiply term to term, also for example, you can also take other operations, there will result another Fibonacci series. Namely, that you confirm for yourself that the law of its formation is exactly the same, namely, that it is enough to add two of its terms to get the following.

What becomes then of this marvellous proportion, this o that seems, in the series that I started with, that you can decorate as you know with the function of the golden number that, in effect, appears there, from the beginning under the form of this o, manifested here by the fundamental position of o: o = 1/1+o. This little o is not missing in any Fibonacci series, for the following reason. If you make the relationship of each of its terms to the following term, namely, 1/1 first of all, that I did not write because 1/1 means nothing, then ½, then 2/3, 3/5, 5/8, you will obtain a result that very rapidly tends to inscribe the first two decimals, then the three, then the four, then the five, then the six, of the number that corresponds to this small o. And it does not matter that it is written as 0.618 and what follows, something that is very easy to verify. We already knew that o was less than unity and that the important thing is that we see that this o very quickly, once you get away from the starting point of the Fibonacci series, is going to be inscribed as a relationship of one of its terms to the following term. This to demonstrate that there is not in the choice of o, that we have precisely because it is placed before the problem of the represented command, which is lost in the position, in the fact of posing the inaugural 1 as reduced to its function of mark, this choice of o for its part, has nothing arbitrary because it is in the same way as the loss that we are aiming at, that which, at the horizon, at the goal of our discourse, constitutes surplus enjoying. Like this loss, the o, the limiting relationship of a term of a Fibonnaci series to the one that follows it, like this loss the o is only an effect of the position of the unary trait.

Besides, if something is necessary to confirm this for you, it is enough for you to look at the decreasing series as I have written it, or rather rewritten it, because I already wrote it the last time on the left. It is enough for you to see how it is constructed. The series of numbers that constitute the Fibonnaci series appears there in an alternating fashion, namely, that there is here an o, 3o, 5o, 8o and that as regards whole numbers, they also alternate 1, 2, 3, 5, 8, 13.....it is in an alternating fashion that what is written as whole number is at the right and then on the left and so on.

(110) In the same way as regards what is involved for the number that is affected to o; but as you see, the o has always here an advance on the whole number. It is 1, here, while the whole number will only be 1 at the following term and so on. That is why it changes places because, for a positive result to be maintained, and what is involved in this series, so that each of its terms should be written in a positive fashion, it is necessary that there should pass alternately from one side to the other what is numbered as a whole number and what is numbered as o. Now, as you see, since o is less than 1 and because we know on the other hand, because of the position of this first equality that it is going to be expressed by a growing power of o, the result of this difference is going to become smaller and smaller with respect to something that it constitutes as a limit. This is what is called a converging series and converging towards what? Towards something that is not 1 but, as I showed you the last time by the image of the folding back of this o onto the 1, then of the remainder which was o^2 onto the o, which produces here o^3, the o^3 being folded back, which produces here o^4, the whole arriving here at a cut that produces $o/o^2 = o + o^2 = 1$.

It is because of this that the limit of the converging series inscribed here is placed at the level of 1 + o, itself equal to 1/o. What does that mean? What is represented, properly speaking, by what is functioning here? The question of how it is possible to correctly represent what is involved in a possible conjunction of the division of the subject in so far as it would result from a rediscovery of the subject. Here, a question mark as regards this subject. What is involved in the absolute subject of enjoyment and the subject that is generated from this 1 that marks it, namely, the point of origin of identification. There is a great temptation to put forward the writing of the Hegelian Selbstbewusstsein, namely, that the subject being posited by this inaugural 1, has only to connect up with its own figure qua formalised. The subject of knowledge is posited as knowing itself. Now, it is precisely here that the fault appears, if it is not seen that this can only be effective by positing the known subject, as we do, in the relationship of the signifier to another signifier. This shows us that here it is the relationship not of 1 to 1 but of 1 to 2 that is at stake, and that therefore, at no moment is the original division abolished.

It is only at the horizon of an infinite repetition that we can envisage the relationship, here simply imitated, as something that corresponds to this relationship of 1 to 1, the subject of enjoyment as compared to the subject established in the mark whose difference remains irremediable since, however far you push the operation that this reduction generates, you will always find between one term and the other and inscribed as the result of the loss, the relationship that you start from, even if it is not inscribed in the original inscription, namely, the o relationship. This is all the more significant because it is a matter precisely of a relationship and not a simple difference that, in a way, will become more and more negligible with regard to the pursuit of your operation. So that if, as it is easy to (111) verify, you take this operation in the sense of the increasing series here, the difference between the whole numbers, namely, between what is inscribed in 1, the foundation of the original subjective identification and the number of o will always continue to increase because here, in the direction of the addition, it is always from the relationship of a number of o that corresponds to the smallest term to a number of whole numbers that correspond to the greatest term that is at stake. Namely, with respect as I might say to an extension of the whole numbers of the subject, taken at a mass level, there will always be a greater lack of o units. There will perhaps not be o for everyone. Take this, I am passing on, I will come back to it perhaps in an apologue question. What is important for us undoubtedly, what is going to count in our plumbing of Pascal's wager is what becomes of it in the sense that, in a no less infinite fashion, the o can be approached. That once more there appears to us what gives in an analogical form what is involved in the relationships of 1 to 1+ o. Namely, this o in which alone there can be grasped what is involved in enjoyment as compared to what is created from the appearance of a loss.

Let it be enough for me to add here this trait or more exactly to this highlighting of the distance between what is involved in the Hegelian solution of Selbstbewusstsein from the one that a rigorous examination of the function of the sign gives us every time that there reappears in any way whatsoever that it is in a relationship of 1 to 1 that the solution can be found. I am writing it here in a humorous fashion, make no mistake. Ask yourselves what is involved. What tends to give this image as representing an ideal that one day could be closed by an absolute knowledge? Is it indeed like the H that I have just translated humorously, is it indeed man, homo? Or why not the hysteric, because let us not forget that it is at the level of neurotic identification – re-read the text and preferably in German, in order not to be obliged to have recourse to these painful publications that the attention of some zealous people ensures are the only thing that we have recourse to when we only want to use French. Crappy editions, there is not even a table of contents. Anyway you will see – if you refer to the appropriate article, Group psychology and the analysis of the ego, in the chapter on identification, that it is, of the three types of identification stated by Freud, in the middle one that he inserts properly speaking into the field of neurosis, that there appears, that there arises the question of the einziger Zug, this unary trait that I extracted from it. If I recall it here, it is in order to indicate that in the continuation of my discourse I will have to come back to it. Because very curiously, it is in neurosis from which effectively we started, that there appears the most ungraspable form, contrary to what you may imagine - and it is in order to allow you to ward it off that I am announcing it here - the most ungraspable form of the o-object.

(112) Let us come back now to Pascal's wager and to what can be inscribed about it. The fastidiousness of philosophers seems in effect to make us lose the greater part of its meaning. It is nevertheless not because every effort has not been made for that including inscribing the data within a matrix in accordance with the forms in which there are today inscribed the results that are described as those of games' theory. In this form it is put, as I might say, in question. You are going to see how, strangely, people claim to refute it.

Here in effect is what is involved. Let us clearly observe that the wager is consistent from the following position, we cannot know either whether God is or what He is. The division then of the cases that result from a wager engaged on what? On a discourse that is attached to it, namely, a promise imputed to it, that of an infinity of infinitely happy lives thanks to the fact that I speak and I do not write. Here, even though I speak in French, you cannot know any more, I point out to you, than on the little bit of paper by Pascal which is in shorthand whether this infinity of lives is in the singular or in the plural. Nevertheless, it is clear, in everything that follows in Pascal's discourse that we ought to take it in the sense of a plural multiplication, since moreover he begins to argue that it would be worthwhile to bet simply in order to have a second life, indeed a third and so on. What is at stake then is indeed a numerical infinity.

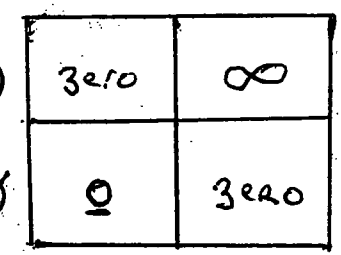
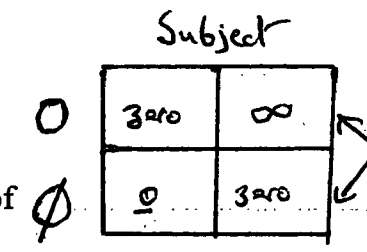
Here then is what is engaged, something, as has been said that we have at our disposition for the game, namely, a bet. Let us picture this bet. It is legitimate from the moment that we ourselves have been able to advance in order to grasp what indeed is at stake in the question, namely, this enigmatic surplus that makes us all be in the field of any discourse whatsoever, namely, the o. It is the stake; what we are going to have to justify is why we write it here in this little box. It is the stake and on the other hand, the infinity of infinitely happy lives. What are we dealing with? Ought we to imagine it as this support for the burgeoning of whole numbers, for the burgeoning that is always moreover behind the o-objects by a term. It is a question that is worthwhile evoking here if, as you see, it did not already involve some difficulties. But undoubtedly what was involved was the increasing series.



The infinity at stake is the one that Pascal illustrates by representing it by a sign analogous to the one here, the infinity of whole numbers, since it is only in relation to it that the starting element becomes ineffective, I mean neutral. It is under this heading that it becomes zero because it is (113) identified to the addition of zero to infinity, the result of the addition only being able to be represented by the sign that designates one of the two terms. Here then is how things are imaged and if I made this matrix it is not because it appears adequate to me but because it is the ordinary one that people use. Namely, that people remark that according to whether there exists or not what we image here in a legitimate fashion by o, since it is the field of a discourse depending on whether this o is to be admitted or to be rejected. You are going to see there being represented in each of these boxes which here have no more importance than the matrices by which a combinatorial is pinpointed in games' theory.



If this o is to be immediately retained, we have zero as the equivalent of this o, which represents nothing other than a risky stake that in games'

theory must be considered as lost. If we want to articulate in a wager what is involved in Pascal's wager it is not at all a sacrifice. It is the very law of the game that there must be a zero possible, if the promise - just as there is not acceptable anything that is situated beyond death - is no longer tenable, and we ourselves, we have here a zero, but this means nothing, except that here also the bet on the other side is lost.

In fact, in Pascal's wager the stake is identical to the promise. It is because this promise is stated that we can construct this matrix and once it is constructed it is absolutely clear that the asymmetry of the stakes requires that effectively, if the conduct of the subject is only defined by what is determined from a signifying pinpointing, there is no question. The difficulty only begins when we see that the subject is not at all something that we can frame, any more than, earlier, from the relationship of 1 to 1, from the conjunction of any number of signifiers, but from the falling effect that results from this conjunction. And that gives to our o here written in the lower left hand box a liaison that is in no way separable from the construction of the matrix itself. It is very precisely what is at stake in the progress that is generated from psychoanalysis. It is this liaison that must be studied in its consequences that precisely creates the divided subject, namely, not linked to the simple establishment of this matrix. Because henceforth it appears obviously quite clear that the zeros in the matrix are themselves only a fiction because of the fact that you can lay out a matrix, in other words, write it. Because the zero written at the bottom is the starting zero, well marked by Peano's axiomatisation as (114) necessary for infinity to be produced from the series of natural numbers. Without infinity, there is no zero to be taken into account because the zero was there essentially to produce it.

It is also indeed from such a fiction as I reminded you earlier, that the o is reduced to zero when Pascal makes his argument. Besides, all you are doing is losing zero given that the pleasures of life, this is how he expresses himself, do not amount to much and especially with respect to the infinity that is opened out to you. This is very precisely to use a mathematical liaison, the one that states in effect that no unit, whatever it may be, added to infinity will do anything more than leave intact the sign of infinity. Except that, nevertheless, as I showed you on several occasions that we can absolutely not say that we do not know whether infinity, as Pascal argues to make it opaque in a way homologous to the Divine Being, that we cannot rigorously say, that it is ruled out that you can say that the addition of a unit will not ensure that we cannot say whether it is odd or even. Since, as you have seen in the decreasing series, all the even operations will be piled up on one another and all the odd operations on the other, to totalise the infinite sum which nevertheless remains reducible to a 1 of a certain type, the 1 that enters into connection with the o.

You sense here that I am only indicating in passing all sorts of points illuminated by the progress of mathematical theory that in a way, make the veil move. What is under this veil is very precisely what is really involved in the articulation of this discourse whatever it may be, including that of the aforesaid promise. The fact is that in neglecting what it hides, namely, its falling effect at the level of enjoyment you fail to recognise the true nature of the o-object. Now, what our practice, which is a practice of discourse and nothing else, shows us, is that it is necessary to divide up differently what is involved in the stake if we want to give it its true sense. Pascal himself indicates to us, this is what confuses it in minds, it must be (115) said, that seem to be singularly little prepared by a professorial function to master what is at stake, when what is at stake is a discourse, you are engaged, he tells us, what is less engaging than such a matrix?

You are engaged, what does that mean if not to play on words, it is the moment of the entry of the "I" into the question. What is engaged is the "I". If there is a possibility in the game of engaging anything whatsoever to be lost, it is because the loss is already there, this indeed is why you cannot cancel the game. Now what we learn from psychoanalysis, is that there are effects that are masked by the pure and simple reduction of the "I" to what is stated. And how can we, for even an instant, when it is a matter of a game imaged by Pascal's pen, neglect the function of grace, namely, that of the desire of the Other. You must not believe that it may also have come into Pascal's mind that even to understand his so ridiculously imaged wager grace was necessary. As I told you, in every naive imaging of the relationship of the subject to demand, there is in short a latent "Thy will be done". This indeed is what is put in question when this will, which is precisely not ours, is lacking. In other words, let us not delay any longer and let us pass on to this God who is indeed the one, the only possible one in question, from Pascal's pen. The fact of giving him the same letters will change nothing about the difference, we are already going to see it being sufficiently articulated in the distribution on the table by which we are indeed going to see that this distribution is no different from itself.

Let us say things crudely: God exists. For the subject supposed to know it, we will then write the couple zero$_{\infty}$, in one of the squares of the matrix. I am supposed to know it but something has to be added, that I am for it. And if I am against it, all the while supposing the knowledge that God exists, in that case the choice is between the 0, and this indeed is what is involved throughout the whole thread of the thinking that Pascal states, I deliberately lose the infinity of infinitely happy lives.

And then, I am supposed to know that God does not exist, well then, why not think that I can all the same engage the 0, lose it, quite simply. It is all the more possible because it is its nature to be a loss. Because to measure what is involved in a game where here I keep it at a certain price, the price of less than the infinite, it can be legitimate to ask if it is worth the trouble, to give oneself so much difficulty to keep it. If there are some people who keep it at the cost of the loss minus infinity you must picture to yourselves that there were many people who threw out the o without having any concern about the immortality of the soul. These in general are what are called wise men, the granddads, not simply fathers, granddads. This has a lot to do with the father as you are going to see.

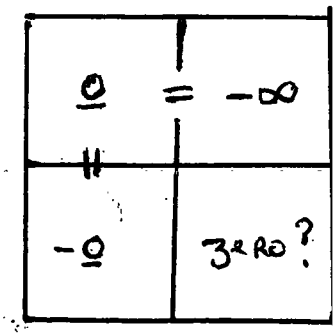
Here, you have those on the contrary who keep the o and let nothing (116) disturb their sleep. As regards the next zero, what is striking in this distribution, is the consistency that comes from the subject supposed to know but is it not a consistency made up however little of indifference.

He is, I am wagering for, but I do not know very well what He is. He is not, naturally I wager against, but it is not a wager, all of this has nothing to do with a wager. On the diagonal, you have people who are so certain that there is no wager at all, they go with the wind of what they know, but what does to know mean in these conditions? It means so little that even those who know nothing can form a unique box of it. Namely, that whatever it may be – and you will allow me to remark in passing that I am not extrapolating at all on what is in this respect Freud's tradition, namely, that I am not going beyond my borders – if you consult the volume that I recalled earlier, you will see that all the time Freud makes this calm remark that when all is said and done, everything involved in the belief of a Christian does not lead him to change his behaviour all that much as compared to those who are not so. It is in the position, as I might say, of a purified subject that what happens on the left-hand diagonal can be organised in the little matrix on top. But what is important, what undoubtedly shows us something unexpected is the one who wagers against, on the foundation of what he knows to be and the one who wagers for, just as if what he knows very well not to be, was.



You must think that here this becomes very interesting, namely, that this minus infinity that you see appearing in the top right hand box, this is expressed in the little writings of Pascal by the name of hell. Only this presupposes that there should be examined why the function of the o culminated in this most questionable idea that there is a beyond of death. No doubt because of its indefinite, mathematical slippage, in any kind of signifying chain wherever you pursue the final circumscribing, it always subsists intact as I already articulated at the beginning of the year in a certain schema of the relationships of S and O. But then this may induce us to ask ourselves what is meant by the emergence under the form of minus infinity of something on this table. Is this minus not to be expressed in a way more homologous to its arithmetical function, namely, that when it appears, the series of whole numbers is duplicated which means is divided. There is here the sign of this something that appeared to me the only thing worth recalling at the end of my last discourse. It is that by taking as an o-object and not otherwise what is brought into play (117) in the renunciation proposed by Pascal there is just as much infinity where there is a limit as where it does not encounter this operation of o. In any case, it is a half infinity that we engage with which singularly balances out the chances in the first matrix.

Only it may well be that we should remember differently what is represented in this myth which, even though it forms part of dogma does nothing, as Pascal reminds us, but bear witness that the mercy of God is greater than his justice since he plucks out some chosen ones, while they ought all to be in hell. This proposition may appear scandalous. I am astonished at it since it is quite clear and manifest that we have never been able to imagine this hell beyond what happens to us every day. I mean that we are already in it, that this necessity that surrounds us of not being able, except at a horizon whose limits need to be questioned, to realise the solid o, except by an indefinite repeated measure of what is involved in the cut of o. Is this not enough, just by itself, to make the most courageous lose heart? Only there you are. There is no choice. Our desire is the desire of the Other, and depending on whether grace has been lacking to us or not, what is played out at the level of the Other, namely, of everything that has preceded us in this discourse that has determined

our very conception, we are determined or not to the course of stopping up the o-object.

So then there remains the fourth box, the lower one. It is not for nothing that I allowed myself today to smile about them. They are just as numerous, just as divided up as those who are in the field of the top right. I call them, provisionally, the granddads. You would be wrong nevertheless to minimise the with which they get around, but all the same what I would like to point to you is that, in any case, it is here that we in analysis, have placed the proper norm. Surplus enjoying is explicitly modulated as foreign to the question. If the question at stake in what analysis promises us as a return to the norm, how can we not see that this norm is well and truly articulated there as the law, the law on which the Oedipus complex is grounded. And it is quite clear that whatever end one takes this myth from that enjoyment is absolutely distinguished from the law. To enjoy the mother is forbidden, we are told, and this does not go far enough. What has consequences is the fact that to enjoy the mother is forbidden. Nothing is organised except from this first statement. This can be clearly seen in the fable in which the subject, Oedipus, never thought – God knows because of what distraction, I mean because of everything that was developed around him in terms of charm and probably also of harassment by Jocasta – the idea never came to him, even when proofs were flooding in. What is forbidden is to enjoy the mother and this is confirmed in the formulation in another form. It is indispensable to bring all of them together in order to grasp what Freud is articulating, that of Totem and Taboo. The murder of the father blinds all these imbecilic young bulls that I see circling around me from time to time in ridiculous arenas. The murder of the father means precisely that you cannot kill him. He has been dead for all time. It is indeed for this reason that something sensible is attached, even in places where it is paradoxical to see there being belled: God is dead. It is because obviously, by not thinking about it, you run the risk of missing one aspect of things.

At the start the father is dead. Only there you are. There remains the Name of the Father and everything turns around that. If that was the way I began the last time it is also with that that I am ending. The virtue of the Name of the Father, is not something I am inventing, I mean that it is not something I made up; it is written in Freud. The difference, he says somewhere, between the field of man and that let us say of animality, consists, wherever it may be, even when this only happens in a masked form, namely, when it is said that there are some people who have no idea of what is the role of the male in generation, why not? What it demonstrates, I mean the importance of this function of the Name of the Father, is that even the very people who have no idea of it invent spirits to fill it. In a word, what is characteristic is that Freud in a very precise place articulates it – I am not going to waste my time telling you on what page and what edition because now there are places where Freudian readings are done and there are all the same competent people to indicate it to those that are interested in it – the essence, in a word, and the function of the father as Name, as pivot of discourse, depends precisely on the fact that after all, you can never know who the father is. You can always look, it is a question of faith. With the progress of science, you manage to get to know in certain cases who he is not, but in any case he remains all the same an unknown. It is altogether certain that this introduction moreover of biological research into paternity cannot be without an impact on the function of the Name of the Father.

Therefore, it is here, at the point where it is precisely only by maintaining oneself in the symbolic, that there is the pivot around which turns a whole field of subjectivity. We have to take the other aspect of what is involved in the relationship to enjoyment and, in a word, to be able to advance, which is our object this year, a little further into what is involved in the transmission of the Name of the Father. Namely, what is involved in the transmission of castration. I will end today, as usual, at the point that one gets to one way or another and I will see you the next time.

I am going to restart from where I left you the last time. I said a lot of things the last time, and in particular I succeeded in touching some people by the mathematical evidence that I believe I succeeded in giving of the genesis of what is involved in o, through the simple virtue of the One qua mark. This depends on this factum, this fabrication that results from the simplest use of this One in so far as it multiplies once it is repeated, since it is only posited in order to attempt the repetition of, to rediscover enjoyment in so far as it has already fled. The first One, by rediscovering what was not marked at the origin, already alters it, since at the origin it was not marked. It is already posited then by grounding a difference that it does not constitute as such but in so far as it produces it. This is this original point that makes of repetition the key of a process about which the question is posed, once it has been opened up, of whether or not it can find its term.

You see that we are immediately brought to the question that is only terminal when applied to a single career, that of Freud, in so far as subject on the one hand, he was also a man of action, let us say a man who inaugurated a path. How did he inaugurate it? This is something that is worthwhile recalling perhaps at a detour in what I will say to you today. But every man's career is committed to something that has death as its limit, and it is only from this point of view that we can find the term of the path traced by Freud in the question that he poses, of the end of analysis, terminable or interminable. This only marks the phase of the question that I am opening up in saying: is what is engaged for the subject by the fact of repetition as origin, itself a process that has its limit or not? This is what I left open, in abeyance, but nevertheless advanced, by showing on the board the last time in the clearest possible fashion what I was able to express as the division, the bi-partition of two infinities, marking that this is what is fundamentally in question in Pascal's wager. The infinity on which it is based is the infinity of number. Now, by taking this infinity, as I might say, by further accelerating by setting up the Fibonacci series, which it is easy to show is exponential, that the numbers that it generates grow not arithmetically but geometrically. This is the very thing that generates, and precisely in the measure that we are more distant from its origin, the proportion articulated in o. In the measure that these numbers grow, o intervenes there under its inverted form in a more circumscribed and constant fashion. This is all the more striking in that it ties the 1 to o, that it is 1/o, that this proportion of one number to another ends up in the more and more rigorous constant of this 1/o, in the measure that the numbers increase.

I also wrote, taking it at its origin, the series that results from taking things in the other sense. There, because of the fact that o is less than 1, you see the process ends up not simply in a proportion but in a limit. Whatever you add of what is produced, inversely, by proceeding through subtraction, in such a way that it is always true that, in this chain, by taking things in an ascending way, each term is the sum of the two preceding ones, you will find again the function of o in so far as this time it reaches a limit. That in whatever numbers you add these terms, you will not go beyond 1 + o, which seems to indicate that by taking things in this direction, what repetition generates has a term.

This is where there intervenes the well known table in which those, in short, who miss what is involved in Pascal's wager, write what is involved in terms of games' theory. Namely, in a matrix that is constructed from distinct boxes, formulate what is involved, if God exists, and write as zero what results from the observation of these commandments, confused here with the renunciation of something. Whether we call it pleasure or something else, it nevertheless remains that here, in appreciating it by a spontaneity whose astonishing aspect we will see, that they write what is left in this life for believers as zero. As a result of which a future life is marked by the term infinity, an infinity of lives promised to be infinitely happy. In other words, by supposing that God does not exist, the subject, which we write as o, is presumed to be still caught up in the game, make no mistake, literally to know the limited and moreover problematic happiness that is offered him in this life. It is not groundless to choose this if, since God does not exist, it seems clear that there is nothing to expect from the other life.

What I am pointing out here is the fragile character of this sort of writing, inasmuch as by following games' theory, the conjunctures can only be determined from the intersection of the play of two adversaries. Namely, that the subject ought to be in this position, while the enigmatic Other, the one involved in short as to whether he holds the wager or not, ought to find himself in that place, God exists or does not exist.

But God is not involved. In any case, nothing allows us to affirm it. It is from this fact that it paradoxically results that face to face with him, on the table, as I might say, there is not man but the subject defined by this wager. The stake is confused with the existence of the partner, and that is why the signs written on this table have to be reinterpreted. The choice is made at the level of God exists or God does not exist. The formulation of the wager starts from that. And starting from there, only from there, it is clear that if there is no reason to hesitate, namely, that what you may win by wagering that God exists is not comparable to what you can certainly win, even though this certainty can easily be questioned. Because what will you win? o is precisely not defined.

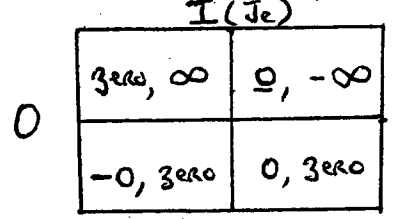
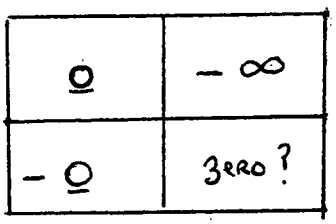
It is here that I open the question - not at the level of a formula that has nevertheless the interest of taking at its source the question of the intervention of the signifier, of what is involved in any act of choice whatsoever. This is where I pointed out the inadequacy of a table that is incomplete because it does not highlight that in taking things at the second stage, the one, perhaps, that restores the correct position of what the matrix involves as it is used in games' theory, is where there should be placed what I distinguish from the subject, the subject that is purely identical to the inscription of the stakes as well as the one that can envisage the case where even if God exists, he wagers against, namely, chooses o to his cost. Namely, knowing what this choice involves, that he positively loses the infinite, the infinity of happy lives that is offered him, so that there is reproduced in the two boxes that are marked here what first of all occupied the first matrix, there still remains this fourth to be filled. Namely, that it can be supposed that, even if God does not exist, the o as holding the (122) place that you see it occupying in the first box can be abandoned, this time in an explicit way. And because of this fact it appears in the negative, the subtraction of o with what we are writing here without any further commentary. And you see that even though it appears to be self-evident as zero, in effect it still constitutes a problem



In effect, let us now extract in order to isolate it simply in a new matrix something added on by our second composition, namely, o,-∞, - o, zero. To be honest, I explicitly mark what I have just indicated in passing in this very discourse, that this zero takes on the value of a question.



In effect, if the zeros were able to be thus posited in the first matrix, this is something that deserves to hold our attention, because what did I say earlier if not that in truth

the only thing that counts in this position of the gambler, of the subject who alone exists, the only thing to be taken into account is the infinite and the finite o. What do these zeros designate if not that by putting some stake on the table, as Pascal underlined in introducing the theory of gaming, nothing correct can be stated about a game unless you start from this, unless by having a beginning and an end fixed in the rule. What is put on the table, what is called the bet, is lost from the start. The game only exists starting from the fact that it is on the table, as one might say, in a common mass. What the game is is implied and therefore from its constitution the game can here only produce zero. This zero only indicates that you are playing; without this zero, there is no game. Assuredly you could say the same thing about the other zero, namely, this one, that it represents the loss to which the other player resigns himself by bringing this infinity into play. But since precisely what is at stake is the existence of the other player, it is here, in the first matrix, that the zero qua sign of the loss becomes problematic.

(123) After all, since nothing forces us to precipitate any movement, because it is precisely in these precipitations that errors are produced, we can indeed abstain from justifying this zero in a way that is symmetrical to what is involved in the other. Because we have something that appears sufficiently in the discussion that the philosophers have had about Pascal's montage. Namely, that it appears in effect that the zero represents not the constitutive loss of the bet but, at least in the dialogue between Pascal and Méré which is not unimportant for the way Pascal writes and at the same time leads us astray – it is never, of course, without our collaboration – about the interest of the montage itself. Namely, that what dominates, is in effect that this zero can be the inscription of one of the choices that are offered which is not to sit down at this table. This is what is done by the person who, in this not simply ideal but effective dialogue, the one to whom there is addressed this schema of the wager. The zero does not mean the constitutive loss of the bet, but inscribes on the table the "no bet", namely, the one who does not sit down at the gaming table.

It is starting from there that we have to question what is produced in the second matrix to see how, in it, there can be divided up what is involved in the game. In effect, I already indicated the last time the representations that can be given in the text of our practice. In truth, I was able to indicate it as rapidly as I did because already a certain graph of it had been constructed with what I recalled earlier at the beginning of my articulation. Namely, not the hypothesis, but what can be inscribed and hence the tangible. This means that o itself may well be only the effect of the entry of the life of man into the game. Pascal warns us about it in these terms no doubt not explicitly formulated, I mean in the very one that I am going to state: "You are engaged", he tells us, and it is true. It does not seem necessary to him, because he grounds himself on the word, on the word that for him of course is that of the Church. It is curious that he does not distinguish from it what – this is the blind point of centuries that were not for all that obscurantist – nevertheless provides him with a lot. It is assuredly because of the uneliminatable character of Holy Scripture throughout centuries of thought, that the most radical writing that, for us, appears in it in filigree is not really distinguished. But if I go looking for the weave of this writing in mathematical logic, this leaves my position homologous to his, except that, for us, we can no longer avoid (124) posing the question whether the stake itself is not as such essentially dependent on this function of writing. Let us observe yet another difference, the one that I put as an exergue in the first phase of my statements this year and which can be expressed, since it is not the exact formula, as simply: what I prefer, is a discourse without words, which means nothing other than this discourse that writing supports.

Here a little time to measure the import, the line, the absolutely solidary character of what I am stating at this point this year, with everything that I began to announce under the triad of the Symbolic, the Imaginary and the Real. Note carefully, and this is something that should be insisted on, the difference between philosophical discourse, whatever it may be, and what we are introduced to by this nothing other that is distinguished by starting from repetition.

Philosophical discourse, whatever it may be, always ends up by detaching itself from what it nevertheless brandishes as a system in the material of language. The whole philosophical tradition comes up against the refutation by Kant of the ontological argument; in the name of what? Of the fact that the forms of pure reason, the transcendental analytic, fall under the influence of an imaginary suspicion, and this moreover is what constitutes the single objection, it is philosophical, to Pascal's wager. "This God whose existence you may conceive to be necessary, says Kant, it nevertheless remains that you only conceive of him in the framework of a thinking that is only based on the prior suspense from which there comes the aesthetic" qualified on this occasion as transcendental. This means nothing other than: you cannot state anything, state anything in words, except in the time and in the space whose existence, by philosophical convention, we put in suspense in so far as it is supposed to be radical.

Only there is a problem, and this is what gives Pascal's wager its interest. That is why I will permit myself, whatever people may think about having recourse to outworn ideas, to find in it an exemplary turning point. The fact is that in no case is the God of Pascal to be put in question on the imaginary plane because it is not the God of philosophers; it is not even the God of any knowledge. We do not know, writes Pascal, either what he is, of course, or even if he is. This indeed is why there is no way of leaving Him in abeyance by means of any philosophy, because it is not philosophy that grounds him.

Now what is at stake and what my discourse in particular means, when I take up again that of Freud, is very precisely that in grounding myself on what this discourse has opened up, it is essentially distinguished from philosophical discourse, in the fact that it is not detached from what we are caught up and engaged in, as Pascal says. But that, rather than making use of a discourse, when all is said and done, to fix its law to the world, its norms to history or inversely, it puts itself at this place where first of all (125) the thinking subject perceives that he can only recognise himself as an effect of language. In other words that before being thinking, to go quickly, to pinpoint in the shortest possible way what I am in the process of saying, once you set up the gaming table, and God knows if it has already been set up, he is first of all o. And it is afterwards that the question is posed of harmonising with it the fact that he thinks. But he did not need to think to be fixed as o. It is already done, contrary to what can be imagined, precisely because of the lamentable shirking, of the more and more striking futility of all philosophy, namely, that you can upset the gaming table. I can upset this one, of course, and blow up the tables at Vincennes and elsewhere, but that does not prevent the real table, the gaming table from being still there. It is not the university table that is at stake! The table around which the boss is reunited, whether with the pupils in a pretty little interior, when this interior is his own, nice and warm and grandfatherly, or the one in which it is framed in model nurseries!

This precisely is where the question is. That is why I allowed myself, in a scribbling that I do not know whether you will see appearing or not – it is not at all a scribbling, I spent a lot of time on it the day before yesterday – anyway I do not know whether you will see it appearing, because it will appear in only one place or it will not appear at all, and I am interested in whether it will appear or not appear! In short I went as far as this delusional exorbitance – because for some time I have been deluding in my own heart, these things always come out one day, in one form or another – I would like it to be noticed, this is my delusion or not, that it is no longer possible to play the role that is necessary for the transmission of knowledge if it does not involve the transmission of value, even though now this is inscribed in the registers of credits (unité de valeur), but to grasp what can be called a formation effect. This is why, in any case, whoever in the future, precisely because something has happened to this value of knowledge, wants to occupy a place that contributes in any way to this place of formation, even if it is mathematics, biochemistry or anything else whatsoever, would do well to be a psychoanalyst, if this is how there must be defined someone for whom there exists this question of the dependence of the subject with respect to the discourse that holds him, and not that he holds.

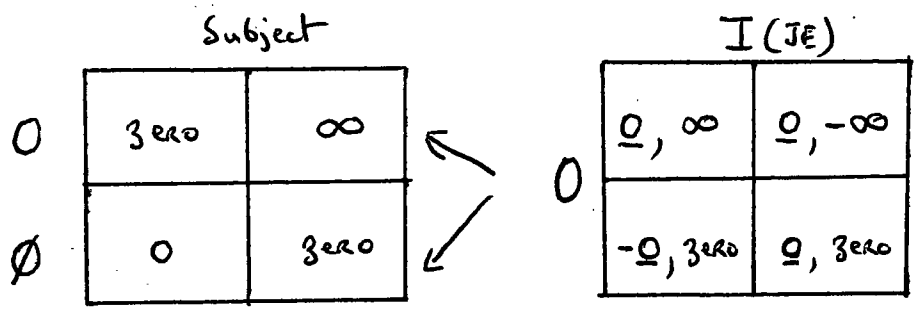
So then it is worth saying, since you see that I have just avoided something because of the fact that you are all products of the school, namely, of philosophical teaching. I know that I cannot tackle in too abrupt a fashion what is involved in terms of the change that is written in the second matrix, namely, pose the question of what is meant by the fact that here it is not o or zero because it has never been o or zero as I have just indicated it to you and as Pascal says. But since it is only ever philosophers that have read him, everyone has remained deaf. He said o is zero, which means that (126) o is the bet. It was nevertheless clearly specified in games' theory. No, that changed nothing, they remained deaf! And zero is zero with respect to infinity. Rubbish! What is changed by the fact that there is now not, as has been vainly said, in an imaginary fashion o or zero, but o or -o. And if -o effectively means what it seems to say, namely, that it is inverted, what can this thing be? And then also that in one case, whatever happens, even if it is at the cost of something that to be inscribed, appears to need to be costly, what again is this correlation, this equivalence that perhaps allows us to put elsewhere, to perceive that our connecting signs are upset. In any case here are two links that appear to me to be worth questioning. You see that they are not classified quite like the earlier ones.



Here, I regret not being further on than what I already, but too quickly, articulated in the last minutes of the last time. Namely, that I recalled that to start from the figure that is indicated here in Pascal's scribbling, the first link, this horizontal line from small o to -∞, we say, is hell. I shouted it out to people who were already making for the exit. But, on the whole, I pointed out to you that hell is something we know. It is everyday life. A curious thing, people know it, people say it, people say nothing but that. But it is limited to discourse and to some symptoms of course. Thank God,

if there were no symptoms, it would not be noticed! If neurotic symptoms did not exist, there would not have been Freud! If the hysterics had not already opened up the question, there is no chance that even the truth would have show the tip of its ear!

So then here, we must make a short halt. Someone that I thank – because you should always thank people through whom presents arrive – reminded me for external reasons about the existence of the chapter of Bergler called "The underestimated superego", it is in the famous Basic neurosis that explains everything. You are not going to tell me that I explain everything. I explain nothing, precisely. This is even what interests you! I try at different levels, not simply here, to ensure that there are (127) psychoanalysts who are not imbeciles. My operation is an advertising operation, not to draw people into the hole of a school, but to try to give the equivalent of what psychoanalysts ought to have to people who have no means of getting it. It is a despairing enterprise. But experience proved that the other also, that of teaching it to psychoanalysts themselves, seems destined to fail, as I already wrote. Imbeciles, I mean as subjects, because as regards getting on in their practice, they are pretty smart! And it is precisely a consequence of what I am in the process of stating here. It is in conformity with the theory. This is what proves not alone that there is no need to be a philosopher but that it is much better not to be one. Only that has a consequence, which is that one understands nothing. Hence what I also spend my time stating, that it is much better not to understand. Only the problem is that they understand all kinds of little things, so it is swarming. For example "The underestimated superego" is a brilliant chapter, first of all because it collects together all the ways in which the superego has been articulated in Freud. Since he is not a philosopher, he absolutely does not see that they all hang together. Moreover he is charming, and he admits it. That is what is good about psychoanalysts, they admit everything! He admits that he has written to a gentleman, it is in a note, Mr H H Heart, who was making extracts from Freud. So then he wrote to him: "Send me some quotations about the superego". After all that can be done; it is moreover also in conformity with the theory; you can take things like that, with a pair of scissors, if writing is so important, everywhere there is superego, snip, snip, you cut it out! You make a list of fifteen quotations. And I must say that here I am being humorous. But he is reaching out to help me. Because of course Bergler has read Freud, anyway I like to imagine it! But all the same he admits that in order to write this chapter, he wrote to H H Heart to give him quotations about the superego. The result is that he can obviously clearly mark, exactly at the same level that all the existing psychoanalytic reviews are at, except mine, of course, the degree to which it is incoherent. It begins with the censor at the level of dreams; people believe that the censor is an innocent, as if it were nothing precisely to have the pair of scissors with which one subsequently constructs the theory. And after all, this becomes something that titillates you. And then afterwards it becomes a big bad wolf. And then after that, there is nothing more. And after that, Eros is evoked, Thanatos and the whole caboodle! Thanatos is going to have to find its place there. And then, I make arrangements with this superego; I bow and scrape to it. Ah! Dear little superego!

Good. Thanks to this presentation, of course, you get something it must be said that is rather laughable. You really have to be in our epoch for no one to laugh. No one laughs. Even a professor of philosophy. It must be said that they have got to a point, (128) in our generation! Even a professor of philosophy can read this stuff without laughing. They have been checkmated! There was all the same a time when there were people who were not especially intelligent, a chap called Charles Blondel, who shouted and roared about Freud. At least it was something. Nowadays even the people least in a position to imagine what is involved in a psychoanalysis read these absolutely astounding things without complaint. No. Everything is possible, everything is accepted. We are – moreover things are showing their lineaments elsewhere than in the real before descending into it – really in a regime of intellectual segregation.

Well then, this chap has noticed a whole lot of things. When something is there, under his nose, he understands it. And I would say that this is what is sad because he understands it at the level of his nose, which cannot of course be absolutely like that; it is necessarily pointy. But he sees a tiny little thing. He notices that what is explained to him, like that, in the quotations from Freud, as being the superego, he notices, that this ought to have a relationship with what he sees all the time. So then he begins by noticing, but like that in an intuitive way, at the level of sensation, that what is called Durcharbeitung, l'élaboration as it is translated in French – people spend their time noticing that it is untranslatable. Durcharbeitung, is not élaboration, we can do nothing about it; since there is not in French a word to say "work through", drilling, it is translated as élaboration; everyone knows that in France, people elaborate; it is something like smoke.

Analytic elaboration is not at all like that. People on the couch see that it consists in coming back the whole time to the same thing. At every turn one is brought back to the same thing. And it is necessary for that to last in order to get precisely to what I have explained to you, to the limit, to the end, naturally when one is going in the right direction, when one encounters a limit. He says "That's an effect of the superego". Namely, he notices that this kind of big wicked thing that nevertheless is supposedly extracted from the Oedipus complex, or again from the devouring mother, or from anyone of these see-saws. He notices that this has a relationship with this exhausting, boring, necessary, especially repeated aspect by which one arrives at something that, in effect, sometimes, has an end. How does he not see that this has nothing in common with this kind of picture of a scenario where the superego is, as people say, an agency, which would be nothing, but where people make it live like a person. Because, people have not well understood what an agency is, we attach the idea to the superego.

All of this must happen not on the other stage, the one that Freud spoke about, the one that functions in dreams, but in a kind of little play, where what is called analytic (129) teaching makes you play with puppets. The superego is the police superintendent and he hits the Guignol, which is the ego, on the head. Why, by simply seeing this rapprochement that he senses so well from the clinical point of view, with elaboration, Durcharbeitung, does this not suggest to him that the superego may well be found in something that would not require, like that, the multiplication of agencies in the personality. And then at every instant he lets it slip, he admits it, namely, that people have clearly mapped out, he says, that this has a relation with the ego ideal. But it must be admitted that absolutely nothing is known about it; no one has yet put things together.

All the same, in order that these discourses should be something other than memoirs of the psychoanalyst, namely, evoking the case of a young woman who, in this connection, one sees clearly that it was a guilt feeling that made her come into psychoanalysis. Let us hope that it was the same thing that made her get out of it! You can perhaps all the same note that, for example, this kind of little manoeuvre of a measure that is precisely the measure of what cannot be measured because it is the starting bet. This can in effect in some cases be represented with the greatest precision and be written on the board. It is in the manner of a certain way of regularly balancing that one manages to fill up this something that can in certain cases be represented as the One. You can all the same see that there is some interest in articulating in a way that is really precise something that allows it to be conceived that it is not at all in effect an abuse of terms to bring together, even in the name of a minimal intuition like that, the élaboration, the Durcharbeitung in the treatment, with the superego.

So then you have to choose. You cannot tell us that the superego is the big bad wolf and rack your brain to see whether it is not in the identification that I have with some person that this severe superego is born. That is not how questions should be put. It is like the people who tell you that if so-and-so is religious, it is because his grandfather was. That is not enough for me, because even if you had a religious grandfather you may also perhaps see that it is stupidity, is that not so?

It is necessary all the same to distinguish the direction of identification as compared to other things. It is necessary to know whether identification in analysis is the goal or is the obstacle. But this might well perhaps be the means by which one engages people precisely no doubt to do it, but by the same fact, it is abolished. And it is in the fact that it is abolished precisely because one has done it that they can appear something else that we can call the hole on this occasion.

I am going to leave you there today. I tried at the end of this discourse, to show you that it is a discourse that is of direct importance to bring some fresh air into our (130) practice. By that I mean that by using what were certainly not experiments in smell, it was not by following his nose that Freud advanced, one can in effect see in it, in the development of a function through his thinking, the framework that allows its consistency to be given. But it is indispensable if one wants to advance with something other than little stories, to assemble this coherence and to give it consistency and solidity. This would perhaps allow there to be seen quite different facts than simply analogical facts.

What I am saying does not take anything away from the importance of detail, precisely as Bergler insists. But read this chapter to see that even something that is relevant, well oriented, but oriented like particles of iron filings when you tap into a field already magnetised, contains no kind of true motivation for the power and the importance of detail. And why in effect it is only the details, it is quite true, that interest us. Again it is necessary to see in every case what is interesting. Because if one does not know it, one brings together disparate details in the name of pure and simple resemblance, while this is not what is important. We will take it up the next time at the level of the third figure.

(131) Very bored with everything that is happening, huh! You too I think. One cannot all the same not notice it, because I am in the process of asking myself whether I am here to do my usual thing or whether I am occupying the place! Anyway! Some benevolent ears were prepared to understand that some of the things that I put forward, specifically during my second last seminar, had some relationship with a science – who knows? With perhaps not a new science, but with a bringing up to date of what is involved for the conditions of science.

Today I sense, for all sorts of reasons, even if it is only because we are getting close to Mardi-Gras, so then it is appropriate, that I should gently change the direction of things. I sense it, like that, after balancing what I thought out this morning before seeing you. I am going to bend myself a little bit towards something that you can call whatever you want, but which is rather a moral note. How could one moreover escape it, in the aura, in the margin, in the limits of that through which I tackled something which is Pascal's wager. It is certain that we cannot fail to recognise this incidence, even though, of course, what inspired me to speak to you about it, is that Pascal's wager is at a certain joint, and this, all the same, I am going to recall,

But, like that, as a way of introducing things a little and of relaxing, however little, the atmosphere – I told you that we were getting close to Mardi-Gras – I am going to read you a letter that I received. I am not going to tell you who sent it to me, nor even from what town it came.

"Dear Mr Lacan. We are students and we have read almost all of your Ecrits. We find a lot of things in it. Obviously it is not always easy to approach but this all the same deserves our congratulations....." I don't get those every day! "We would really like to know how one sets about writing such difficult things..." I am not sending anyone up, and certainly not these chaps that I find really...anyway I will tell you what I think about it; there must have been two of them to write that! "...it would be useful to us in our examinations. We may well have a degree in philosophy, but it is getting more and more complicated to get through the selection. We think that it would be better to use trickery and astonish the teachers rather than persisting in a style of banal down-to-earth discourse". And they add "make no mistake. Could you point us to some little fiddles in this direction?" That strikes (132) me, because all I am saying is that, fundamentally, that is what I am in the process of doing! "On the other hand, we would like again to ask you something if it's not too daring: Do you think you could send us as a souvenir one of your lovely bow ties? We would really like that. Thanking you in advance, we say farewell, Mr Lacan, and please receive our most respectful homage." I am not going to leave that lying around because ...they are not really up to date. They do not know that I have been wearing a polo neck for some time!

For me, that gives an echo, confirmation, a resonance to something that moves me when I hear right minded people going on, like that, since the month of May: "Things are no long the way they were". I think that where we are at, it is more than ever like it was before. And after all, I am very far of course from limiting the phenomenon to this little report that this letter gives of what is a corner of the affair. Obviously there are many other things at stake.

Only what is striking, is that from a certain point of view, this letter in my eyes may very well sum up the way people have listened to me, but in a zone that is not at all as distant from me as this town which is all the same a good distance away. As you see, they are not very up to date! But in any case, it is an aspect of the way that teaching is received. And then I do not see why one would blame them for the bow tie. Because there is someone who played a pivotal role in a certain examining board, like that, that a certain British Society sent us a long time ago, who put that down as a point that was quite worthy of putting in the scales with the rest of my teaching. I mean that that was how it was, this was on one pan and on the other, my bow tie. Namely, with the help of this accessory the identification of those who presented themselves at that time as my pupils was supposed to be possible. So then you see that this is not limited to the level of these little dears, nice naive people. They are perhaps not so naïve as that because, as they told you, you have to be a little tricky. We will come back to it.

So then we will take things up where we had dismantled them a little, namely, in the table of the wager. On the left – the blue lines are made to show where the limits of each one of these schemas stop, so that they do not overlap one another, either really or in your minds – so then the one on the left is the one with which I believed I should complete the matrix in which, in imitation of what is practised in games theory, one could schematise what was effectively discussed throughout the whole of the nineteenth and even during a good part of the beginning of our century around Pascal's wager. Namely, the way of demonstrating how, in a way, Pascal was trying to swindle us.

I think that I have sufficiently made you sense that by reason of the (133) function of the zeros that do not really form part of the results of a wager that might be made against a partner, because it is precisely the existence of the partner that is in question and that it is what you have to wager on. In these conditions the two lines of possibility that are offered to the gambler do not intersect with any line of possibility that might belong to the Other, since one cannot even be sure of the existence of the Other. It is then at the same time on the existence or non-existence of the Other, on what promises his existence and what allows his inexistence, it is on this that the choice is brought to bear, and in this case it is plausible – I am saying, it is plausible, of course if one has a mathematical mind – to wager, and to wager in the sense that Pascal proposes.

Only, you will not forget that I introduced at this state of the affair, in order of course not to give rise to misunderstanding and the belief that here I am lending myself to something which would be the indication of the advantage of this solution, I effectively remarked the following. And in the very introduction to the reminder of the wager as it is presented, much less than it is through the grid of the discussions that have become classic, I pointed out that at this level one could substitute for the choice to be made on the subject of the existence of God, the remark that one would fulfil the function – which would completely change its sense – this remark that what is at stake, that what could be at stake, is this radical formulation which is that of the real, in so far as we can conceive of it and as moreover we sometimes put our finger on it, that it is not conceivable to imagine any other limit of knowledge than this stopping point at which one has only to deal with this, something unsayable and which either is or is not. In other words something that is related to heads or tails.

This was of course to put you in tune with what is involved in not losing the plot. Namely, that we are not amusing ourselves. We are in the process of trying to give articulations of such a kind that there can be played out for us the most important decisions that are to be taken. As it happens our times mark more and more that these most important decisions, in so far as they may be those of the psychoanalyst, may (134) also coincide with those required at a key point in the social body, namely, the administration of knowledge, for example.

But then, even though on this point it is well understood that I cleared the board, that I am not doing history and that I do not see why such a precise system, especially if we correctly conceive the joint at which it is situated, that Pascal's wager would have less resources for us than it had for its author. And we will indeed come back to this question of the situation, all the better because we are going to illuminate it now. It is therefore not, as you are going to see right away, doing history, to remind you, as I recalled the last time to remind you that in Pascal's time, Revelation existed. And I even stressed what was at stake with these two levels, the word of the Church, and then Sacred Scripture, and the function that Sacred Scripture played for Pascal. And it is obviously not to remind you that Newton also, who had other things on his mind, produced a big book – my hobby being bibliophilic, it happens that I have it, it is superb – which is a commentary on the Apocalypse and of Daniel's prophecy. He gave just as much care – I mean in the calculation, in the manipulation of numbers that are nevertheless extremely problematic as those that are at stake when it is a matter of situating the reign of Nebuchadnezzar for example – as in his study on the laws of gravity. This should be remembered then in the margin, but it does nothing for us.

What is at stake at this stage, is to remark that at the level that Pascal then proposes his wager to us, whatever may be the relevance of our remarks about what is involved in it in the final term, namely, that such a proposition can only be conceived of when the knowledge of science is born, it nevertheless remains that, for him, the wager reposes on what we can call the word of the Other, and the word of the Other naturally conceived of as truth.

So then, if I am taking things up again at this point, it is because some people are not unaware, and I am informing the others - it would moreover be easy if they had behaved like my charming correspondents, if they had read almost all my Ecrits - that they should know about the connected and disconnected function that I articulated in a dialectic, as distinguishing if not opposing knowledge and truth. It is the last article that I collected; its title is very precisely Science and Truth. And as regards what is involved about the truth, everyone also knows, that in another one of these articles called The Freudian Thing, I wrote something that could certainly be understood as follows: that its property is that it speaks. We are thus supposed to be, or rather I am, I am supposed to be on a certain axis that, why not, could than be described as obscurantist since it connects up with this. Namely, that I am supposed to be giving a leg up to what Pascal is instilling, in so far (135) as he tries to bring us back to the plane of religion. So then, obviously, the truth certainly speaks, you will tell me. But obviously it is what you would say if you have understood nothing about what I say – which is absolutely not to be ruled out! – because I never said that. I made the truth say: "Me the truth I speak". But I did not make it say: "Me the truth I speak, for example, to express myself as truth", nor "To tell you the truth". The fact that it speaks does not mean that it tells the truth. It is the truth. It speaks. As regards what it says, you are the ones who are going to have to sort yourselves out with that. That could mean, this is what some people do: "Talk away, it's all you are able to do". If I may dare say so, I grant a little bit more to the truth. I have since even attributed to it the fact that it talks (cause), in effect, and not simply in the sense to which "talk away" (cause toujours)". It even causes, talks at full tilt. I mean that, in the same article, I recalled Lenin's word on the Marxist theory of society, which, he says: "Will triumph because it is true". But not necessarily because it tells the truth. That can be applied there also.

Naturally, I am not going to dwell too long on it. Because it is said that my name is quoted to advantage – I did not go looking for it, I must say, because I did not have the time – in l'Humanité, because supposedly I am supposed to have begun this year, like that, seeing the way the wind was blowing, by making a mediation between Freud and Marx. Thank God, since I had the flu last weekend, this gave me all of a sudden a stimulus for what is called work, namely, great agitation. I set about going through the terrifying quantity of paper that I must make sure to destroy before I die, because God knows what would be done with it otherwise! I notice that I spoke about Marx, of use value, of exchange value, of surplus value. I noticed, in a word, that my Italian translator, whom I pinpointed, when I made the leap, to draw this sort of analogy between surplus value and surplus enjoying, that my Italian translator, it happened that she was there two years ago, had no merit in telling me that, in short, this was surplus value. Because I already spoke so much about Marx in connection with a certain number of fundamental articulations around what is involved in psychoanalysis that I ask myself whether I contributed anything new except this name Mehrlust, surplus enjoying as an analogy for Mehrwert. All of this to indicate moreover that through these radical points, naturally they absolutely do not develop in the same field, but since we are evoking Lenin, it is not any worse then to recall that what is at stake in Marxist theory, in so far as it concerns the truth, is what it states in effect. The fact that the truth of capitalism is the proletariat. It is true. Only it is from that very thing that there emerges the series and the import of our remarks about what is involved in the function of the truth. It is that the revolutionary consequence of this truth, this truth from which Marxist theory starts, naturally it goes a little bit (136) further since what it constructs the theory of, is precisely capitalism, the revolutionary consequence is that the theory starts in effect from this truth, namely, that the proletariat, is the truth of capitalism.

The proletariat, what does that mean? It means that labour is radicalised to the pure and simple level of merchandise; which of course means that this reduces the worker himself to the same measure. Only once the worker, because of the theory, learns to know of himself as that, one can say that through this step, he finds the paths of a status – call that what you will – of a savant. He is no longer a proletarian, as I might say an sich, he is no longer pure and simple truth, he is für sich; he is what is called class consciousness. And he can even at the same time become the class-consciousness of the party in which people no longer speak the truth.

I am not satirising. I am only recalling that obvious things – that is why it is a relief – do not arise in any way from the scandal that is made of them, when people understand nothing about anything. Or that, if one has a correct theory of what is involved in knowledge and the truth, there is nothing easier to expect, that in particular it is hard to see why people should be astonished that it is from the most Leninistically defined relationship to the truth that there flows this whole Leninising in which the whole system is swamped! If you get it into your heads that there is nothing more soothing (lénifiant) than the hard men, you will be recalling, like that, a truth that has already been known for a long time. And then truly has that not always been known from all time? If people had not for some time, and I will tell you why, been so persuaded that Christianity is not the truth, people would have been able to recall all the same that for a certain time and not a short one, it was. And that what it proved is that around every truth that claims to speak as such, there prospers a clergy that is necessarily lying.

So then I ask myself why people are so high and mighty about the functioning of socialist governments! Will I go so far as to say that the pearl of the lie is the secretion of the truth? That would sanitise the atmosphere a little, an atmosphere moreover that only exists because of the fact that a certain type of cretinisation whose name I must give right away because at the end of what we have to say today, I will have to pin it again into one of these little squares. It is what is called a belief in progress (progressisme). I will try, of course, to give you a better definition than this reference to these effects of scandal, I mean producing scandalised souls. These things ought to have been ventilated a long time ago by a reading of Hegel, the law of the heart and the delusions of presumption. But in the way of all things that are a little rigorous, when they come out, of course, no one thinks of remembering them at the appropriate moment. That is why I put as an (137) exergue at the beginning of my discourse this year something that means that what I prefer, is a discourse without words.

So then what is at stake, what might here be in question if one wished, as they say, to lick the plate to the point that we can profit from it, putting our finger on it, is to notice that things do not have such bad effects as all that. Since, when I say that the service of the field of truth, the service as such – a service that is not asked of anyone, you have to have the vocation for it – necessarily leads to lies, I want also to point out the following, because one must be fair. This gives rise to enormous work. For my part I adore that, when it is the others, of course, who work! That is why I treat myself to the reading of a good number of ecclesiastical authors and I admire the patience and the erudition they must have had to cart around so many quotations that come at the right point for me or that are of some use to me. It is the same thing for the authors of the communist church. They are also excellent workers. I may well, like that, for some of them, in day to day life, not be able to tolerate them any more than personal contacts with priests. That does not prevent them from being capable of doing very good work and I enjoy myself when I read one of them on The hidden God, for example. This does not make the author any easier to associate with.

So then, in short, the fruit of what is involved, after all, all the same, for knowledge is not at all to be neglected. Because people are a little bit too concerned with the truth and they are so bogged down in it that they end up by lying. The only real question – because I said that here I would go to the limit – is not at all that this should have consequences. Because you see that after all it is a form of selection of elites, that is why they pick up also, in one field as in the other, so many mentally handicapped. There you are, that is the limit! That is the limit. But you must not believe that it is simply to amuse myself, by giving like that a little rap on the nose to groups of whom one does not know, after all, why they should be any more preserved than others from the presence of the mentally handicapped. It is because we analysts can perhaps on this point begin something that is precisely very important.

Here I refer you to the key that was quietly contributed by our dear Maud – Maud Mannoni for those who do not know who she is – the relationship of the mentally handicapped to the configuration that interests us, that for us analysts, is obviously burning precisely at the level of the truth. That is even why we are not able any more than the others to take precautions; even our lies, to which of course we are forced, are less impudent than the other – less impudent but more timid, it must be said. There are some all the same that, in this relationship, preserve some vivacity and precisely the works that I am evoking on the subject of what all of a sudden starts floating into (138) mental handicap with which, I must say that in my own regard, I got rather used to in the first phase of my experience. I was full of admiration at seeing the armfuls of flowers that I collected, flowers of truth when, inadvertently, I took into analysis what Freud, and how wrong he was, seems to have thought one should exclude from it, namely, a mentally handicapped person. There is no psychoanalysis, I must say, that goes better, if one means by that the joy of the psychoanalyst. It is perhaps not altogether uniquely what one might expect from a psychoanalysis, but in any case it is clear that, as regards what it conceals in terms of truths that precisely he brings out as pearls, unique pearls. Because here I only evoked this term in connection with lies, it must all the same be, that in the mentally handicapped person not everything is as handicapped as all that. And what if the mentally handicapped person were – you will understand better what I mean if you are able to refer to good authors, namely, to Maud Mannoni – a little trickster? This is an idea that came to some people. There is someone called Dostoyevsky who called one of his characters the Idiot, the one who conducted himself most marvellously, no matter what social field he was traversing and whatever embarrassing situation he found himself in.

I sometimes evoke Hegel, it is not a reason not to recast him. "The ruse of reason", Hegel tells us, I must say that this is something I have always been suspicious of. For my part, I have very frequently seen reason being screwed, but as for succeeding in one of its ruses, I must say that during my lifetime I have not seen it. Perhaps Hegel saw it. He lived in the little courts of Germany where there are many mentally handicapped and in truth, it was perhaps there that he found his sources. But as regards the ruse that may be in simple spirits, and it is not for nothing that someone who knew what he was saying baptised them as blessed, I am leaving the question open. And I am ending with this simple reminder very necessary and very healthy to recall in the context that we are living in.

What I would like to do now, is to take up at the level at which I left you the last time, namely, in the matrix that is isolated by the fact that it is no longer a matter of knowing what one is playing, a game where after all, all that Pascal's wager means, is that you cannot play this game in a correct fashion unless you are indifferent. Namely, that it is in the measure in which there is no doubt that the stake, infinite in so far as it is on the right, on the side of the existence of God, is a much more interesting stake than this kind of thing that I do not know what it is and that is represented as what? After all, in reading Pascal, this comes down to saying all the dishonesties that you will not do by following the commandments of God, and by following the commandments of the Church, some little supplementary inconveniences specifically in the relationships to the holy water font and some other accessories.

(139) It is a position of indifference, when all is said and done, with regard to what is involved. And this properly speaking all the more easily reaches the level of the wager as Pascal presents it in that after all, this God, he underlines it and it is worthwhile having it from his pen, this God, we do not know what he is nor if he is. It is in this sense that we can take Pascal. And it is here, namely, that there is an absolutely fabulous negation. Because, after all, in the preceding centuries, the ontological argument – I am not going to let myself be drawn into it but, to the eyes of all sensible spirits, and we would do well to follow its grain – had its whole weight. This amounted to nothing except to say what I am also in the process of teaching you, namely, that there is a hole in discourse, there is somewhere a place where we are not able to put the signifier that is necessary for all the rest to hold together. He thought that the signifier God could make things stick. In fact, it works at the level of something, about which after all it is a question of whether it is not a form of mental handicap, namely, philosophy. In general it is accepted, I mean among atheists, that the Supreme Being has a sense. Voltaire, who is generally thought to be pretty smart, held onto it mordicus. He had respect for Diderot, who had a clear advance, a good length over him as can be seen in what he wrote. It is also probably for that reason that almost everything that Diderot wrote that was really important only appeared posthumously, and then that as a total it is much less substantial than in the case of Voltaire. Diderot for his part had glimpsed that the question is that of the lack somewhere and very precisely in so far as naming it means putting a stopper into it, nothing more.

It nevertheless remains that in Pascal, we are at the point of the joint, at the point of the leap where someone dares to say what was there from all time. It is like earlier, it is more like before than ever, only there is

a moment when that is separated. It ought to be known that he says "the God of Abraham, of Isaac, and of Jacob", has nothing to do with "the God of the philosophers". In other words he is one who speaks, I would ask you to pay attention to it, but he has this originality that his name cannot be pronounced, so that it is in this way that the question is opened up.

That is why, a curious thing, that it is through a son of Israel, someone called Freud, that we find ourselves really seeing for the first time at the centre of the field, not simply of knowledge, but of what makes knowledge grab our guts and even, if you wish, our balls, that here there is properly speaking evoked the Name of the Father and the tralala of myths that he lugs about. Because if I had been able to do my year on the Name of the Father, I would also have told you the result of my statistical researches; it is extraordinary that even in the Fathers of the Church people speak so little about this business of the Father. I am not talking about the Hebrew tradition, where very obviously it is everywhere in filigree and also, of course, if it can be in (140) filigree, it is because it is very veiled. That is the reason why, in the first seminar, the one after which I closed shop that year, I had begun by speaking about the sacrifice of Isaac, noting that the sacrificer is Abraham. These are obviously things that there would be every interest in developing, but that by reason of the change of configuration, of context and even of audience, there is in effect very little chance that I will ever be able to come back to it.

Nevertheless, a tiny little remark because there are words that are very much à la mode. From time to time, I pose questions like that; does God believe in God, for example? I am going to ask you one. If at the last moment, God had not held back Abraham's arm, in other words if Abraham had been in too much of a hurry and had butchered Isaac, would it have been what is called a genocide or not? People are talking a lot at the moment about genocide and the fact of pinpointing the locus of a truth about what is involved in the function of genocide

especially concerning the origin of the Jewish people, I believe that this landmark deserves to be noted. In any case, what is certain, as I underlined in this first lecture, is that to the suspension of this genocide there corresponded the butchering of a certain ram that is quite clearly there as a totemic ancestor.

So then here we are at the second phase, the one that is brought out by taking what is involved when there is no longer indifference, namely, the initial act of what is involved in the game. What is in the game, Pascal settles. I have already lost it, or I am not playing at all. This is what is meant by each of the two zero's that are there in the central figure (page 3); they are only the indices of the bet on the one hand or the "no bet" on the other. Only, all of this only holds up if the bet, as Pascal says, is taken to be worth nothing. And in a certain way it is true. The o-object has no use value. It has no exchange value either as I already said. Only this, what was in question in the bet, once one has noticed the way it functions, and that is the reason that psychoanalysis is what has allowed us to take a step into the structure of desire, it is in so far as the o is what animates everything that is at stake in the relationship of man to the word. Precisely that a gambler, but a different gambler to the one that Pascal speaks about, namely, the very one that, because he sensed something all the same, Hegel understood, even though despite appearances his system is faulty. Namely, that there is no other game except risking everything for everything, that this is even what is called simply to act. He called that the fight to the death for pure prestige. This is precisely what psychoanalysis allows to be rectified. It is a matter of much more than life about which we do not after all know very much. We know so little about it that we do not hold onto it all that much, as can be seen every day provided you are a psychiatrist or simply are 20 years old. It is a matter of what (141) happens when something different, which has not been named and which is not any more so because I have called it o, is at stake. And this has meaning precisely only when it is brought into play with, on the opposite side, what is nothing other than the very idea of

measure, measure in its essence that has nothing to do with God but that is in a way the condition of thinking. Once I think about something, however I name it, it comes back to calling it the universe, namely, One.

Thanks be to God, thinking has had enough of swarming around inside this condition to notice that the One, does not happen just by itself. And what is at stake, is to know the relationship that this has with this "I". This is described by the fact that in the second table there is an o on the one hand, which is no longer the o abandoned to the destiny of the game, the bet, which is the o in so far as it is me who represents myself, that here I am playing against, and precisely against the closure of this universe that will be One if it wishes, but that I am an extra o.

This ineradicable God who has no other foundation when one looks closely at him, than being the faith in this universe of discourse which is certainly not nothing. Because if you imagine that I am in the process of doing philosophy, I am going to have to give you an apologue. It is necessary to put in the corners big figures to make what is meant understood. You know that the modern era began like the others, this is why it deserves to be called modern, because otherwise, as Alphonse Allais says, look how modern we were in the Middle Ages! If the modern era has a sense, it is because of certain breakthroughs one of which was the myth of the desert island; I could just as well have started from it as from Pascal's wager. This still continues to worry us. What kind of book would you take with you onto a desert island? Ah! That would be amusing, a pile of the Pléiade, what fun one would have behind the leftover shrimps, somewhere, in reading something from the Pléiade, it would be really exciting! Nevertheless that has a sense. And to illustrate it I am going to give you my response. A moment of suspense: "What book would he take onto a desert island?" So then, tell me!

X – The Bible.

Lacan: The Bible, naturally!!! I can do without it! What do you think I would do with it on a desert island! Onto a desert island I would take Bloch et Von Warburg. I hope all the same that you all know what it is, it is not the first time that I have spoken about it. Bloch and Von Warburg is entitled - that lends itself to misunderstanding of course - Dictionnaire étymologique de la langue francaise. Etymological does not particularly mean that you are given the sense of words starting from the thinking that preceded their creation. It means that in connection with each word, you are given a little pinpointing with the dates of their forms and of their uses in the course of history. This has (142) such an enlightening, fruitful value, that just by itself, in effect, one can do without anyone. You see the degree to which language, is company all by itself. It is extraordinarily curious that Daniel Defoe, to take the one who did not invent the desert island – the one who invented it, is Balthazar Gracian, who was someone of a different class. He was a Jesuit, and moreover not a liar. It is in Criticon, in which the hero, returning from somewhere or other in the Atlantic, spends a certain time on a deserted island, which has for him at least the advantage of protecting him from women. It is extraordinary that Daniel Defoe did not notice that Robinson did not need to wait for Friday. That already the simple fact that he was a speaking being and knew his language perfectly well, namely, the English tongue, was an element absolutely as essential for his survival on the island as his relationship with some tiny natural trifles from which he succeeded in making a hut and feeding himself.

Whatever may be the case for what is at stake in this world which is that of signifiers, I cannot do better today, with the advancing time than to draw again what I gave here in the first terms that I put forward, namely, those to which the moment we have got to in mathematical logic allows us to give some rigour to. And in starting from the definition of the signifier as being what represents a subject for another signifier, this signifier, I am saying, is other, which simply means that it is signifying.

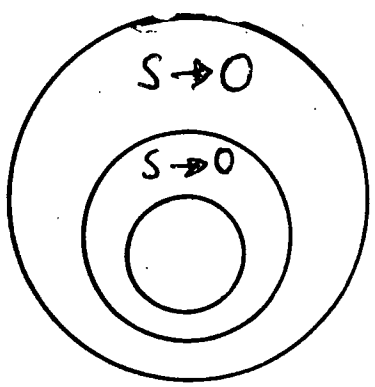
$$S \rightarrow O.$$

Because what characterises, what grounds the signifier, is absolutely nothing whatsoever that is attached to it as sense as such. It is its difference. Namely, not something that is stuck to it, to itself, and would allow it to be identified but the fact that all the others are different to it. Its difference resides in the others. That is why this constitutes a step forward; but an inaugural step by asking oneself whether from this Other one can make a class, one can make a sack, and one can, in a word, make what is involved in this famous One.

Because then, as I have already drawn it, if the O is 1, it must include this S in so far as it is the representative of the subject, for what? For O. And this O, by being the same as the one that you have just seen here, as you see, is found to be what it is, a predicate in so far as the 1 in question is no longer the unary trait but the unifying 1 that defines the field of the Other. In other words, you see there being indefinitely reproduced the following, with here something that never finds its name, unless you give it in an arbitrary fashion. And that it is precisely in order to say that it does not have a name that names it that I designate it by the most discreet letter, the letter o.



What does that mean? Where and when is there produced this process (143) which is a process of choice? It is very precisely as regards the One, the game that is involved in so far as he really plays, not jocus, here a play with words, but ludus as it is forgotten from its Latin origin of which many things are to be said but undoubtedly this comprises this deadly game that I spoke about earlier, and that this varies the ritual games that Rome had inherited from the Etruscans – the word is very probably itself of Etruscan origin – up to the games of the circus, neither more nor less. And something else again, that I will signal for you when the time has come. It is in so far as in this game there is something that, with respect to the 1, is posited as questioning what the 1 becomes when I, o, am lacking to him. And at this point where I am lacking to him, if I posit myself once again as "I", it will be to question him about what results from the fact that I posited this lack.

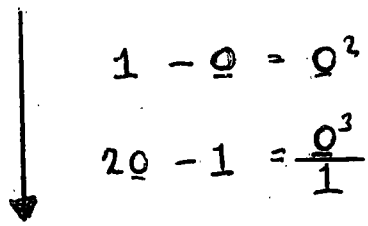
It is here that you will have the series that I already wrote as the decreasing series, the one that goes towards a limit, in the series that I do not know how to describe otherwise, the series that is summarised by the double condition which is only one because of being the Fibonacci series, whatever it may be, namely, the relation between 1 and o.

I already wrote the results of this series in this line that continues to infinity, and signalled for you the total of that which, from the value of these different terms, is necessary in the measure that you continue towards the formulae of a decreasing order that culminate at a limit. Culminate if you have started from the withdrawal of o at something that, in totalising the even powers and the odd powers of o, easily realises the 1 as their total.



It nevertheless remains that, up to the end, what defines the relationship of one of these terms to the following one, namely, its true difference, is always and in a way that does not decrease but that is strictly equal, the o function.

This is what is demonstrated by the written statement, formulated from (144) this decreasing chain. It is that, whatever may be the appearance linked to the schematisation, it is always the same circle that is at stake. And that this circle, in so far as we ground it, but in an arbitrary, chosen fashion, it is by an act that we posit this Other as field of discourse – namely, what we take care to distance any divine existence from– it is by a purely arbitrary, schematic and signifying act that we define it as One, namely, faith in what? Faith in our thinking. While we know very well that this thinking only subsists from signifying articulation, in so far as it already presents itself in this indefinite world of language. What then are we going to do and what are we doing in the logical order about this circumscribing in which we try to make appear in this all the o as remainder, if nothing more than, by having let it go, by having lost it, by having played in the knowledge of some "the loser wins" or other, to arrive at nothing other than identifying what is involved in the Other itself as o. Namely, by finding in the o the essence of the supposed One of thinking. Namely, to determine thinking itself as being the effect, I am saying more, the shadow of what is involved in the function of the o-object. The o at the point where here it appears to us, deserves to be called the cause, certainly, but specified in its essence as a privileged cause, plays an admirable sense...that play precisely gives us, the play of language in its material form. Let us call it as I already called it more than once on the board the o-cause (l'a-cause). Moreover in French does this not make an explosive sound because there exists the expression "à cause de". And have its resonances always been clearly seen? "A cause de", does this constitute the avowal that this "à cause de" is only an o-cause. On this every language has its price. And Spanish says "por l'amor". One could easily take the same effect from it.

But this - at which the limit of time that is imposed on us every time stops me - makes me have to announce to you that I am confirming it. And in confirming it completes the inverted test, namely, the one belonging to the field, to the goal, to the career in which there is engaged for us the relationship to knowledge. Not that of questioning the One in so far as at the start I put this lack into it and that then I find from the fact that it is identified to this lack itself, but to question this 1 because I am adding this o to it 1 + o; 1 + o, such is the first form, such is the upper line as I have written it in the matrix on the right.

What does the 1 + o give when it is in its field that there is engaged the radical questioning of knowledge? Knowledge added to the world in so far as, let us say it can, armed with this formula, with this preliminary banner, transform it. What is the logical consequence of it, questioned in the way in which I did it at the level of progressive differences? This is what will perhaps allow us to clarify more radically what is involved in the function of o. Its correlative is in which it is easy to glimpse many things, this thing that the authors were deluded by for a long time, and not just at an indifferent epoch, (145) precisely at the moment when the ontological argument had a sense. Namely, that what is lacking to desire is properly speaking the infinite; perhaps we will say something about it that will give it a different status.

Notice again that the fourth box of the matrix on the right, this zero is found, in the way in which I articulated it by the schema entitled the relationship of S to O, to clearly present the way it is radically distinguished from what is on the first schema, namely, the bet or on the contrary indifference. It well and truly represents the hole and, in a third phase, we will have to demonstrate what it corresponds to in the analysis of what takes its origin in this very hole.

Seminar 12: Wednesday 26 February 1969

(147) You have been good enough to follow me up to the present along narrow paths and I think that, for a number of you, the line I am taking seems to pose the question of its origin and its sense. In other words, it may easily happen that you no longer know very well where we are. That is why it seems an opportune time to me, and not in a contingent way, to pose the question of my title, for example, From an Other to the other, under which my discourse for this year is presented. It is indeed in effect conceivable that it is not at the start, by way of a preface, indeed by way of a programme, that something can be elucidated about the end. It is necessary to have travelled at least a bit of the path so that the start is illuminated by retroaction. This not simply for you, but for myself. Since for me this means, in what I might call this drilling operation, which is indeed what interests you, what holds your attention, this means that for at least for a certain number of you who are here, if not for all, I must spend some time to take my bearings in what constituted its stages in the past.

Thus it is that I happened to take up the text – who knows, perhaps with publication in mind – of what I stated ten years ago now, I mean in the seminar 1959-60, it is a long time ago, under the title of The Ethics of Psychoanalysis. It gave me some satisfactions of an intimate order to bring to light something that strives to reproduce as faithfully as possible the outline of what I did at that time. This of course, cannot but have all these retroactive effects from what I have stated since, and specifically here. This is therefore a delicate operation and the only thing that meant I could not keep to the excellent summary that had been done two years later by one of my listeners, namely, Safouan. I would have to give the reasons why I did not publish this summary at that time, but it will rather be the object of a preface to what will come out of it. My satisfaction on this occasion, that you can share if you trust me about the fidelity of the outline that I will try to produce of it, is due to the fact that not only does nothing force me to revise what I put forward at that time but that after all, I can lodge in it, as in a sort of little cup, the more rigorous things, let us say, that I am able to state today about this project.

In effect, what I thought I had to start from during this putting into (148) question, which had never before been done, of what is involved, on the ethical plane, is a new term. This, in a first attempt at an initial drafting that I tried to give of what new things are contributed by what I am stating in the way that seems to me to be the most rigorous, by the Freud event (l'événement Freud). I now have, at the date that we are at, the satisfaction of seeing for example as regards what is involved in the function of an author like Freud, I would say that a very broad minded society finds itself in a position of being able to measure his originality and in connection with him, as Michel Foucault did for example last Saturday, in a sort of evil place called the Société de Philosophie, in posing the question "What is an author?". And this led him to highlight a certain number of terms that deserve to be stated in connection with such a question, what is an author? What is the function of the name of an author? It was really, at the level of a semantic interrogation properly speaking that he found the means of highlighting the originality of this function and its situation closely internal to discourse. This involves, of course, a putting into question on this occasion, an effect of splitting, of tearing apart of what is involved in it for everyone, namely, for what is called the society of fine minds or the republic of letters, of this relationship to discourse. And whether Freud, in this respect, did not play a capital role, that

moreover the author in question, Michel Foucault, not only accentuated but properly speaking put at the high point of his whole articulation. In a word, "The function of the return to..." he put three dots after it, in the little announcement that he had made of his project of questioning "What is an author?". "The return to..." was found at the end, and I must say by that very fact I considered myself as having been invited, there being no one after all, in our day who, more than me, has given weight to "return to..." in connection with a return to Freud. Moreover he highlighted it very well and showed how perfectly well informed he was about the very special sense, the key point that this return to Freud constitutes, compared to everything that is currently a slippage, an alteration, a profound revision of the function of the author, especially of the literary author. And of what in short is provided by this circle in terms of a critical function which, after all, there is no reason to be astonished in our day lags behind, or backwards, with respect to what is happening. Something that in other times, a critical function thought it could pinpoint with this bizarre term that undoubtedly none of those who are in the forefront of it accept but by which we now find ourselves affected as it were by a bizarre label that has been stuck on our backs without our consent, structuralism.

So then ten years ago, in beginning to introduce the question, as I told you, which had never even been raised, which is quite curious, about the ethics of psychoanalysis, assuredly perhaps the strangest thing is (149) this remark by which I thought I should illustrate it, not immediately certainly but I do not even know if I gave enough support at that moment to the thing, I had an audience of psychoanalysts, I thought I would be able in a way to address myself directly by something that must be given a name, when it is a matter of morality, of conscience, add on moral, so I did not remark too much at that stage that the ethics of psychoanalysis as it is constituted by a deontology did not even give a sketch, a beginning, the smallest feature of the beginning of the ethics of psychoanalysis. On the contrary, what I

announced from the beginning is that, through the Freud event, what has been brought to light, the key point, the centre of the ethics is nothing other than what I supported at that time by the final term of these three references, categories, from which I had started my whole discourse, namely, the Symbolic, the Imaginary and the Real. As you know it is in the Real that I designated the pivotal point of what is involved in the ethics of psychoanalysis. I pre-suppose, of course, that this Real is subjected to the very severe interposing, if I can express myself in this way, of the conjoined function of the Symbolic and the Imaginary. And that it is inasmuch as the Real, as one might say, is not easy to gain access to that it is for us the reference around which there ought to turn the revision of the problem of ethics. In effect it is not by chance that, in order to connect it, I started then from the reminder of a work that, even though it has remained a little bit in the shade, and, a curious piece of luck, was only resurrected by the operation of these people that we can consider as not being the best oriented as regards our questioning, namely, those we can call neo-positivists, or again those who believe that they have to question language from the angle of something whose futile destiny I pointed out at one time, to question something that they express in an exemplary fashion, namely, the question put about the meaning of meaning, about what is involved in the sense of the fact that these things have a meaning. It is quite certain that this is a path completely opposed to what interests us. But it is also of course not by chance that it should be them, and specifically Ogden who brought out or brought out again, edited rather, this work of Jeremy Bentham called The theory of fictions.

It is quite simply the most important work in what is called the utilitarian perspective, and you know that at the beginning of the nineteenth century people were trying to find a solution to the very current problem at that time, and with good reason, an ideological one in a way, described as the sharing of goods. The theory of fictions is already at this level, and with an exceptional lucidity, the putting in question of what is involved in all human institutions. And, properly speaking, nothing could be done, taking things from the sociological angle, that better isolates what is involved as such in this category of the symbolic which is found to be precisely the one that is reactualised, (150) but in a completely different manner, by the Freud event and what came after it. It is enough to understand the term fictions as not representing, not affecting by its domination, what it regards as in no way having an illusory or deceptive character. The way in which the term fictions is put forward does nothing other than overlap what, in an aphoristic way, I promoted by underlining the fact that the truth, in so far as its locus could only be the one where the word is produced, that the truth in essence, if one can express it in this way, forgive me this "in essence", it is to make myself understood, do not give it the whole philosophical stress that this term involves, the truth, of itself, let us say has the structure of fiction.

Here is the essential starting point that in a way allows there to be posed the question of what is involved in ethics in a way that can moreover accommodate all the diversities of culture. Namely, from the moment that we can put them within the brackets, in the parentheses of this term of the structure of fiction, which supposes, of course, reaching a state, acquiring a position with regard to this character in so far as it affects the whole foundational articulation of discourse in what one can call in general social relationships. It is starting from this point, that cannot of course be reached except by starting from a certain limit, let us say once again to evoke our Pascal, all of a sudden, at this turning point I remember him, who therefore dared before him to note simply as something that ought to form part of the discourse that he left incomplete, the one rather legitimately, rather ambiguously also collected under the term of Pensées, the formula "truth on this side of the Pyrenees, error on the other side". It is starting from certain degrees of relativism, and of the most radical type of relativism with respect not simply to morals and institutions but to truth itself, that there can begin to be posed the problem of ethics. And it is in this way that the Freud event shows itself so exemplary. In the fact, as I underlined it and with some support, with some stress in the first trimester of the articulation of the ethics of psychoanalysis, namely, the radical change that results from an event which is nothing other, as we are going to see, than his discovery, namely, the function of the unconscious. It is correlatively that we are going to see later why, in a way that, I think, will sufficiently strike you by its elegance, he made the pleasure principle function in a radically different way to everything that had done up to then. In short, I think that there are enough of you, after all, who have found themselves in one way or another permeated or traversed, let us say, by my discourse that I only need to recall in the briefest fashion what is involved in this principle.

The pleasure principle is essentially characterised at first by this paradoxical fact that its surest result, is not, even though it is written in (151) this form in Freud's text, hallucination, let us say the possibility of hallucination. But let us say that hallucination in Freud's text is its specific possibility. What in effect does the whole apparatus that Freud constructs to account for the effects of the unconscious show us? As you know this is found in Chapter VII of the Traumdeutung, when it is a matter of clarifying dream processes, Traum-Vorgänge. But we have had the chance, the luck, to see falling into our possession and under our examination what is in a certain way its underpinning in a certain Entwurf, in a certain outline that corresponds to these years when, correlatively to the discovery that he was making, guided by these admirable theoreticians that hysterics were – that hysterics are! - guided by them he had his experience of what is involved in the unconscious economy, correlatively he wrote this Entwurf to Fliess. A really very developed project, infinitely richer and more constructive than what he thought he could summarise of it, because it is sure that he himself could not fail to preserve a reference to it in this chapter of the Traumdeutung. What he constructs at that moment then, under the terms of the psi-system, inasmuch as it is what regulates in the organism the function of what he calls the pleasure principle, let us say

to schematise it roughly, we can put it at the heart of something that is not simply a relay in the organism but a veritable closed circle that has its own laws. And that in order to be inserted into the cycle classically defined by the general physiology of the organism, of the stimulus-motor activity arc, and not response, which is an abuse of the term because response has a sense that ought to have for us a much more complex structure where something is interposed in the function, is defined very precisely not simply by being the hindrance effect imposed on the basal arc but properly speaking creating an obstacle to it, namely, constituting an autonomous psi-system within which the economy is such that it is certainly not the adaptation, the adequation of the motor response that, as you know, is far from being always sufficiently adapted, we suppose it to be free, but everything that happens at the level of the fact that a living animal, in so far as it is defined by the fact of being gifted with a motor activity that allows it to escape too intense stimuli, destructive stimuli that may threaten its integrity, it is clear that what is at stake at the level of what Freud articulates, is that something is lodged as such in certain of these living beings, and not just any ones. And without him being able to say certainly that the same apparatus may be defined simply from the fact that the being in question is a superior vertebrate or something simply provided with a nervous system, it is about what happens properly speaking at the level of human economy that is at stake. And it is at (152) this level, even if from time to time he risks the possibility of interpreting what is happening at the level of other neighbouring beings in reference to what happens in the human being defined in a necessary fashion simply through the consequences and the text of Freud's discourse as a speaking being, it is at this level that there is produced this homeostatic regulation which is defined by the return to perceptual identity. Namely, that in his research, in the broadest sense of the word, in the detours that this system carries out to maintain its own homeostasis, what its functioning ends up with as constituting its specificity, is the fact that what will be rediscovered about the identical perception inasmuch as what regulates it is repetition, what will be

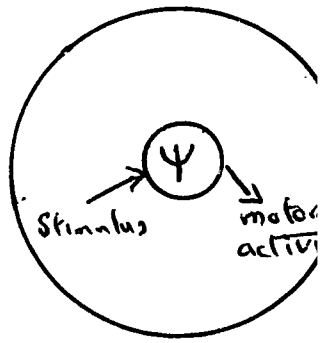
rediscovered does not carry in itself any criterion of reality. It can only be affected by these criteria in a way from outside and through the pure conjunction of a little sign, of something qualificatory that a specialised system already distinguishes from the two preceding ones that you see inscribed in this schema, namely, the reflex circle qua constituting the phi-system, the central circle that for its part defines a closed area and constituting the proper type of equilibrium, namely, the psi-system. It is from this afference of something whose function he closely distinguishes from energetics that can be applied to each of these two systems, and that for its part only intervenes in function of signs qualified through specific periods and which are those afferent to each of the sense organs and that eventually come to affect certain of the perceptats [?] that are introduced into this system of a Wahrnehmungzeichen, from a sign that what is at stake here is something that is an acceptable perception with respect to reality.



What does that mean? Certainly not that we should approve this use of the term hallucination that for us has clinical connotations. For Freud also, certainly, but he no doubt wanted to accentuate very particularly the paradox of the functioning of this system qua articulated onto the pleasure principle. Hallucination requires quite different co-ordinates. But moreover we have in a text by Freud himself what constitutes its major reference. It is enough that he refers to exemplify it to the function of the dream to help us find our feet again; it is essentially the possibility of the dream that is at stake. In a word, we find ourselves before this adventure that, to justify what is involved in the functioning of the apparatus that regulates the unconscious in so far as, we are going to recall it later and in the appropriate style, it governs an absolutely essential and radical economy that allows us to appreciate not simply our behaviour but also our thinking. Here the world, in a (153) completely opposite way from what is traditionally the support of philosophers when it is a matter of tackling what is involved in the good of man, here we have the world entirely suspended on the dream of the world.

This means that this step, the Freud event, which consists in nothing other than properly a supposed arrest of what, in the traditional perspective, was considered as the foundation encompassing every reflection, namely, the rotation of this world, celestial rotation so manifestly designated in the text of Aristotle as constituting the referential point where every conceivable good ought to be attached. The radical questioning then of every effect of representation, of any connivance of what is involved in the represented as such, not at all in a subject, let us not say it too early because if in Aristotle this term of upokeimenon is put forward exactly in connection with logic, it is nowhere isolated as such. It took a long time and the whole progress of philosophical tradition for knowledge to be organised in its final term, the Kantian term, from a subject relation and something that remains entirely suspended, this is the sense of idealism in so far as there appears, with the phainomenon, leaving out the noumemon, namely, what is behind, again this representation is comfortable. What is to be underlined in the essence of idealism, is that after all, the thinking being is only dealing with his own measure, that he poses as a terminal point, the referential point that is in question for him. Now it is from this measure that he believes he is able to state in an a priori fashion at least the fundamental laws. It is properly speaking in this that the Freudian position differs. Nothing is tenable any longer about what is involved in representation except what is articulated at a point profoundly motivating for behaviour. And this by passing completely outside the circuit of any subject in which the representation is claimed to be unified, to a structure, to a structure made up of a weave and a network. And this is the true sense of these little schemas that the recent discovery of neuronal articulation allowed him to construct. It is enough to refer to this project, to this Entwurf, to see the decisive importance in the articulation of what is involved in this trellis, lattice, of this texture and since of course it has not been possible for us for a long time, as already Freud had no doubt a suspicion of, to identify to these movements, to these transfers of energy that we have been able to map out moreover, by other physical means, to these displacements that happen all along the neuronal texture. It is in no way under this mode that proves from experience to be quite distinct, that we can find the appropriate usage of these schemas that I have just qualified as network, lattice. We see clearly that what Freud used these schemas for, was in a way to support, to materialise in an intuitive form nothing more than what was at stake and that moreover is displayed on the (154) same schemas. At every one of these crossing points it is a word that is described, namely, the word that designates a particular memory. This word articulated as a response, a particular word striking, marking, engraming as I might say the symptom. And what is at stake in these little schemas that I would ask you to refer to – buy The origins of psychoanalysis, as a collection of letters to Fliess, to which is joined this Entwurf, is translated – and you will clearly see that in effect what Freud found a convenient support from in what was as that time within his hand's reach by what had also just been discovered, namely, neuronal articulation, was nothing other than the articulation, under the most elementary form, of signifiers and of relations that can be fixed in a way that, in our day the same schema that would have the same shape. Buy the last little book that has appeared, or rather buy The axiomatic theory of sets by M Krivine. You will see there exactly Freud's schemas except for the fact that what is at stake are little schemas oriented more or less like this, and that are necessary to make us understand what is involved in set theory. This means that every point, in the measure that it is linked by an arrow to another, is considered in set theory as an element of the other set. And you will see that it is a matter of nothing less than what is necessary to give a correct articulation to what is most formal in order to give its foundation to mathematical theory. And already you will see there, by simply reading the first lines, what is involved in every axiomatic step that is taken. Namely, the veritable necessities taken from the formal angle in what is involved in a signifying articulation taken at its most radical level. Notably this particularly

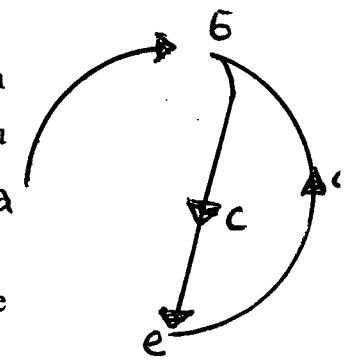
exemplary one, the notion defined there of a part concerning its elements, elements that are always sets, the way it is said that one of these elements is contained in another, depends on these formal definitions which are such that they are distinguished, that they cannot be identified to what a term like "be contained in", intuitively means. Because if you suppose that I make a schema that is a little more complicated than that one and that I write on the board as a note "the identification of each one of these terms in the set (ces termes ensemblistes)", it is not at all enough that one of them is written, namely, constitutes in appearance a part of the universe that I am establishing here, for it to be able in any way to be said that it is contained in any of the other terms, namely, to be an element of it. In other words what is articulated from a configuration of signifiers in no way signifies that the entire configuration, that the universe thus constituted can be totalised. Quite the contrary, it leaves outside its field as not being able to be situated as one of its parts, but only articulated as an element in a reference to others, the sets thus (155) articulated. It leaves the possibility of a non-coincidence between the fact that intuitively we might say that it is part of this universe and the fact that formally we can articulate it to it. This indeed is an altogether essential principle and is the one through which mathematical logic can essentially instruct us, I mean allow us to put in their correct place what is involved for us about certain questions. You are going to see which ones.



This minimal logical structure as it is defined by the mechanisms of the unconscious, I have for a long time summarised under the terms of difference and repetition. Nothing else grounds the function of the signifier except its absolute difference. It is only in the way that the other signifiers are different from it that the signifier is sustained. On the other hand these signifiers should be and function in a repetitive articulation. This is the other part of what is involved in the other characteristic, that a first logic can be established from what on the one hand results from this signifying pinpointing itself, not to fix but on the contrary to slide, that what fixes is a reference to the signifying pinpointing, is destined to slide from this pinpointing itself. Here is the fundamental function of displacement. That on the other hand it is of the nature of the signifier qua pinpointing to allow the substitution of one signifier for another, with certain expected effects that are effects of sense. That is the other dimension. But the important thing is the following and it is appropriate for us to accentuate it here to allow us to grasp what is really involved in our functions, I mean psychoanalytic functions. If at the level of the possibility of the dream, namely, of this pleasure principle through which essentially and at the start the function of the reality principle is constituted as precarious – certainly not cancelled out for all that but essentially dependant on the radical precariousness to which the pleasure principle subjects it – what must be grasped is the fact that what we see in the dream, since at the start it is here that there takes place essentially the approach of this function of the signifier, of this minimal logical structure whose terms I articulated again just now, there must be pushed to the end what is involved in the Freudian perspective. If, as everything seems to (156) indicate in our way of treating the dream, what is involved are sentences – let us leave aside for the moment the nature of their syntax – they have an elementary one at least at the level of the two mechanisms that I have recalled of condensation and of displacement. What must be seen, is that the way in which it appears hallucinatory for us, with the accent that Freud gave to this term at this level, what does it mean if not that the dream is already in itself interpretation, a wild one certainly, but interpretation. It is there besides that it can be grasped that this interpretation, which is to be taken as Freud himself quite calmly wrote – if I have underlined it, I am certainly not the one who discovered or invented it in the text – that if the dream is present as a rebus, what does it mean if not that to every one of these articulated terms that are signifying from a diachronic point of its progress where there is established its articulation, the dream, through its function, and the function of pleasure, therefore this imaged translation that itself only subsists because it can be articulated in a

signifier, what do we do then in substituting for this wild interpretation our reasoned interpretation? On this it is enough to invoke the practice of each person but for the others, let them re-read in the light of this the dreams quoted in the Traumdeutung in order to grasp that what is at stake, is in this reasoned interpretation, nothing other than from a reconstituted sentence, to grasp the point where there is a flaw which is the one where, qua sentence, and not at all qua meaning, it allows there to be seen what is not working, and what is not working, is desire.

Take the dream, something really exemplary, and in a way put by Freud at the very start of the chapter where he questions dream processes, the Traum-Vorgänge and in which he tries to give what he calls their psychology. There you will read the dream of "des alten Mannes", of the old man that tiredness had forced to abandon in the room next door the body of his dead son to be watched over by another old man. What he dreams about, is about this son standing, alive, who comes close to his bed, who grasps him by the arm and in a voice full of reproach says: "Vater, siehst du denn nicht dass ich verbrenne?", father, do you not see I am burning? What could be more moving, what could be more pathetic than what happens. Namely, that the father awakes and going into the next room sees that effectively a candle has fallen over and has set fire to the sheets that are already licking at the body while the watcher has fallen asleep? And Freud tells us that undoubtedly apart from the fact that the dream was only there to prolong sleep in the face of the first signs of what had been perceived of this horrible reality, do we not further grasp that it is precisely by considering that reality overlaps this dream that proves that the father is still sleeping. Because how can we not understand the accent there is in this word when Freud tells us moreover that there is no word in the dream that has not come somewhere in the text of (157) words effectively pronounced. How can we not see that it is a desire that burns this child, but in the field of the Other, in the field of the one to whom he addresses himself, to the father on this occasion? What is at stake is some flaw that comes from the fact that he is a desiring being, some flaw he had shown with respect to this beloved object that his son was. And that it is from this which, Freud tells us, is not analysed but very sufficiently indicated, it is from this that reality itself protects him, in its coincidence. The interpretation of the dream is not in any case, and Freud agrees with this, what caused it in reality.

So then, when we interpret a dream, what guides us, is certainly not "what does that mean?" nor is it "what does it mean in saying that?" but "what by saying that does it wish?" Apparently it does not know what it wants. Here indeed is where the question lies and our formulae, in so far as they establish this first relationship linked in a way to the most simple function of number in so far as it is generated from this most elementary something that has a name in mathematics and that is called a sub-group where there intervene additions, what I called the Fibonacci series, simply the joining up of the two preceding terms to constitute the third: 1 1 2 3 5 ... that it is from that very place, as I told you, that there is generated this something that is not of the order of what is called the mathematical, the rational, namely, this unary trait, but something that, at the origin, introduces this first proportion, the most original one of all that we have designated and that is designated in mathematics where it is perfectly well known: simply by this proportion o/1-o = 1/o = 1+o.

Now at the place of o, write knowledge. We do not know yet what it is since this is what we are questioning ourselves about. If 1 is the field of the Other and the field of truth, the truth in so far as it does not know itself, we write:

$$\frac{\text{knowledge}}{\text{truth} - \text{knowledge}} = \frac{\text{truth}}{\text{knowledge}} = \text{truth with knowledge added on}$$

Let us try to see what these relationships mean. This means that knowledge about the unconscious, namely, that there is a knowledge that says "there is somewhere a truth that does not know itself" and it is this that is articulated in the unconscious, it is here that we ought to find the truth about knowledge. Does our relationship, the one that we made earlier, between the dream – I am isolating it from the totality of the formations of the unconscious – this is not to say that I could not (158) also extend it but I am isolating it for clarity, this role of which we may wrongly pose the question "what does that mean?". Because this is not what is important, it is where is the flaw in what is said? This is what is important for us. But it is at a level where what is said is distinct from what it presents as meaning something. And nevertheless it says something without knowing what it is saying since we are forced to help it by our reasoned interpretation. To know that the dream is possible, that is to be known, and that this is how it is. Namely, that the unconscious should have been discovered, is what indicates to us the singular proportion that we can write with the help of the term o qua original effect of the inscription itself, provided we simply give it this little push of being able to renew itself by connecting repetition and difference in this minimal operation called addition.

It is there that, inasmuch as in this register it is written o/1-o = 1/o , we can see that this knowledge about the diminished truth of knowledge, it is there that we have to take not simply the truth, namely, a word that is affirmed, truth about what is involved in the function of knowledge, but even on this occasion to be able to confront them on the same line and, in a word, to question what is involved in this junction which ensures that we can write truth plus knowledge.

Now all I am able to do, since I am pressed for time, is to recall the economic analogy that I introduced here about what is involved in truth as work, an analogy that is very sensitive to something in our experience. The fact is that a discourse, at least the analytic one, the work of truth is more obvious because it is painful. To make one's way without falling to the right or to the left into some intuitive

identification or other that short-circuits, in a way, the sense of what is at stake in the least relevant references, that of need for example. And on the contrary, it is to the function of price that I homologated knowledge. Now price is certainly not established by chance, any more than any effect of exchange. But what is certain, is that the price in itself does not constitute a work and here indeed is the important point. It is that neither does knowledge, whatever may be said about it. It is an invention of pedagogues that knowledge is acquired by the sweat of your brow, we will soon be told, as if it were necessarily correlative to burning late oil. With good electrical light one can do without it! But I ask you: have you ever, I am not saying learned anything, because to learn is a terrible thing, you have to go through all (159) the stupidity of those who explain things to you. This is painful to bring up, but is it not a fact that getting to know something always happens in a flash?

Everything that is said about any learning by experience, having something to do with one's hands, knowing how to handle oneself on a horse or on skis, that has nothing to do with knowledge. There is a moment when you know how to sort out the things that are presented to you, which are signifiers, and in the way that they are presented to you, it means nothing. And then all of a sudden it means something and that from the very beginning. It is tangible from the way in which a child handles his first alphabet that what is in question is not any learning but the collapse that unites a big capital letter with the shape of the animal whose initial is supposed to correspond to the capital letter in question. The child makes the connection or does not make it. In the majority of cases, namely, in those where he is not surrounded by too much pedagogical attention he makes it. And that is what knowledge is. And every time a piece of knowledge is produced, of course, it is not useless for a subject to have passed through this stage in order to understand what happens from an effect of knowledge in the little schemas that I feel scrupulous about not having made you sense properly earlier on, but I was pressed for time, set theory. We will come back to it if necessary.

What is it to know? If we ought, pushing things further, to question what is involved in this fundamental analogy, the one which means that knowledge still remains perfectly opaque because it is a matter for the numerator of the first relation of a singular knowledge which is the fact that there is truth, and perfectly articulated to what it lacks qua knowledge. And that, by reason of this relation, it is from this very relation that we are expecting the truth about what is involved in knowledge. It is clear that I am not leaving you here at the level of a pure and simple riddle and that the fact that I have introduced it through this term o shows you that it is effectively in the articulation that I already, it seems to me, sufficiently circumscribed about the o-object that there ought to depend any possible manipulation of the function of knowledge.

Will I here, at the moment of ending, need to have the necessary boldness to give a plausible sense to what will be written in terms of a cross conjunction of the type that people use in arithmetic. From this knowledge about the unconscious to this knowledge questioned as a radical function. In so far, in short, as it constitutes this very object towards which there tends every desire in so far as it is produced at the level of articulation. How knowledge qua knowledge is lost at the origin because desire appears in every possible articulation of discourse. This is what we will have to consider in the talks that follow.

Seminar 13: Wednesday 5 March 1969

I left you the last time on a formula balanced according to what we will call a harmonic proportion that I developed before you in these terms that which I was able to translate easily, because of what had been previously said, by something that carries in itself a certain degree of obviousness and is of a nature to satisfy by an a priori formula what is commonly accepted as being what the analytic conquest is. This is the fact that we know that somewhere, in this part that we call the unconscious, a truth is stated which has this property that we can know nothing about it. This, I mean this very fact, is what constitutes a knowledge. I therefore wrote: knowledge over the function of truth minus knowledge, this is what ought to give us the truth about knowledge.

Knowledge/Truth – Knowledge = Truth/Knowledge

At this point, to give you notice of a tiny episode among my encounters, I happened this week to hear a formula – I apologise to its author if I distort it a little. It was a matter of a formula at the beginning of a research into the line of my teaching, which was to situate the function of psychoanalysis not at all costs as a science but as an epistemological indication. Since research on the function of science is on the agenda, the formula is the following:

"Psychoanalysis is supposed to be, in the sciences, something that one could formulate as a science without knowledge". My interlocutor went as far as that. And carried along no doubt by what is involved in a certain current movement, in so far as at a level that is indeed also one of experience, there is posed a question of what is involved in terms of a sort of relativity that is accused of being the style of social domination in the transmission of knowledge. I took up my interlocutor sharply, precisely in the name of the fact that it is false to say that nothing of psychoanalytic experience, that nothing in a (162) teaching could be properly articulated, be put forward as knowledge. And that because of that fact, because this is what is at stake at present, able to be stated in a magisterial fashion in the terms that are precisely those in which I state this knowledge here. And nevertheless from a certain angle, in a certain fashion, what my interlocutor was putting forward was the truth.

It is the truth at the level of this analytic knowledge that is not one, of knowledge, as compared to what it seems to be. What one might take it for if, under the pretext that it has stated the original, radical relationship of the function of knowledge to sexuality people precipitated themselves too quickly – this is a pleonasm! – to deduce from it that it is a knowledge about the sexual. Who has ever learned in psychoanalysis how to treat his wife properly? Because it is a fact that a wife counts! There is a certain way of taking her from the right angle, she is to be held in your arms in a certain way and she for her part has no doubt about it! She is capable of saying to you: "You are not holding me the way a woman should be held". That in an analysis the paths that prevented this man, to whom this woman was addressing herself in the way I have just said, from doing it properly can be clarified, is what people like to believe happens at the end of an analysis. And as regards technique, if you will permit me to express myself in this way, the result depends on his natural knowledge, his skill (addresse), if you will allow me to use this word, with all the ambiguity it possess in French from the ordinary resources of the language: the faculty pinpointed by this name and also the sense of whom that is addressed to, the address that is supposedly given at the end of a certain clearing out.

It is clear that there is nothing in common between the analytic operation and anything whatsoever pertaining to this register that I have just now called technique. Its extent can be measured when one maps out this domain, as Mauss did incidentally, for example, speaking about the characteristics in culture of this very widespread function, for which it is not without reason that in our civilisation, it is not properly speaking eluded but repressed into corners, this function he calls "the techniques of the body". I have here only to make an allusion to the dimension of properly erotic techniques in so far as they are put forward in one or other culture that one could not in any way describe as primitive, the Hindu culture for example, to make you sense that nothing of what is stated in what for you, in no case reaches you except under the heading of playthings, of pornography, in reading a book like the Kama-Sutra for example. And nevertheless, in another dimension that this text can be understood, it can take on an import that, with regard to the complete confusions about this word, the one that I am going to use, will be mapped out, not incorrectly, but approximately, as metaphysical. The angle then from which sexual knowledge is tackled in psychoanalysis, is why it takes on its weight in (163) the way that I write it. There again, once more, what is at stake, is a recourse to what is obvious from the start, and this is indeed the prohibition properly speaking that can cover this knowledge, sexual knowledge. The angle from which I would not say we enter into it but are confronted by it, is again the following, in the sense that this angle was never taken. It is to tackle it from the point where this prohibition is brought to bear, and that is why the first statements of Freud with respect to the unconscious put the accent on the function of censorship as such.

This prohibition is exercised as affecting a certain "there", that place, where it speaks, where it avows itself, where it avows that it is preoccupied by the question of this knowledge. And admire there, in passing, once again the riches of language. Is not this "preoccupied" to translate Besetzung, the Freudian Besetz, not better than this "investment" or this "invested" that the translations deafen us with? It is pre-occupied, occupied in advance by this something whose position, henceforth, is going to become more ambiguous. What can be meant – and this is what requires us to return to it again, to this function of the unconscious – what can be meant by this knowledge whose mark at a certain level that is articulated from truth is defined by the fact that this knowledge that preoccupies you is what you know least. And this is what allows us to state perhaps, to clarify things that one can say from a certain point of view, that in our culture, our civilisation, in our sauce, for this frying pan or in any case it is indeed the only term that justifies this gathering here, one could go as far as to sustain that psychoanalysis has this function of maintaining this sort of hypnosis which means that after all, it is quite true, huh, among us the sexual is maintained in an unprecedented torpor.

All of this is not a reason for psychoanalysis to be used in any way to contest - because this is what is at stake - the well-foundedness of the transmission of any knowledge whatsoever, not even its own. Because after all it discovered something, however mythical its formulation, it discovered what in other registers is called the means of production, of what? Of a satisfaction. It discovered that there was something articulatable and articulated, something that I pinpointed, that I exposed as montages, and literally not being able to conceive of itself otherwise, that it calls the drives. And this only has meaning – which means that it does not present them as such – in as far as on occasion it is satisfying, and that, when one sees them functioning, that implies that it brings satisfaction with it. When, from the angle of a theoretical articulation, it exposes in behaviour the functioning of oral drives, anal drives, and of others again, scoptophilic or sado-masochistic drives, it is indeed to say that something is being satisfied and it is self-evident that it cannot be designated otherwise than as what is underneath, a subject, an upokeimenon, whatever division must necessarily result for (164) it, because here it is only the subject of a functioning instrument, an organon. The term is used here less with an anatomical accent, a prolongation, the more or less animated natural appendix of a body, than properly in its original sense, where Aristotle, uses it in logic as an apparatus, as an instrument. Naturally, the domain is no longer limitroph. And it is indeed because of this that some organs of the body that are moreover ambiguous in different ways, hard to grasp, because it is too obvious that some are only waste products, are found to be placed in this function of instrumental support. So then a question is opened up. How can we define this satisfaction? We have to believe that there must here be something, all the same, that is not working because what we spend our time on, with regard to these montages, is dismantling them. Does that mean that the pure and simple dismantling implies in itself, as such, in the foreground, that it is curative? If that was how things were, things might have gone a little quicker, and we would perhaps have covered the whole area a long time ago! If we put forward the function of fixation as essential, it is indeed because the affair is not so easy as that. And that what we have to retain in the psychoanalytic field is perhaps in effect that there is something that is inscribed as its horizon, and that this is the sexual. And that it is in function of this horizon, maintained as such, that the drives are inserted into their function as system.

You see then the prudence with which I am bringing forward my assertions here. I spoke about horizon; I spoke about field. I did not speak about sexual act, since moreover for those who were already here two years ago, I posed for the question of the act different premises, undoubtedly, than those that take it as a given that there is a sexual act. They will remember that I concluded that by taking as an aim the question of the sexual act, we can state that by taking the act with the structural emphasis where alone it subsists, there is no sexual act. We will come back to it. Moreover, you can be sure that it is indeed in order to return to it from another angle, that of this year, the one that goes from an Other to the other, that we find ourselves on this path where there deserves nevertheless to be recalled what we concluded using a different approach.

What is questioned about satisfaction as essential to the drive we are also forced to leave in suspense, if only in order to choose our path in order to be able to define it. For the moment we can make the leap from the living experience that is found somewhere at the level of the equals sign of the equation written here. Here indeed is what is at the centre of our questioning today. To what satisfaction can knowledge itself correspond, a knowledge that it is not for nothing I am, in short, putting forward here as notionally approachable, as the knowledge that will be identical to this field that I have just circumscribed, which would be "knowing one's way around, savoir y faire" in this field. Is (165) this even enough? This knowing one's way around it is still a little too close to know-how (savoir faire), about which there may have been earlier a misunderstanding that I encouraged, moreover, as a way of catching you where you have to be caught, in the gut. It is rather "knowing how to be with it, savoir y être", and this brings us back to the angle that is in question for us here. This always brings us back, as it should, to the basis of what is at stake for us. That what the Freudian discovery puts forward is that one can be with it without knowing that one is with it. And that to believe oneself more certain by being wary of this being with it, to believe oneself to be elsewhere, in a different knowledge, means one is fully in it. This is what psychoanalysis says, one is in it without knowing it; one is in it in all the fields of knowledge. And that is why it is from this angle that psychoanalysis is found to be important for putting knowledge in question. It is nowhere from any truth and specifically not from any ontology. Wherever one may be, wherever one functions, through the function of knowledge, one is in the horizon of the sexual.

You must admit that it is all the same worth the trouble to look more closely at this. One is in it without knowing it. Does one lose oneself in it? There seems to be no doubt about that, because that is what people start from. One is screwed up to the hilt. The dupery of consciousness lies in the fact that it is used for something that it does not think it is used for. I said dupery, not deception. Psychoanalysis does not question itself about the truth of the matter. Nowhere can we extract from it discourses about the veil of Maya or about the fundamental illusion of the Wille. Dupery implies something, but it is here less easy to resolve than elsewhere. A dupe, is someone that someone else exploits. Who exploits here? The accent being put on dupery, all the same the question spreads out (fuse). And that is why in a zone which is the continuation of Marxist theory, there is some unease. Might this bloody psychoanalysis not give here – this is the term that I heard advanced like that, emerging in these words, I prefer, as I told you, a discourse without words but when I go to see people it is in order to talk, so they talk, they talk more than me, and then they say something like that: "After all, psychoanalysis might well be a further guarantee for the theory of social exploitation". They are not wrong; only here the exploiter is less easy to grasp; the style of revolution also. It is a dupery that benefits no one, at least in appearance.

So then is the knowledge of analytic experience only the knowledge that can be used not to be a dupe to the tune that is being played? But what use is it if it is not accompanied by a knowledge of how to get out of it or even, more specifically an introit knowledge, knowing how to enter into what is in question as regards this flash that can result from it because of the necessary failure of something which is perhaps not the privilege of the sexual act. It is this question about which psychoanalysis, in fact, has remained on the threshold. Why has it remained on the threshold? The fact that it remains on the threshold in

(166) practice, is something that can only be justified in a theoretical way. This is what we are striving for. But that it should also have remained there on the theoretical plane is, I would say, its problem. Let us leave it to get out of it by itself; that does not prevent us, all of us as we are here, in so far as we are in the frying pan, from trying, we also, like the others, to go further.

It is certain that here, precisely, we find ourselves at the crossroads where, in a completely inverse way to what I stated earlier, we have perhaps to learn from the experience of other dimensions with regard to a certain text which proves with time not to be too different to ours, since the function of the sign and even of the signifier here has its own value, namely, the Marxist critique. It would perhaps be enough for a little bit less belief in progress on one side and the other for us to arrive at fruitful conjunctions - I mean theoretical ones. On this point, everyone knows that I am contributing something that is also an organon, precisely the one that may be of use to cross this frontier, and that some people pinpoint as the logic of the signifier. It is true, I managed to make some statements about this. And they stimulated in a lively way minds that nothing coming from psychoanalysis had prepared, but who found themselves stimulated by things that came from elsewhere. Elsewhere, which is not so simple to specify, because it is not simply a matter of political allegiance. But, moreover, a certain number of styles that in the present time, namely, well after I began to state the aforesaid logic, there were produced all sorts of questions about the handling of this signifier, about what a discourse is, about what a novel is, even about what the proper use of formalisation in mathematics is. So people are, there as elsewhere, in a bit of a hurry. Haste has its function, I already stated the logic of it. Again I only stated it to show the mental traps, I would go as far as to qualify them as such, into which it precipitates. People will end up, by wanting to accentuate the degree to which what I am stating as a logic of the signifier remains in the margin, in some way, of what a certain frenzy, adherence to pure formalisation would allow to separate out from it as, they say, metaphysics. We will end up with the notion that, even in the domain of pure mathematical exercise, the use of formalisation does not exhaust everything but leaves in the margin something in connection with which the question about what is involved in the desire to know is still valid. And, who knows, someone around me suggested it a few days ago, there will be perhaps despite myself one day in mathematics something that will be called the Lacan theorem! It is certainly not what I would have looked for, because I have other fish to fry, but this is precisely the way these things happen. By wanting to consider as closed – and this is indeed a characteristic of something that normally ought to end up elsewhere – an uncompleted discourse, one produces waste products like that. One (167) can still leave the statement of this theorem to an obscure future.

For the moment, let us come back to knowledge and let us start again from what is being stated here. It is not the same thing to state a formula if you start at one end rather than the other. Knowledge, one can say, contrary to our experience, is what truth lacks. That is why truth – which obviously, just by that, puts out of synch the debate of a certain logic, the logic of Frege in so far as it starts on the two crutches of two very notable values, 1 or 0, truth or error. Observe carefully the trouble he has in finding a proposition that he can describe as truthful. He has to invoke the number of satellites that Jupiter or some other planet has. In other words something nice and round that can be isolated, without noticing that this is only to have recourse to the oldest prestige of the way the real first appeared as what always comes back to the same place. Because he cannot advance anything other than the recourse to these astronomical entities, because of course there is no question of a mathematician stating as a formula bearing inherent to itself the truth of 2 and 2 are four. Because it is not true if by chance in each of the 2 there was one that was the same. They would only add up to 3. There are not many other formulae that can be stated as truth.

That the truth is the desire to know and nothing else is obviously only designed to put in question precisely the following, whether there was a truth before? Everyone knows that this is the sense of the Heideggerian letting be; is there something to let be? It is in this sense that psychoanalysis contributes something. It is there to say that there is something, in effect, that one can let be. Only it intervenes in it. And it intervenes in it in a way that interests us, beyond the threshold behind which it lies, in so far as it makes us question ourselves about what is involved in the desire to know.

That is why we come back to the drive. It is no doubt mythological, as Freud himself wrote. But what is not so, is the supposition that a subject is satisfied by it. Now it is not thinkable without the implication already, in the drive, of a certain knowledge, of its character of taking the place of the sexual. Only there you are, what does that mean, that it is not thinkable? Because things can go as far as to question the effect of thinking as suspect. Perhaps we know absolutely nothing about what that means, to take the place of the sexual (tenir lieu du sexuel). The very idea of the sexual can be an effect of the passage of what is at the heart of the drive, namely the o-object. As you know, that was done a long time ago. Dear Eve passed him the fatal apple! After all, this is also a myth. It is starting from there that he sees her as a woman. He becomes aware of all the things I told you about earlier. Beforehand, he had not noticed that she was (168) something extracted from the side of his ribcage. He found it, like that, nice, very agreeable. They were in Paradise! It is probably at that very moment – and in reading the text there is no doubt about it – that not only does he discover that she is the woman, but he begins to think, the little dear! That is why that to say "it is not thinkable" that the drive already involves, implies a certain knowledge, does not take us very far. And the proof, moreover, is that here is the connecting point with idealism. There was someone called Simmel who spoke, in his time, about sublimation, before Freud. It was in order to start from the function of values. And so then he explains very well how the feminine object comes to take on, within this, a privileged value. It is a choice like any other. There are values, one thinks in values; and then one thinks in accordance with values; and then one builds up values.

I told you that psychoanalysis and Freud are not worried either about illusion nor the veil of Maya, it is precisely because one and the other, the practice and the theory, are realist. Enjoyment is something that is only noticed by seeing how constant it is in Freud's statements. But it is also what is noticed from experience, I mean psychoanalytic. Enjoyment is here an absolute, it is the real, and in the way that I have defined it as what always returns to the same place. And if one knows it, it is because of the woman. This enjoyment as such is such that originally only the hysteric puts it in order logically, it is she in effect who posits it as an absolute, that is why she unveils the logical structure of the function of enjoyment. Because if she posits it in this way, which makes her a correct theoretician, it is at her own expense. It is precisely because she posits it as an absolute that it is rejected, and can only respond to it from the angle of a desire unsatisfied with respect to herself.

This position in logical unveiling starts from an experience whose correlation is perfectly tangible at every level of analytic experience. I mean that it is always from a beyond of enjoyment as an absolute that all the articulated determinations of what is involved in desire logically

find their correct place. This reaches a degree of consistency in the statements that refutes all the out-of-datedness linked to the randomness of origins. It is not because the hysterics were there at the start through a historical accident that the whole affair was able to take its place. It is because they were at the right point where the incidence of a word could highlight this hollow which is the consequence of the fact that enjoyment plays here the function of being outside the limits of the game. It is because as Freud says, the enigma of what a woman wants is there, which is an altogether displaced way of pinpointing what is involved, on this occasion, about her place, which takes on its value from what a man wants. That the whole theory of analysis, as is sometimes said, has developed along an androcentric channel, is certainly not the fault of men, as is believed. It is not because they are (169) dominant, in particular, it is because they have lost their way and that from then on, it is only women, and especially hysterical women, who understand something about it.

If in the enunciation of the unconscious as I have written it, the mark of o is raised to the level where knowledge is lacking, it is in the measure that we know nothing about this absolute and this is even what constitutes it as absolute. It is because it is not linked in the statement but that what is affirmed, and this is what stating is in its unconscious part, is that this is what desire is qua lack of the 1. Now this does not guarantee that this is what desire is qua lack of the 1. This does not guarantee that the lack of the 1 is the truth. Nothing guarantees that it is not the lie. That is even why in the Entwurf, in the Project for a scientific psychology, Freud designates what is involved in the unconscious concatenation as having its start in a proton pseudos, which can only be translated correctly, when one knows how to read, by the sovereign lie. If that is applied to the hysteric, it is only in the measure that she takes the place of the man. What is at stake, is the function of this 1 in so far as it dominates everything that is involved in the field that has correctly been pinpointed as metaphysics. It is what is put in question much more than being by the intrusion of psychoanalysis. It is what has forced us to displace the accent from the sign to the signifier.

If a field were conceivable where sexual union functions, it would only be a matter, where it appears to work, in the animal, of the sign. "Make me a swan (cygne)", as Leda said to one of them! After that, everything is fine. Each one has been given a half of the dessert, we are united, that makes One. Only, if analysis introduces something, it is precisely that this One does not work. And that is why it introduces something new, in the light of which moreover even the exploits of eroticism that I made an allusion to earlier, in so far as it engages with them, can alone take on a meaning. Because if sexual union, at the same time, only involved its goal of satisfaction, there would be no subjective process to be expected from any experience. By which I mean not those that, in analysis, give the configurations of desire, but those that, well beyond, in a terrain that is already explored, already practised, are considered to be the paths of an asceticism where something of the order of being can come to be realised. Enjoyment, this enjoyment that is here only highlighted from the exclusion in a way of something that feminine nature represents. Do we not know that nature does not always seem to need to have recourse to it, in order to provide for the necessity of union in its thousands and ten of thousands of species? There are many other systems other than tumescent systems that function in particular arthropoda or arachnida. What is involved in enjoyment can in no way be reduced here to a (170) naturalism. The naturalistic aspect of psychoanalysis is simply this natural aspect of the systems that are called drives, and this natural aspect is conditioned by the fact that man is born into a sea of signifiers. There is no reason to give it any consequence at all in the sense of nature worship.

The question that we are going to open up and which will be the object of our next talk will be clarified, I think, by these premises that I put forward today. How can it happen – it is from here that the question should be taken up - not that sublimation, which is the point where Freud himself marked what I called earlier the coming to a halt of analysis on a threshold. About sublimation he has only told us two things: that it had a certain relationship an Objekt. Am, an, you already recognise the an sich. It is not at all the same as the French en. When the an sich is translated by en soi, it is not that at all. This indeed is why my "en-je" when it is the o that is at stake is also ambiguous. I would have liked to have called it "o-je", putting in an apostrophe, l'o-je", and you will see immediately in this way where we are sliding. This is the correct use of tongues in practice. But, to take up again what is involved, when Freud articulates sublimation, he underlines that if it has a relationship with the object it is through the intermediary of something that he exploits at the level at which he introduces it and that he calls idealisation. But that, in its essence it is mit den Trieb, with the drive. This is in the Einfürung zur Narzissmus. But to refer you to other texts, there are a certain number, I do not think that I need to enumerate them for you, from the Three essays on sexuality to Group psychology, the accent is always put on the fact that as opposed to the censoring interference that characterises Verdrängung, and, in a word, from the principle that creates an obstacle to the emergence of work, sublimation is properly speaking and as such a mode of satisfaction of the drive. It is with the drive, a drive that he qualifies as zielgehemmt, diverted, people translate, from its goal. I already tried to articulate what is involved in this goal, and that perhaps it is necessary to dissociate at the level of the goal what is the path for what is properly speaking the target in order to see more clearly into it. But what need for such quibbling after what I have produced before you today. How can it not be seen that there is nothing easier than to see the drive being satisfied outside its sexual goal. However it may be defined, it is outside the field of what is defined in its essence as the system of the drive.

In a word, to conclude, I would only ask one thing of you, to see where it has ended up everywhere when, not through instinct, that we would have a lot of trouble from today on to situate somewhere, but a social structure that is organised around the sexual function. We may be astonished that none of those who have applied themselves to showing us the society of bees or of ants have not put the accent on the fact that while they are occupied with quite different things, with their groupings, with their communications, with their revels, with their (171) marvellous little intelligence, to see that an anthill like a hive is entirely centred around the realisation of what is involved in the sexual relationship. It is very precisely in the measure that these societies are different from ours, that they take on the form of a fixedness which proves the non-presence of the signifier. This indeed is why Plato, who believed in the eternity of all relationships between ideas, created an ideal Politeia where all the children are in common. From that moment on, you are sure of what is involved, it is a matter of properly speaking centring society on what is involved in sexual production. The horizon of Plato, however idealistic you may imagine him to be, was nothing else, except of course a sequence of logical consequences of which there is no question that they carry in their fruits to cancel out in society all the effects of his dialogues. I will leave you with this for today and I am giving you a rendezvous the next time on the subject of sublimation.

The representative of representation.

(173) I put some little words on the board so that they may serve you as hooks for some of the remarks that I will make before you today. In fact, with the time that has passed, that ought to be enough for you! I mean that starting from these hooks that figure on the first line, question marks, I ought to be able to hand over to at least some of you

so that they can carry out in my place this weekly work that consists in drilling into this discourse. In truth, it would not be a bad thing for people to take up the baton. I mean that, as has been done moreover in previous years, there should be people who are willing to devote themselves to pushing further along a certain number of subsisting objects, that it would be no harm to bring up to date after a certain lapse of time.

(174) It is quite obvious in effect that in what I state, there are phases, levels, especially if you think of the point from which I had to start in order first of all to hammer home this point that was nevertheless clearly visible in what I occupy myself with. Namely, that the unconscious, I mean the unconscious that Freud speaks about, is structured like a language. This is visible to the naked eye, there is no need for my spectacles to see it but in fact they were necessary. A friendly person said to me recently that reading Freud, in short, is too easy, because one can read him and be completely hoodwinked. After all, why not, because taking things in the round, this has been clearly proven by the facts. And the first massive thing, the one that people had to disentangle themselves from had not even been noticed, thanks to a sequence of configurations that one can call the operation of popularisation. Nevertheless time was necessary for me to get it across, and this even in the circle that in this respect had been most alerted to notice it.

Thanks to all these delays things happen that I cannot say are discouraging for me, far from it. It happens, for example, that a M Gilles Deleuze, continuing his work, has brought out in the form of his theses two capital books the first of which is of the greatest interest to us. I think that simply from its title Difference and repetition, you can see that it ought to have some relation with my discourse, of which of course he is completely aware. And because like that, without any delay, I had the happy surprise to see appearing on my desk an additional book that he is giving us. This moreover is a real surprise

because he had not announced it in any way to me the last time I saw him after passing his two theses. It is called The logic of sense. It would be no harm all the same for someone, for example, among you to get to know a part of this book. I am not saying the whole thing because it would be a lot to bite off, but in any case it is constructed in a way that a book ought to be constructed. Namely, that each of its chapters implies the whole, so that by taking a well chosen part, it would not be a bad thing to notice that he, with his felicitous style has been able to take the time to articulate, to assemble in a single text not simply what is involved at the heart of what my discourse has stated – and there is no doubt that this discourse is at the heart of his books since it is admitted there as such and that the seminar on the purloined letter forms in a way the opening step of it, defines its threshold – but in any case he, he was able to have the time for all these things that have nourished my discourse, have aided it, have occasionally given it its apparatus, such as the logic of the Stoics, for example. He allows himself, he is able to show its place as essential support, he is able to do so with this supreme elegance of which he has the secret. Namely, he takes advantage of the works of all those who have clarified this difficult point of Stoic doctrine, difficult because moreover it is only left to us in scattered pieces, outside testimony, with which we are forced to reconstitute, in a way by tiresome illuminations, what (175) effectively was its relief, the relief of a thinking that was not simply a philosophy but a practice, an ethics, a way of conducting oneself in the order of things.

It is moreover why for example the fact of finding on a particular page, page 289, something, the only point on which, in this book where I am evoked on several occasions, he indicates that he separates himself from a doctrine that is supposed to be mine, at least, he says, if a certain report that at a turning moment of my teaching brought before the assembled psychiatric community the essential of my doctrine on the unconscious, that of the two excellent workers that Laplanche and Leclaire were. How on this point, to keep to it, he says, he makes this

reservation. But he does not hesitate, of course, given the great relevance that on the whole this report has, to ascribe to me also something that seems to imply, namely, what he calls, what he translates as the plurivocity of signifying elements at the level of the unconscious. Or more exactly what is expressed in a particular formula that in re-reading this report, because I had my attention drawn to it by this remark of Deleuze, the possibility of any sense, it is written there, is produced from this veritable identity of the signifier and the signified that results, as perhaps some of you may remember, from a certain way of manipulating the metaphorical function, a little bit beyond the way I had done it. And to make the S, rejected below the limit, the bar, by the metaphorical effect of a substitution, function, to bring into play this S joined to itself as representing the essence of the relation in question and operating as such at the level of the unconscious. Undoubtedly, this is a point that I would leave all the more willingly to the authors who represented me in this remarkable report, represented me, because it is in effect what results from a certain manipulation by them of what I had stated up to then.

If anyone was willing to spend some time here going into the detail, that assuredly the excessive duties of my progress which is destined of its nature not to be able to stop at, given that it must still be a long one. If someone were able, in bringing together what Deleuze states in the whole of this work about what is here advanced absolutely not without relevance but undoubtedly in a way that represents a flaw, to establish why it is a flaw, to circumscribe in a more precise fashion what is faulty there, and what makes that fault very precisely consistent with what in this report plays around what I insisted on on several occasions the previous years, namely, what is essential in a correct translation, which comes back to saying in a correct articulation, of the function described as Vortellungsrepräsentanz and of its effective incidence with respect to the unconscious. If someone were willing to propose himself to clarify this which would have the advantage, as is always (176) necessary, to allow, and on this occasion in a public way, those who refer to my teaching - and who, of course, complete it, nourish it, accompany it - from what was able to be stated in a way that they complete and sometimes in a clarifying way, the works of my pupils. To allow there, all the same, to be clarified what in one or other place of this work does not entirely express not, I would say, what was at that moment the axis of what I was stating but what subsequently was demonstrated to be its true axis. While waiting for someone of good will to put himself forward, I underline that the article that I am alluding to The unconscious, a psychoanalytic study was published, moreover I do not know why, in Les Temps Modernes in July 1961, namely, a considerable time after this report had been given at a congress described as that of Bonneval, the one to which there refers what I contributed myself in something edited that itself was much later, in my Ecrits, under the title of Position of the unconscious.

I am returning now to our agenda and I pursue my remarks of the last time and along the axis of what I announced to you as being on the agenda today, which is sublimation. The last time, I highlighted and stressed two things: that what was at stake, from Freud's point of view - there are of course many other passages to be quoted but this one is capital, it is in the Introduction to narcissism - first of all of the relation of idealisation am Objekt, to the object, and on the other hand the fact that sublimation is essentially attached to the fate, to the avatar, to the Schicksal of drives. It is one of those avatars, the ones stated by Freud in the article entitled Trieb und Triebschicksal, drives and their avatars. It is the fourth of them, and this fourth is characterised by the fact that it is constructed mit dem Trieb, with the drive. This term "with" that it is striking to rediscover here from Freud's pen, at least for those who have heard me in the past hammering out this "with" on several occasions. And particularly in taking up the formula of Aristotle: "it must not be said that the soul thinks but that man thinks with his soul". Something is satisfied with the drive. What is it when on the other hand Freud tells us that this drive that he dismantles for us, from these four dismantled terms – it is the formula that I have always underlined

as essential to the drive, it is a montage of these four terms: the source, Quelle, the Drang, the pressure, the Objekt, the object, and the goal (but), Ziel – the drive will find itself satisfying what? This is today what is in question, very precisely because of the fact that it is inhibited as regards the goal, that it elides what is involved in the sexual goal.

It is not enough all the same to translate this into what is undoubtedly the usual thing by thus imagining that it is at the expense of their sexual satisfaction that the authors, whoever they may be, whose works we appreciate, whose works take on a social value, because this is the term with which Freud himself accentuates the matter, that there is (177) here some obscure substitution or other. It is not enough to stay there to give its import to what Freud has stated. This indeed is why the premises, the time that I spent in tackling this subject by articulating explicitly in our two last meetings that sexuality, with respect to what interests us from the psychoanalytic field, certainly constitutes a horizon, but that its essence is much further away again, as I said. Neither its knowledge nor its practice, I am speaking about that of sexuality, are for all that either illuminated or modified by it.

This is what I would like to bring your attention back to again at a time when, on the biological plane, things are certainly clarifying a little. Everything we discover at the level of regulatory structure sometimes take on a strange isomorphism with our statements about the functioning of language. It is assuredly more than prudent not to remain, with regard to sex, at these crude schemas. If you approach with a little attention the works of someone like François Jacob on what is called bacteriography and everything that a rigorous experimental technique allows to begin to be seen about what is involved in the operation of living material, it may enter your head that even before there is a question of sex, there is a lot of copulating in it! That is why perhaps it is not unrelated that at another end of the field, our one, that has certainly nothing to say on the subject of biology, people also notice that it is a little more complicated than that to speak about sex. And that, for example, it would be well not to confuse what is involved in the relationship, this term being taken in its logical sense, of the relation that grounds the conjoined function of two sexes. This seems like that to be self evident, huh, that there should only be two! Why should there not be three or more? There is not the slightest allusion here to the frivolous uses that have been made of this term of the third sex, for example – a book that is particularly remarkable, I am saying in parenthesis, for the irresponsibility it bears witness to – biologically. Why in effect should there not be three of them? The fact that there are two constitutes certainly one of the fundamental bases of reality. In this regard it would be well to notice how far its logical incidences go. Because, by a curious return, every time we have to deal with the number two, behold, at least in our mental arithmetic, sex re-enters by the side door. This all the more easily because one knows nothing about sex. A little indication, like that, that there is an extra chromosome somewhere. It is rather curious moreover that one can never say in advance for a particular species on what side, male or female, this extra chromosome, this disconnected, asymmetrical chromosome is going to be found. So then people would do better to pay attention to the fact that to state something about the sexual relationship, has nothing to do with what is completely substituted for it, and especially in psychoanalysis. Namely, the phenomena of identification with a type described, on this occasion, as male or female.

(178) Having said that, despite appearances, what psychoanalysis demonstrates, is precisely that even this identification with a type is not so easy as that. On the whole, it is only with great awkwardness that people manage to state something about it. The masculine position or the feminine position, people say. Very quickly people slip, people talk about the homosexual position. The least of things, is to be even the slightest bit struck that every time that Freud wants to make a precise statement, he admits himself that it is altogether impossible to rely on this opposition of male or female, and that it is that of active or passive that he substitutes. It would be interesting to pose the question of whether if any one whatsoever of the two terms masculinity, maleness or femaleness ('malité' ou 'femellité') femininity is an acceptable qualification as a predicate. Can one say "all males", can this even be stated in a naïve manipulation of adjectives. Why should an Aristotelian proposition not be dressed up as follows: "Every male in creation", for example? It is a question that would involve the following: does all the non- males, mean the females? The abysses opened up by such a confident recourse to the principle of contradiction might perhaps also be taken in the other sense and make us question ourselves, as in the approach I earlier announced, about what recourse to the principle of contradiction may itself contain in terms of sexual implications.

Of course there are modes other than yes or no that come into play in these phantasies coming from the improbable approach of the sexual relationship. There is the polarity, for example, of the sexual couple. This in the name of a more microscopic view of these filaments that are produced at the moment that, when the fecundating of the egg has taken place, something is established like a field between the two nuclei, a field that should be conceived of less as a kind of field of gradation than as a field involving, according as one approaches the two poles, an increasing and decreasing bivectoriality. Is the fact that it is supported in this way by this image of the field so fundamental in other domains, that of electromagnetics, for example, sufficient to allow us to think that sex and its fundamental relationship, is of that order, two poles, something that is organised, a texture of a spherical order between the two? Naturally, if one begins to ask oneself the question, one sees that the foundations are perhaps not so obvious as that. If we have forms that favour such a support, there are many other questions that may be raised, effects of dominance, influence, repulsion, indeed of rupture that are perhaps indeed of a nature to encourage us to put in question again what, I am saying, is only possible to put in question of course starting from the moment that people perceived the degree to which what controls it is not discussed, is naïve as they say.

In any case, it is very necessary, when people speak about (179) Fortpflanzung for example, of what is going to be made, speaking about the finality of sex, namely reproduction, to see that it is not simply at the level of, when two people sleep together, from time to time a little baby arrives, that this is what gives the image of what is involved in sex. If I began by starting from the effects of sexual copulation at the cellular level, it is quite obviously to indicate that what is at stake is less the third that is produced than the reactivation in sexual union of a fundamental production which is that of the cellular form itself that, stimulated by this passage, becomes capable of reproducing something that is at its very heart, namely, its arrangement. Let us pay attention therefore to these contaminations which make it so easy for us to cover over a function the whole essential of which escapes us perhaps, with the position of plus or minus in mathematics, indeed that of the one or zero in logic. And this all the more because, as I might say, Freudian logic puts us precisely at the sharp end of the fact that it cannot function in polar terms. Everything that it has introduced as a logic of sex comes under the jurisdiction of a single term which is truly its original term, namely, the connotation of a lack, an essential minus that is called castration. Without this, nothing would be able to function at its level in so far as its level is of a logical order. All normativity is organised for the man as for the woman around the transfer (passation) of a lack. This is what we see at the level of the logical structuring such as it flows from Freudian experience.

I ought to recall here what I developed at length in a year that I evoked at one of our last encounters under the title of the Ethics of psychoanalysis. It articulates that the very dialectic of pleasure, namely, what it involved in terms of a level of stimulation that is at once sought and avoided, a correct level of a threshold, implies the centrality of a forbidden zone, let us say, because the pleasure would be too intense. This centrality is what I designate as the field of enjoyment, enjoyment itself being defined as everything relating to the distribution of pleasure in the body. This distribution, its inner limit, is what conditions what at that time and of course with more words, more illustrations than I can give here, what I put forward, I designated as a vacuole, as this prohibition at the centre that constitutes, in short, what is nearest to us, while at the same time being outside us. It would be necessary to make up the word "extimate, extime " to designate what is at stake. At that time, I drew out of Freud's texts – I do not have time to expand on which ones – the putting into operation from his pen of this term that I picked out, all the more striking in that it is distinguished from everything that he may have been able to say about things. Things are always Sachen for him. Here, he says das Ding. I am not going to take up again here, because again I do not have the time, the stress I put on this das Ding. All that I can say or recall is (180) that Freud introduces it through the function of the Nebenmensch, this man who is closest, this man who is ambiguous because one does not know how to situate him. Who then is he, this neighbour who resonates in the evangelical texts in the name of the formula "love your neighbour as yourself". Where can he be grasped? Where is there, outside this centre of myself that I cannot love, something that is more neighbour to me? This moreover is what Freud, at the moment when, forced in a way by its necessity along deductive paths, cannot characterise it otherwise than by something absolutely primary that he calls the scream. It is in this ejaculatory exteriority that this something is identified, through which what is most intimate to me is precisely what I am constrained to recognise only outside. This indeed is why this scream does not need to be emitted to be a scream. I demonstrated in this magnificent engraving called The scream, by Münch, that nothing is more appropriate to its value as expression than the fact that it is situated in this calm landscape, with, not far down the road, two people taking their distance

and not even turning back. It is of the essence that from the twisted mouth of the feminine individual that represents this scream in the foreground, nothing should emerge but absolute silence. It is from the silence that this scream centres that there emerges the presence of the closest being, of the being all the more awaited in that he is always already there, the neighbour, who has no Erscheinung except in the acts of the saints.

This neighbour, is it what I have called the Other, what I make use of to make function the presence of signifying articulation in the unconscious? Certainly not. The neighbour, is the intolerable imminence of enjoyment. The Other is only its cleared out terreplein. I can, all the same, say these thing rapidly, like that, given how long I have articulated for you the definition of the Other. It is precisely that, it is a terrain cleared of enjoyment. It is at the level of the Other that those who take the trouble will be able to situate what, in the book by Deleuze, is entitled with an admirable rigour and correctness, and as distinct, in agreement with everything that the modern thinking of logicians allows to be defined from what are called events, the production (mise en scène), and the whole carrousel linked to the existence of language. It is there, in the Other, that there is the unconscious structured like a language.

The question for the moment is not that of knowing how and by whom this clearing out was able to be made. We must begin first of all by recognising it. Perhaps afterwards we will be able to say sensible things. Only it is very important to define it like this because it is only starting from there that one can even conceive of what is perfectly well expressed in Freud, what I expressed in two terms that I think it is important to emphasise. On the one hand the formalisation, on the other hand the impassability, of what? Of desire. Because this is what Freud expresses, it is the last sentence of the Traumdeutung, the desire that is at stake, unconscious desire, maintains itself in its stability in an (181) impassable way, transmitting the requirements of what Freud

calls, rightly or wrongly, the past. It is not because there is Vergänglichkeit that this ought right away to make us drift towards thoughts of good or bad impressions, of the traumatic neurosis of the little child that still persists in each one of us, and other commonplaces that, of course, are not unusable. But what is essential, is this permanence, this constancy, and by the fact itself, what is meant by this impassability of desire that can therefore be completely reduced to the formal. So then, at what level is the sexual relationship situated as regards what we can formulate about it? This is the sense of the question as it is written on the first lines on the board: the Woman, the Other, the locus of desire that slides intact, impassable under every word or indeed the Thing, the locus of enjoyment?

So then, of course, this indeed is the moment to remind you that if there is a point where what I said to you - there is no sexual relationship - is affirmed, quite calmly in analysis, it is that one does not know what a woman is. Unknown in the box, except, thank God, through representations, because of course from all time she has never been known except like that. If psychoanalysis highlights something precisely, it is that it is by one or several representatives of representation, this is indeed a case of highlighting the function of this term that Freud introduces in connection with repression. It is not a matter of knowing at the moment whether women are repressed, it is a matter of knowing whether the Woman as such is, and of course moreover, and why not in herself, of course. This discourse is not androcentric. If the Woman in her essence is something, and we know nothing about it, she is just as repressed by women as by men, and she is doubly so. First of all by the fact that the representative of her representation is lost, we do not know what the woman is. And then that the representative, if it is recuperated, is the object of a Verneinung because what else can be attributed to her as a characteristic except that of not having what precisely there was never any question of her having. Nevertheless, it is only from this angle that, in Freudian logic, the woman appears: an inadequate representative, alongside the phallus

and then the negation that she has it. Namely, the reaffirmation of the solidarity with this thing that is perhaps indeed her representative but that has no relationship with her. So then, this ought to give us just by itself a little lesson in logic and see that what is lacking to the whole of this logic, is precisely the sexual signifier. When you read Deleuze – there are perhaps some who will take the trouble – you will be initiated into things that the weekly frequentation of my discourses was apparently not enough to make familiar to you, otherwise I would have more productions of this style to read. The fact is that the essential, as is said somewhere, of structuralism, if this word has a sense – only since it has been given a sense at the level like that of a whole forum, I (182) do not see why I would take on the privilege of it – the essential is at the same time this blank, this lack in the signifying chain, with what results from it in terms of wandering objects in the signified chain. So then the wandering object, here, for example, is a pretty little bladder that has been blown up, a little balloon, with two painted eyes and a little moustache on it. You must not believe that this is the man. What is written is that this is the woman, because it is indeed like that that one sees this ungraspable woman going about everyday; this is even what allows us to have a certain sense of the relative with regard to the fact that it might not be like that.

In a less logical epoch, when we go back into pre-history, where perhaps there was not yet the Oedipus complex, there are made little statuettes of women that must all the same have been precious for them to be still discoverable – they must all the same have been stuck into corners – who had a shape like that (drawing on the board). Here there is no longer a little bladder, or eyes or moustache, here huge buttocks and good, that is how a prehistoric Venus is composed. I have not drawn it very well but it was to give you an impression. It was less andromorphous. This does not at all mean what palaeontologists imagine, that does not at all mean that they were like that. The representative of the representation was different than it is for us. It was not one or two balloons. If you remember also the breasts of

Tiresias, "Fly away, birds of weakness...". The representative of the representation was undoubtedly like that. This proves to you that depending on the times, the representative of the representation can be different.

So then, on these premises, we can now advance a little as regards what is involved in sublimation and I told you enough earlier about how Freud articulated it in order not to have to repeat it, Zielgehemmt, idealisation of the object, and working with the drive. Freud takes a certain number of doors through which it can happen. The simplest are obviously the Reaktionsbildung. If we know where the barrier is, namely, on the side of enjoyment, it is quite clear that one can imagine it, classify it, which moreover does not clarify it, among the Reaktionsbildung, the formation of reactions at the approach of enjoyment. But this is still not enough to explain to us how it gets out of step. Now Freud indicates to us in a little note, a sentence at the end, that there are outside all the approaches that he defines as possible for sublimation, other quite simple ones. Simply he does not say what they are. Perhaps he had some trouble thinking them out, in function of the fact after all that if he gave us the elements that can be called intuitive or again much more improperly naïve in mathematical logic about what constitutes our logical material, this does not mean for all that that he himself quite realised that it lent itself to formalisation.

(183) One sublimates, he tells us, with the drives. On the other hand, what do we know? Where do these drives come from? From the horizon of sexuality. Not in the slightest way clarified up to the present because of the fact that they involve a sexual satisfaction. But what we are told, is that their enjoyment is linked to sexuality. It is not a bad thing at this level that we first began by positing that we know nothing about sexuality. On the contrary what we have articulated and what I have articulated, is that in the drive there intervenes what is called in topology an edge structure, that it is the only way of explaining some of its traits. Namely, that what functions is essentially something always roughly characterised by orifices and where there is found the edge-structure. Because only this edge-structure, taken in the mathematical sense, allows us to begin to comprehend what Freud articulated no less at the level of Drang, of pressure. Namely, the constancy of the flux that this edge conditions. I put in a note on this, I improved it again in the last edition, referring to what, in vector theory is defined as rotational flux.

The drive, in a word, just by itself, designates the conjunction of logic and corporeality. The enigma is rather the following: as edge enjoyment, how was it able to be called to the equivalence of sexual enjoyment? If you have all the same a little imagination, I mean the possibility of linking up what you cogitate somewhere in your convolutions with your experience that is certainly obviously accessory and always between two doors, you might all the same say, at the level of sexual enjoyment, it is rather a matter of tumescence for example, and then of orgasm, what does that have to do with the functions of the edge? If there were not the configuration of the vacuole, of the hole proper to enjoyment, to this something intolerable for what is essentially regulated as a tempered tension, you would see nothing in the sexual that is analogous to what I am calling in the drive an edge structure. Here the edge is constituted by a sort of logistics of defence. If one did not know after all that this logistics of defence is met at every turn, even in sexual practice, and precisely in the measure that this practice is something different to what is done in a rush, like that, with the vague little directive flotsam that remains to you from the Freudian vocabulary about the enjoyment of the woman, perhaps something might begin to interest you in a closer, more intimate, more direct way about what is involved, not in the sexual relationship about which you cannot say very much, but about what is involved in the handling of sexual enjoyment. All the enigmas that appear, we do not know why, when people study feminine sexuality, the enigma the sensitivity of the vaginal wall presents to the eyes of some people and makes it in a way I am not saying unsituateable but limitrophe to

(184) feminine enjoyment is something that will find itself much more easily in agreement with the topology that we are trying to approach here. But it is not our subject in its details. What is important is what I am putting forward, that something here resembles the Thing. And this indeed is why we give this Thing, that I made speak at one time under the title of the Freudian Thing, the features of a woman when, in the myth, we call it the Truth. Only it must not be forgotten – this is the sense of these lines on the board – that the Thing, for its part, is undoubtedly not sexed. This is probably what allows us to make love with her, without having the slightest idea of what the Woman is as a sexed thing.

So then that will perhaps allow us to introduce, given the time, the two directions from which sublimation can be studied. If I took care in my seminar on ethics to give a large place to courtly love, it is because this allowed us to introduce the fact that sublimation concerns the woman in the love relationship at the cost of constituting her at the level of the Thing. It is necessary, alas, because I am not going to redo all that this year, for you to refer – but I will try to make sure that you will have the text soon – to the long study I carried out at that time on courtly love to give its import to this. It is very enlightening, and it could be very advantageously re-read in the light of the formulae that I can finally now give in their absoluteness. The ritual of approach, the stages of gradus, as I might say, towards an enjoyment that is arranged, but moreover almost sacralised, is not one of the least amusing aspects of the affair, when one approaches and studies it. To see the awkwardness and I do not mean it is touching, it is simply repugnant, with which the people in these places where there is concentrated the run of the mill of these texts which, of course, no longer interest anyone. These people are irreducibly professors, namely, living in conditions that we all know when we go to visit them. Their major symbol I would say was very prettily given by Anatole France under the title of Le mannequin d'osier. I should also have made another drawing for you of the wicker mannequin, it would be in the opposite direction. This kind of stupor, of bewilderment that lays hold of them, and then, my God, how these people, at that epoch, the dark night of the Middle Ages were so unrefined – can you imagine they were less refined than the professor in question and his little wife. How were these people able to imagine such exalted homage, what does all that mean, all these women that the poets sing to us about, they are all, all of the same characteristics. Obviously they all have the same characteristics, it is also a representative of representation, they are like the prehistoric Venus, they all have the same characteristics. That does (185) not mean that these women did not exist nor that the poet did not make love to them in function of their merits! There were many other things again that stupefied them, including the stress put on trials, cruelty, a thousand things of this kind. I had great fun for two and a half months, and I hope those who were listening to me at that time also had, I will try to clean this up in a way that it can be transmitted. In any case it is a homage, anyway this is what remains to us of it, restored by poetry to what is its principle, namely, sexual desire. The attempt, in other words, to go beyond what is involved, whatever is said about it in Freud's text, in accessible love, outside special techniques, namely, to remain always narrowly narcissistic.

Only there is the other aspect, the relationship of sublimation to what is called the work of art. When Freud tells us that sublimation gives the satisfaction of the drive and this in a production regarding which the characteristic of esteem that society gives it is quite unexplained. Why the devil, when we have so many concerns, if it is not indeed on the hypothesis of diversion. Namely, that it is precisely in order not to be occupied by worries that are much more important that we get a taste for some of the things that are poured out within reach of our purses in the form of novels, paintings, poetry and novellas. Taking the thing from this angle there appears to be no way out. Nevertheless, I will give you, as regards what I will introduce the next time, too rapid a way in. The relationship of sublimation to enjoyment, since this is what is in question, in so far as it is sexual enjoyment, can only be explained by literally what I will call the anatomy of the vacuole. That is why I made on the right the outline of this something circumscribed that represents the vacuole. Imagine for a moment this vacuole as being the auditory apparatus of one these little animals that are called, I do not know why, primitive – nothing is more primitive than anything else – but take a daphne [?], it is like a tiny shrimp, but much simpler, it is found in waterways. The daphne, in something or other that one can say serves it as an auditory organ but at the same time as a vestibule, namely equilibrating, has what is called an otolith. If I know all that, it is because I have looked at the reviews....it is an article by a psychoanalyst, I will tell you who the next time, that drew my attention to it. It becomes very amusing, if, in place of the otolith you put a little piece of iron and afterwards you play around with magnets. This gives him enjoyment! Naturally one can presume it from the extraordinarily different attitude it takes up. Altogether a man in its moral life!

This is what I want to indicate to you as an introduction to the next time. It is that the ~~o~~-object plays this role with respect to the vacuole. In other words it is what tickles das Ding from the inside. There you are. This is what constitutes the essential merit of everything that is (~~1~~86) called a work of art. Nevertheless the thing deserves to be detailed. And since the ~~o~~-object has more than one form as Freud explicitly states in saying in his analysis of the drive that the object can be very variable, it waltzes around, nevertheless we have managed to state four of them, between the oral object, the anal object, the scoptophilic object and the sadomasochistic object. What is that one? Let us say that in connection with this one I am reserving some surprises for you the next time.

I am laying my cards on the table, I am not going to give my seminar – you can call it what you like: my seminar, my lecture, in any case, my thing…I will start again. It is not for nothing that you did not hear me at first. I am not inclined to speak loudly, because I am not inclined to speak at all. And besides that is what I am going to do, or, more exactly, not do. My intention is not to speak to you today. There is a certain relief in that. Because it may be that I have had enough! But in any case, precisely, there is not much relief in it because, as you see, I am rather tired. Imagine whatever you like, a little Hong-Kong, like that, during the weekend, because naturally a psychoanalyst cannot allow himself to be sick except at the weekend. Anyway, the result is there, I will not speak to you today. Moreover this is what I had resolved, to say to you: "Listen, there you are, I am reporting sick; the seminar, as you call it, will not take place today", and then clear off.

It would be too simple. I already announced the last time the pleasure that it would give me to be able to hear something that might come to me as a response, a certain testimony that might come to me of what you are making of what is happening to you in terms of what I am trying to outline this year. It is obvious that many things push me to want it. First of all, a certain feeling, at the limit, of what I might be doing in pursuing here could be, what is pinpointed, it is hard to know why, in fact, as teaching. Does it really fit into the framework of teaching, apart from the fact that it takes place within the perimeter of the Ecole Normale? It is not certain. And then, my God, it has to be said today, why are there so many people? It truly is a problem. But it must be all the same that there is something interesting in it, like that. I have no reason to believe that it will be long lasting, at the rate things are going, I mean this interest taken in what is happening here.

I happened this week, which was necessarily not very stimulating - I rarely get a temperature of 39°, I spent a certain time, I spent two days telling myself that it is surely because there must be something like that not very stimulating in this state that I am still in – to ask myself what is happening here. So then I made a working hypothesis, make no mistake, that what I was doing here whether you know it or not, has (188) really all the nature of a work. This is what perhaps may allow you to glimpse certain things that I said this year. But in any case it is certain. The way I usually talk to you, when I have my little notes, that may astonish you, I more or less look at them; there are a lot of them, there are surely too many, it has really all the characteristics of what happens on a work bench, and why not? Indeed on an assembly line. The papers come from somewhere and will end up also by being transmitted to others. And with that, in effect, something happens as regards which, when I go out, I am always rather perplexed to question, with sometimes a little anxiety, those whom I know are able to say something that interests me. It is certain that I did on this something that has really the character of a work that has been produced with a certain material and which is something constructed, realised, a production.

Obviously, it is interesting; it is interesting to see it being done. It is not all that widespread to have the opportunity of seeing someone doing his work. For most of you in any case, I have the feeling that what this work is aimed at, what it is destined for, cannot but completely escape them. This is still more interesting. Only this gives to the thing, the fact of looking at someone working without knowing where it is going, of what use it is, this gives a rather obscene dimension to the thing. Naturally, it is not true for everyone. There are those who know well of what use it is. Anyway, what use it is in the short term. Since I am in the process of pushing this working metaphor, I would say that my bosses, for their part, know what use it is. Or, inversely, if you wish, those who know what use it is are my bosses. There are some here who are part of them. It is for them that I work. And then there are some others who are between the two classes and who, for their part also, have an idea of what use it is. These are the ones who, in a way, insert the work that I am doing here into a different text, or into a different context, which is that of something that is happening, for the moment, at what one can call the level of the University. I am very interested in it. I mean that there is something in what is happening anew in the University that has the closest relationship with the work that I am doing.

Because of this temperature and this pause that it gave me, anyway, you cannot imagine how happy one can be in taking advantage of having a temperature of 39°, I mean one is necessarily, one can usually put oneself in a horizontal position; it is very agreeable. Finally, when it subsides a little, at a certain turning point, one can open things, entertaining journals. There is one, as you know, the one managed by someone called Jean Daniel called Le Nouvel Observateur. It is no doubt called that in order to make you believe that there is something new in what is observed. You would be wrong to expect it, and the proof is that what I was able to read in it like that, horizontally, is the (189) sort of thing that, if I remember rightly, is something that is called "The young ensnared, La jeunesse piégée". I do not know why, it is perhaps due to my 39°, but this absolutely enraged me. First of all the title. Let every person that uses the word piegé know that the use of this word is considered to be repugnant – this is my own idea – a way of crudely stirring up castration anxiety, especially when one is talking to the young, and for the moment that seems to me to be in very bad taste. And then, faith, there is nothing in it but things that are very astute, very relevant. There is perhaps not a single one that, taking it as a sentence, as an indication of the justification, legitimising of whatever you want, not a sentence against which I could obviously, seriously raise any opposition. All of that is very good. It is very boring because it leaves completely to one side what is at stake. Because of course, I am not against any of the forms, even the most extreme ones, of what associates, for the moment, the contestation, as the student contestation is described, with the most revolutionary unions. But I think that none of this goes beyond the axis of something that has happened as a consequence of certain facts, of certain facts which are the following. "The university was inadequate in fulfilling its function and, all of a sudden, it had got to such a point, to such an excess, people believe, that was why 'May' happened." It is a very serious point as regards the interpretation of the thing. It was inadequate with regard to a certain traditional function, a certain glorious time that it had enjoyed and which had responded to the use at different epochs, of different functions, that had different incidences, precisely according to the epochs, about the transmission of knowledge.

If we place ourselves from the point of view of quality, lustre, historical influence, it is certain that for some time this had taken a turn that was not particularly brilliant, but in any case, there were islands that still held up very well. If it proved to be inadequate at a certain level, it is that because of certain social requirements it was no longer up to the task. The question should be posed if the fact that it was no longer up to the task – not of all, but of certain tasks – it was not, when all is said and done, intentional. I mean that, if, taking things from the angle of power, it was not something that was regulated precisely in a way not to embarrass it too much. It is certain that a certain evolution, which is that of science, risks posing altogether new and unexpected problems to the functions of power. After all, the thing had been announced perhaps for some time. This is how it is perhaps and, it must be said, it would really have a retroactive sense effect to notice that it is perhaps in function of this that the word revolution has taken a different sense, a different accent from the one it always had in history, where revolutions, by definition, were not new. From all time powers only came to an end by revolutions. The Revolution, like that, with a (190) capital R, did not notice soon enough that it is linked to something new which is highlighted from the side of a certain function of knowledge, something that is happening, which in truth renders it difficult to handle in the traditional way.

In order to indicate a little bit what I mean by that, I will bring it back to this something that I indicated earlier, namely, the fascination that can be produced about a work whose meaning people do not know, nor where it is leading. As a way of exemplifying, taken in the model given by what might motivate, in this supposition, your presence here, because obviously, from a certain angle, the reference that I found in the worker-boss relationship also has its prolongation here. The boss knows what the worker is doing, in the sense that he is going to bring him profits, but it is not sure that he has a clearer idea than the worker about the sense of what he is doing.

When you are dealing with the assembly line in Fiat or elsewhere, I am talking about that of Fiat because I already evoked it, here or elsewhere. I was there. I really had this feeling, in effect, of seeing people occupied with work and my absolutely not knowing what they were doing. That made me feel ashamed. It does not make you so, so much the better. But in any case, I was very embarrassed. I was precisely with the boss, Johnny, as he is called, as I call him. Johnny was also obviously...in any case, he too was ashamed. That expressed itself afterwards by the questions he asked me, which all had the obvious aim designed to dissimulate his embarrassment, the obvious aim of telling me that, to all appearances, they were happier there, with him, than in Renault.

I did not take this question seriously and I only interpreted it as you see, as a displacement, or perhaps as a way of avoiding on my part the question: "Finally, of what use is all of this?" Not that I am say that capitalism is of no use. No. Capitalism is precisely of use for something and we ought not to forget it. It is the things that it makes that are of no use. But that is a completely different affair. This is precisely its problem. In any case, what it is supported by, and it is a great force, ought to be clarified. It operates in the same sense as the one that I was telling you about earlier, it goes against power. It is of a different nature. And it causes great embarrassment to power. There also, it is obviously nachträglich, it is subsequently that we have to see the sense of what is happening. Capitalism completely changed the habits of power. They have perhaps become more excessive, but in any case they have changed. Capitalism introduced something that had never been seen before, what is called liberal power.

There are very simple things about which, after all, I can only speak from very personal experience. Observe that as far as historians can remember we have never heard tell of an organ of government that one leaves by handing in one's resignation. Where authentic, serious, subsistent powers exist you do not hand in your resignation, because it (191) has very serious consequences. Either it is a simple way of expressing oneself, you hand in your resignation, but you are shot on the way out. I call those places where power is serious. The idea of considering as a progress, and again as a liberal one, institutions where, when someone has completely bungled everything that he had to do for three months or six months and has proved to be incompetent, he has only to hand in his resignation and nothing will happen to him. On the contrary, he is told that he will have a wait before he comes back the next time; that all the same means what? That had never been seen in Rome! In places where it was serious! You have never seen a consul hand in his resignation, nor a tribune of the people! It is properly speaking unimaginable. That simply means that the power is elsewhere.

It is obvious – the whole nineteenth century illuminates it – that if things occur through this function of resignation, it is because power is in different hands. I am talking about positive power. The interest, the only one, of the communist revolution, I am speaking about the Russian Revolution, is to have restored the functions of power. Only we see that it is not easy to hold onto, precisely because in the time when capitalism reigns, capitalism reigns because it is closely connected with this rise in the function of science. Only even this power, this camouflaged power, this secret and, it must also be said anarchic power, I mean divided against itself, and this without any doubt through its being clothed with this rise of science, it is as embarrassed as a fish on a bicycle now. Because all the same something is happening in the science quarter, something that transcends its capacity for mastery. So then what is necessary is that there at least a certain number of little heads that do not forget the fact that a certain permanent association of contestation with initiatives that are not controlled in the sense of revolution is vain. Well then, this again is what in the system, the capitalist system, can best serve it.

I am not in the process of telling you that things must be reformed. The reform itself, an incontestable consequence of the agitation in May, is exactly of a nature to aggravate its effects. If you have inadequate teachers, you will be given them by the shovel load, and you can be sure ones that are even more inadequate! Through reform the effects will always get worse. The question is what to do with regard to this phenomenon. It is certain that it cannot be responded to by a slogan, but that a process which tends towards the elimination of the best, in the long run, by the path of contestation, which is imposed, in effect, on the best people, will have exactly the wished for effect. This will be to bar for the very best people the interesting route, this joint, this access to a turning point, to a sensitive point, to a full stop put at present, concerning the function of knowledge in its most subversive mode. Because it is obviously not at the level of agitation (192) and hue and cry that there can be refined, treated, produced

something that can give a decisive turn to things. I am not saying what, and for the best of reasons, it is precisely because one cannot say it. But it is only there that there can be presented something new, the only new thing in whose name there can appear what grounds the putting in question of what is presented up to now as this or that, as philosophy. Namely, any function tending to put order, a universal order, a unitary order, this mode of relationship to oneself that is called knowledge.

This trap (piège), that consists in refusing and doing nothing more is, properly speaking, for the moment, for everything that exists, for everything that subsists, most disadvantageous. The assured promise of subsisting and in the most unfortunate way, for anyone who creates illusions about what is called progress, I intend to posit the fact, I can only – to come back to this something, like that, which served as an occasion for it – find in it a further sign, in the fact that the entourage of the one under whose name – since it is an interview that allowed this article under the title of "Jeunesse piègée" – and that since this is how things are, all I can do, at this level, is to bestow on him the title of what, in this connection, has always been my thinking, namely, that after all, his thinking does not go any further, objectively, than that of an entertainer. This is serious enough. It is the testimony, after all, of a man who has lived long enough to testify, in a way, to two between-the-wars. The one between the two previous ones, that I lived with Giraudoux, Picasso, and other surrealists and it wasn't only Giraudoux that was original in all of that, this to tell you that I did not amuse myself a lot. Picasso existed from long before. Whatever you may think about them, these surrealists were a re-edition. Everything that constituted their core had existed before 1914, everything that projected something irreducibly unsatisfying in their presence between 1918 and 1939. You will note that I was their friend and that I never signed the least thing with them. This did not prevent a little scoundrel, named Laurin, who was a Canadian, from noticing it and making of it – I do not know...like that to initiate the public of Saskatchewan – about what I might be, in order to make a big deal of this surrealist root. There was also Parcheminey, a very special personage of the top drawer, with whom I was associated and made a lot of that. I explicitly told him that he should not take it into account, because I myself had taken care not to mark my link to any degree. This did not prevent him from writing "Lacan and the surrealists" ...You cannot be too accurate in feeding error.

And then, since the new between-the-wars, a failed between-two-wars because there is no end to it, this indeed is what embarrasses them, it is the expiry date. The fact is that capitalist power, this singular power whose novelty I would ask you to measure, needs a war every twenty (193) years. I am not the one who invented that; others have said it before me. This time, it cannot achieve it, but in any case it will manage all the same. It cannot arrange one and meanwhile it is very bothered. Finally, in this between-two-wars there was Sartre. He was no more amusing than the others. That did not disturb me. I never said anything about it, but anyway is it not curious that someone should feel the need to encourage so many of these young people to throw themselves against these obstacles that are placed before them, like that, to go to war, in short, a very mediocre war. Is it not beautiful to be able to go up against these muscle bound apparitors, because I approve of this thing called courage. Courage, physical courage is not a very great merit. I have never noticed that it caused a problem. I do not think that it is at that level that it is decisive. And above all it is of no interest. On some occasions, to throw oneself against the obstacles that are presented to you, is to behave exactly like the bull, is it not. What should be at stake precisely is to go somewhere other than where the obstacles are; in any case, not to be particularly interested in obstacles.

There is, in all of that, a veritable tradition of aberration. People begin by saying that philosophies for example throughout the centuries were only ideologies, namely, the reflection of the superstructure, of the dominant classes. So then the question is settled. They are of no interest. You have to aim elsewhere. Not at all! People continue to fight against ideologies qua ideologies. They are there for that. It is completely true that there have always been, naturally, dominating or enjoying classes, or the two, and that they had their philosophers. They were there to be abused in their place. That is what is done, namely, people follow orders. In fact, it is not at all correct, is that not so, it is not at all correct! Kant is not the representative of the dominant class of his epoch. Kant is still not only perfectly acceptable but you would do well to follow his line were it only to try to understand a little bit what I am in the process of telling you about the o-object. Anyway we will come back to that. Yes.

The last time I spoke to you about sublimation. So then obviously, we must not all the same remain there with it. It is not by chance, all the same, that it is at this point that there is a little suspension, or a little suspense, as you wish. Try to describe the relationships of this co-presence seen from your side? From mine? The question can be asked. Let us put it on the side of sublimation. It would be better, in any case, to put it there today, because that puts you in the position of the feminine pole. There is nothing dishonourable about that, especially at the level at which I placed it, the highest elevation of the object.

There are things that I did not underline the last time, but in any case I hope that you have good ears. The idea that sublimation is this effort (194) to allow love to be realised with the woman, and not simply... to pretend that it is happening with a woman. I did not underline that in this institution of courtly love, in principle, the woman does not love. Or at least one does not know anything about it. Can you imagine what a relief it is? Moreover, it all the same happens sometimes, in novels, it happens that she becomes inflamed. You also see what subsequently happens. At least, in these novels you know where you are going. In any case, in a sublimation like the one that can be realised here, I am saying that because it is about time to say it before we tackle another phase of sublimation that I began the last time, the one that is at the level of the drive and which, alas, concerns us much more, to which I gave the first prototype in the shape of the function of the bell (grelot). Something round with a little thing, the little o-object, which is strongly shaken inside. Let us use then, before this comes on the scene, more agreeable forms.

At the level, then, of man-woman relationships, if from the side of my audience I do not have to fear that any madness will occur, nevertheless if someone now wished all the same to bring me a sign of having heard by posing a question, either about what I have just said, or, which I would prefer, about what I have been saying since the beginning of the year. I would like a question or two to be directed to me, on this agreeable terrain for which, you see, I myself make a courteous effort not to disappoint, even on a day that I am at the end of my tether.

Who is there who can pose a few questions?

Do not discourage me too much. Because, after all, I could for my part be also tempted to resign...suppose for example that those whom I called my bosses, namely, the people for whom I work, do not threaten, once my work has consequences that interest them, do not threaten for their part their resignation. That may happen one day. Well then! I will be content to do my work before them. You are not there, all of you, all of you who are not, in short, psychoanalysts in my eyes, anyway from my point of view, my principal use is to give them the feeling indeed that they cannot, for their part, hinder me in continuing to do my work. Even if nobody answers me, from this field of non-psychoanalysts, I see very interesting faces down there. All the same I know my people.

If none of those who are not psychoanalysts ever give me a response, not really a response that amuses me a little, suppose that one day I managed all the same to undo the psychoanalysts, by showing them that it would be just as interesting for them to work because they think that it is the privilege of the psychoanalysand. What is absolutely exaggerated in my way of working for them, is that I am doing, in short, what the psychoanalysand does. They have put the work (195) definitively into the hands of the psychoanalysand. They reserve the listening for themselves. There is among them, according to the latest news, one who summons them by saying "come and listen to me listen. I invite you to listen to my listening."

Now, perhaps, I am going to manage to shake up something on the side of this strange terrain, closely linked in its crucial points, about what is involved in this subversion of the function of knowledge. But I will not give an open seminar. I find that is not very serious. In a way, I question myself before the word of "handling knowledge" because this word "handling, manier" begins to take on a disturbing extension. There is a person, a marvellous chap moreover, who came to find me, who will do very well. Naturally, in the first meeting with me things happen. He came back the second time because you have to see someone at least twice. He told me that the previous time he had "manipulated". I searched my brain...I made him explain it...that means that I had manipulated him. The slippage of words is always interesting to see. The word "manipulate", has become, now, in the permanent vocabulary, through a type of fascination that comes from the fact that people do not think that one can perform any effective action on any group whatsoever without "manipulating" it. This, like that, in a way that is henceforth admitted, recognised. And after all it is not sure that in effect, as they say, the worst is perhaps certain, but after all, that is what it is, yes. But then, that this takes on an active value when one is manipulated, this is a tipping over point that I am signalling for you. If it should spread, you will let me know if you see it continuing like that.

Anyway, this is obviously not the best of conditions in which to pursue questions concerning knowledge at the level at which they are presented, in the measure that psychoanalysis can bring something to it. The last time I highlighted the book of our dear Deleuze, about the Logic of sense. I asked Jacques Nassif, since in truth I am not astonished, I am as they say very embittered by the total absence of response after a provocation that has been pushed that far. It is not manipulation, precisely. There are other ways of working. But this total silence, this total absence of response to my desperate appeals for at least a little testimony! I will leave you a repeat examination. You can write to me. The written happens after the oral. Anyway, if one day, at the end of the year, I gave two or three sessions with closed doors, you should know that apart from the people that I already know, the people who have written to me will have the privilege of it.

Nassif, do you still feel you have the courage, after this exhausting session, at least for me, to take the floor? Well then! You are extremely kind.

(205) Today I am going to put forward primary truths, since moreover it appears that it would be no harm to touch base again. On the other hand, it also seems very difficult to organise these complementary fields of work that would allow us to be in accord, to attune our violins with everything contemporary that is being produced and is profoundly interested by what a certain step in psychoanalysis can put forward at the point we are at.

At our second last meeting, I left things at the point where sublimation should be questioned in its relationship to the role played in it, in short, by the o-object. It is this remark that showed me that it was necessary, that it was certainly, in any case, no harm for me to come back to what distinguishes this function, and that I should come back to it at the level of the experience from which it has emerged, from psychoanalytic experience as it has been extended since Freud. On that occasion, I was led to return to the texts of Freud in so far as they progressively established what is called the second topography. This, assuredly, is an indispensable echelon for comprehending everything that I myself was able to put forward, I mean in terms of discoveries, at this precise point that Freud remained at in his research. I already put the accent on what this word means in my speech, circare: to turn around a central point, as long as something is not resolved. Today, I will try to mark the distance at which psychoanalysis remained up to my teaching, a key point that assuredly from all sides the experience preceding it had formulated, sketched out in certain assertions. It had not been absolutely purified,

resolved, completed, and we will say at least now that we can construct other steps, but that do not correct it, namely, this function of the o-object.

Because it interests us at the level of sublimation, it is indeed certainly, as with this sort of almost clumsy prudence with which Freud put it forward, the work of art, to call it by its name, that today centres, constitutes the aim of what we are stating about sublimation. The work of art is not presented otherwise at the level where Freud grasps it, obliges himself not to grasp it otherwise than as a commercial value. It is something that has a price, perhaps no doubt an exceptional price, but once it is put on the market, not all that distinguishable from any other price. What is to be emphasised, is that this price is something it receives from a privileged (206) relationship of value to what in my discourse I isolate and distinguish as enjoyment. Enjoyment being this term established only by its evacuation from the field of the Other and by that very fact by the position of the field of the Other as locus of the word as such.

What makes of the o-object something that can function as equivalent to enjoyment, is a topological structure. It is very precisely in the measure that simply by taking the function through which the subject is only grounded, is only introduced as an effect of the signifier and by referring ourselves to the schema that I repeated a hundred times before you since the beginning of the year of the signifier S as representative of the subject for a signifier that, of its nature, is other. This means that what represents it can only posit it as before this other. This necessitates the repetition of the relationship of this S to this O as locus of other signifiers, in a relationship that leaves intact the locus which is not to be taken as a part but - in conformity with everything that is stated about the function of the set, as leaving the element itself as a potential set - makes this residue, even though it is distinct under the function of the o, equal to the weight of the Other in its totality. It is in so far as it is here a place that we can designate by a term connecting the interior (l'intime) to radical exteriority, it is in so far as the o-object is extimate (extime) and purely in the relationship set up by the establishment of the subject as an effect of the signifier, as determining by itself in the field of the Other this structure in which it is easy for us to see the kinship, the variations in what is organised from any edge structure in so far as it has the choice, as one might say, to reunite itself in the form of a sphere, in so far as the edge thus drawn joins together at a most problematic point, even though apparently the most simple, of topological structures. Whether we pursue it in this shape, of what produces the torus, by joining the two opposite edges that correspond point by point in a double vectorial line, or on the contrary we have the structure – I am only here recalling it – of the cross cap, or that we have by combination of two different possibilities the structure described as the Klein bottle.

Sphere Torus Cross cap Klein bottle

(207) Now it is easy to see that the o-objects as they effectively function in the relationships engendered between the subject to the Other in the real, reflect one by one, these four topological structures, there are also four of them. But this is something that, to indicate it immediately, I will only come back to later, and by first reanimating for you the concrete function, the function that the o-object plays in the clinic. The o-object before being possibly, through the methods developing its production in the form that earlier we have described as commercial is at levels precisely exemplified by the clinic, in a position to function as the locus of the capture of enjoyment.

And here I will make a jump, I will go quickly and straight away to a certain core of the subject which perhaps my first remarks, coming to you

here today, made a greater detour around. Very quickly, in theoretical statements, I am speaking about those of Freud, the relationship between neurosis and perversion was seen to emerge. How did that in a way force itself on the attention of Freud? Freud introduced himself into this field at the level of neurotic patients, subjects of all sorts of disturbances and who, through their stories, tended rather to lead him into the field of a traumatic experience as it appeared first of all to him, even though assuredly in the problem of what, in a way, welcomed this experience in the apparently traumatised subject, the question of the phantasy was introduced. This is indeed, in effect, the knot of everything that is at stake concerning an economy for which Freud produced the word libido. But again we should entirely trust the fact that these phantasies might allow us, in a way, to reclassify, to rearrange from outside, namely, from an experience that did not come from perverts, what at first in the same epoch – do I need to recall simply the names of Krafft-Ebing and of Havelock Ellis – presented in a descriptive fashion this field described as that of sexual perversion.

We know the difficulty that very quickly arose, after this first approach, already of a topological order because it was neurosis that was at stake, of finding in a way, because people spoke about the reverse side, something or other that already was presented as the announcement of these surfaces that interest us so much because they emerge when a cut slices them. But very quickly, the matter appeared to be in no way resolved, simplified in any way by being presented perhaps a little quickly as a function in stages, (208) neurosis assuredly, presenting itself with regard to perversion as at least repressing it on the one hand, as a defence against perversion. But is it not clear, was it not immediately so, that no resolution could be found by simply bringing out a perverse desire in the text of the neurosis? If this formed part of the spelling out, of the deciphering of this text, it nevertheless remains that in no case, is it on this plane that the neurotic finds his satisfaction in the treatment. So that in tackling perversion itself, it appeared very quickly that it presented with regard to structure no fewer problems and defences on occasion than neurosis. All of this fell under the jurisdiction of technical references whose impasses seem after all,

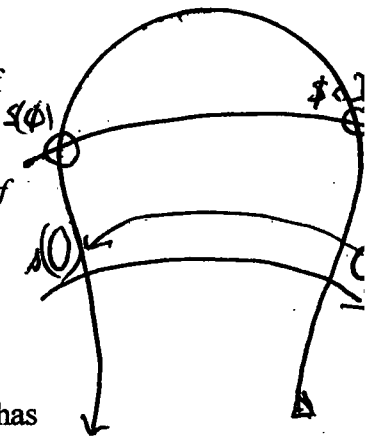
when one looks at them from a distance, to come only from a relative dupery undergone by the theory, from the very terrain to which, whether in the case of the neurotic or the pervert, it has to stick.



If we take things from the level that the return to this solid ground that nothing happens in analysis that ought not to be referred to the status of language and to the function of the word allowed us to articulate, we obtain what I did one particular year under the title of The formations of the unconscious. It is not for nothing that I started from what, in appearance, from what in these formations is most distant from what interests us in the clinic, namely, the witticism. It is starting from the witticism that I constructed this graph which moreover, even though it has not yet demonstrated to everyone how obvious it is, nonetheless remains fundamental on this occasion. As everyone knows and can see, it is made up of the network of three chains, two of which find themselves already marked, if not elucidated, by certain formulae some of which have been abundantly commentated on. Since $ ♦ D marks as fundamental the dependence of the subject on what, under the name of demand, has been strongly distanced from need. The very signifying form, the defiles of the signifier, as I expressed myself, specifying it, distinguishing it and in no way allowing the its effect to be reduced to the simple terms of physiological appetite. This of course is required but illuminated by this medium, is required from the simple fact that in our experience these needs only interest us in so far as they take up the position of being equivalent to a sexual demand. The other junctions, signified as coming (209) from O as the treasury of signifiers, only constitute, at the point that we are at, a simple reminder.

What I want to advance here, since moreover I never saw it distinguished by anyone, is that, even though what is at stake in these three chains are chains that can only be superimposed, established, fixed in so far as there is something of the signifier in the world, that discourse exists, that a certain type of being is caught up in it who is called man, or the speaking

being, that here, starting from the existence of the possible concatenation as constituting the very essence of these signifiers, what we have there and what the complement of this graph demonstrates, is the following. If this symbolic function here of the possibility of return is operating, which is made up of the statement of the simplest discourse, of this fundamental one at the level of which we can affirm that there is no metalanguage, that nothing of all that is symbolic could be built up except from normal discourse. This we can specify from the category that I distinguish as the symbolic, and we notice that what is involved in the upper chain is very precisely its effects in the real. Moreover the subject, which is its first and major effect, only appears at the level of the second chain.

If there remains here something that assuredly, even though always discussed and particularly in my discourse of this year, did not take on, because this is the object starting from which I advance, its full agency, it is what is involved in the signifier as such through which there appears the fundamental incompleteness of what is produced when it is constituted as the locus of the Other, or more exactly what in this locus traces out the path of a certain altogether fundamental lure. The locus of the Other as evacuated of enjoyment is not simply a clear place, a burned circle, of what is not simply this Other, this place open to the interplay of roles, this something structured of itself from the signifying incidence, it is very precisely what introduces into it this lack, this bar, this gap, this hole that can be distinguished by the title of the o-object. Now this is what I intend to make you sense here by examples taken at the level of the experience to which Freud himself has recourse when it is a matter of articulating what is involved in the drive.

Is it not strange, after having put so much emphasis in experience on the oral drive, on the anal drive, so-called outlines, described as pre-genital, of something that is supposed to come to maturity by fulfilling some myth or other of completeness prefigured by the oral, some myth or other of gift, the giving of a present, prefigured by the anal, that Freud to all appearances, should articulate what, in these fundamental drives, is involved in the montage of the source, of the pressure, of the object, of the end, of the Ziel, with the help of the scoptophilic and sadomasochistic drives. What I would like to advance, just like that, is that the function of the pervert, the one he fulfils, far from being - as has long been said, as (210) people no longer dare to say for some time and principally because of what I have stated - founded on some contempt for the other or, as they say, of the partner, is to be measured in a much richer fashion. And that to allow it to be grasped, at least at the level of the heterogeneous audience that I have before me, I would articulate it by saying that the pervert is the one who devotes himself to filling this hole in the Other. That, up to a certain point, to give here the colours that give their relief to things, I would say that he is in favour of the Other existing, that he is a defender of the faith.

Moreover, in looking more closely at the observations, in this light that makes of the pervert a singular auxiliary of God, one will see there being clarified the bizarre things that are advanced from pens that I would describe as innocent. In a treatise of psychiatry very well done, faith, as regard the observations it collates, we can see that an exhibitionist does not manifest his frolics only in front of little girls. He may also do so in front of a tabernacle. It is certainly not simply by such details that something can be illuminated. But simply, first of all, by having been able to map out, which was done here already a long time ago, the function that can be isolated in everything that is involved in the field of vision, from the moment that these problems are posed in the work of art, what is involved in the function of the look. By definition, it is not easy to say what a look is. It is even a question that can very well sustain an existence and ravage it. I was able to see at one time a young woman for whom it was properly this question, joined to a structure that I do not have to indicate any further, that went as far as producing a retinal haemorrhage whose sequelae were lasting.

What prevents people from realising that before questioning oneself about what is involved in the effects of exhibitionism, namely, whether it

frightens or not the witness who appears to provoke it, namely, if it is indeed the intention of the exhibitionist to provoke this shame, this fright, this echo, this something coy or consenting, who does not see first of all that what is essential in this aspect that you can describe as you wish, active or passive, I leave you the choice, of this scoptophilic drive – in appearance it is passive because it offers itself to be seen – is properly and above all to make the look appear in the field of the Other? And why, if not to evoke there this topological relationship of what is involved in the flight, in the ungraspable nature of the look in its relationship with the limit imposed on enjoyment by the function of the pleasure principle. It is the enjoyment of the Other that the exhibitionist watches over. It seems that here, what creates the mirage, the illusion, and gives, suggests this thinking that there is a contempt for the partner is the forgetting of the fact that beyond the particular support for the Other that this partner gives, there is this fundamental function which is nevertheless present there (211) every time the word functions, the one in which every partner is only included, namely, from the locus of the word, from the reference point where the word is posited as true.

It is in this field, the field of the Other qua deserted by enjoyment that the exhibitionistic act is posited to give rise there to the look. This is how one sees that it is not symmetrical to what is involved for the voyeur. Because what is important for the voyeur, and very often is the way in which everything that can be seen is in a way profaned at his level, is precisely to question in the Other what cannot be seen. The object of desire of the voyeur in the slender body, the profile of a little girl, is very precisely what can be seen there only by the fact that it supports [is supported by?] the ungraspable itself, a line where it is lacking, namely, the phallus. That the little boy sees himself sufficiently maltreated for nothing of what, for him, can be attached to this level of mystery, does not appear to hold the attention of an indifferent eye, to project all the more, this thing neglected in him, by restoring it in the Other, by supplementing the field of the Other with it, without even being aware of its support. Here, from this unawareness, the enjoyment for the Other, namely, the very end of perversion finds itself in a way escaping. But it is moreover what demonstrates first of all that no drive is simply the return of the other. They are asymmetrical and what is essential in this function is a supplement, something that at the level of the Other questions what is lacking in the Other as such, and provides for it (y pare). This is why certain analyses, and always in effect the most innocent ones, are exemplary. It is impossible for me, after having, as I did the last time, thrown doubt on the lack of seriousness of a certain philosophy, not to remember the extraordinary relevance of what is grasped in the analysis of the function of the voyeur. The one who, when he is looking through the keyhole, who is truly what cannot be seen, nothing more assuredly can make him fall from a height than being surprised in his capture by this slit, as regards which it is not for nothing that a slit itself, is called a look, even a day. The return is what is at stake, namely, his reduction to the humiliated, indeed ridiculous position which is not at all linked to the fact that he is precisely beyond the slit, but that he can be grasped by another in a posture that only collapses from the point of view of the narcissism of the upright position, that of the one who sees nothing because he is so sure of himself. This is what, at a page that you will easily find in Being and nothingness, has something imperishable about it, whatever may be the partial aspect of what is deduced from it as regards the status of existence.

But the following step is of no less interest. What then is the o-object in the sadomasochistic drive? Does it not seem to you that highlighting the prohibition proper to enjoyment, ought also to allow us to put back in its (212) place what people believe to be the key of what is involved in sado-masochism, when they speak about playing with pain and immediately retract and say that after all, it is only amusing if the pain does not go too far. This sort of blindness, of lure, of false fright, of tickling the question reflecting in a way after all the level at which there remains everything that is practised in this kind of thing, does this not run the risk, is it not in fact the essential mask thanks to which there escapes what is involved in sadomasochistic perversion?

You will see later, if all of this does not appear too daring to you, indeed a speculation that is not favourable to an Einfühlung, and with good reason. For the majority of you, all of you such as you are, whatever you may believe, what is involved in perversion, in true perversion escapes you. It is not because you dream about perversion that you are perverse. Dreaming about perversion can be used for something completely different, and principally, when one is neurotic, to sustain desire, which one really has need of when one is neurotic! But this does not at all allow you to believe that you understand perverts. It is enough to have worked with an exhibitionist to see that one understands nothing about what in appearance I will not say makes him enjoy himself, since he does not enjoy himself. But he enjoys himself all the same, and on the single condition of taking the step that I have just said, namely, that the enjoyment that is at stake, is that of the Other. Naturally, there is a gap. You are not crusaders; you do not consecrate yourself to ensuring that the Other, namely, something or other blind and perhaps dead, should enjoy. But the exhibitionist for his part is interested in that. It is in that way that he is a defender of the faith.

That is why to catch up, I let myself go in speaking about crusaders. To believe in the Other, the cross, the French words [croisés, croire, croix] linking up like that. Every tongue has its echoes and its encounters – croa-croa, as Jacques Prévert also said - the crusades existed, they were also for the life of a dead God; it would mean something just as interesting to find out what, since 1945, is the game between communism and Gaullism. This has had enormous effects. As long as the knights went on crusades, love could become civilised where they had left the place vacant. While, when they were elsewhere, they encountered civilisation, namely, what they were looking for, a high degree of perversion, and at the same time they reduced everything to rubble. Byzantium has never recovered from the crusades. You have to pay attention to these games because this may still happen, even now, in the name of other crusades.

But let us return to our sadomasochists who are precisely still separated. Namely, that because, as I said earlier, in the scoptophilic drive, there is one who succeeds in what has to be created, namely, the enjoyment of the Other, and an other who is only there to fill the hole with his own look, without ensuring that the other even sees there a little bit more about what (213) there is. It is more or less the same case in the relationships between the sadist and the masochist, on the single condition that one notices where the o-object is.

It is strange that, living in an epoch in short where we have resurrected very well all the practices of interrogation, of interrogation at the time that it played a role in judicial mores at a superior level, now that this has been left to operatives who do that in the name of some madness or other like the interests of the country or of the troop, it is curious, after also having seen some little games on the stage with which, after the war in which a lot of things happened, the latest of this type, the pleasure was prolonged a little for us on the stage by showing simulacrums, it is strange that people do not notice the essential function played at first at this level by the word, by confession (l'aveu). Despite everything, sadistic games are not simply interesting in the dreams of neurotics. One can all the same see, where it happens, people may well have their reasons, we know very well what must be thought of the reasons, the reasons are secondary as compared to what happens in practice. Whether effectively it is always around something where what is at stake is to peel the subject of what? Of what constitutes him in his fidelity, namely, his word, one could say that this has a part to play in interrogation. It is an approach. I am telling you right away, the o-object is not the word, but it is to put you on the track. Tackling the question from this angle is very open to misunderstanding, as you are going to see right away. Namely, that there is going to be precisely what I reject, namely, a symmetry, namely, that it is certain that the florid, the beautiful, the true masochist, Sacher Masoch himself, organises the whole business in a way that he can no longer speak.

Why does this interest him so much? Let me be frank. What is at stake is the voice. That the masochist should make of the voice of the other just by itself what he is going to give the guarantee of answering like a dog, is essential in the matter. And it is illuminated by the fact that what he seeks out, is precisely a type of other who, on this point of the voice, can be put in question. The dear mother, as Deleuze illustrates, with the cold voice containing all sorts of arbitrary currents, is here something that with the voice, this voice that perhaps he has heard only too much of elsewhere, from his father's side, comes in a way to complete and here also to fill the hole. Only there is something in the voice that is more topologically specified, namely, that nowhere is the subject more interested in the other than through this o-object. And it is indeed there that the topological comparison, the one that is illustrated here by the hole in a sphere which is not one since precisely it is in this hole that it folds back on itself. An attentive examination of what happens at the level of organic structures, very specifically of the vestibular system or the semicircular canals, brings us to these radical forms of which I already gave you a glimpse a fortnight (214) ago by referring to one of the most primitive animals. Let us add to the one that I named the crustacean called the Palemon [Palaemonias ganteri?], a pretty name full of mythical echoes. But let it not distract us from the fact that the animal, when, at each moulting, it is stripped of all the outside of its systems, is obliged and with good reason, because otherwise he would not be able to move in any way, to set up, in the hollow opened up at his animal level on the outside, in the hollow of what is nothing less than an ear, some little grains of sand, so that they tickle it in there. It is strictly impossible to conceive what the function of the Superego is if one does not understand – this is not everything but it is one of the mainsprings – the essential of what is involved in the function of the o-object realised by the voice qua support of signifying articulation, by the pure voice in so far as it is, yes or no, established in a perverse way or not at the locus of the Other.

If we can speak about a certain moral masochism, this can only be founded on this point of impact of the voice of the Other not in the ear of the subject but at the level of the Other that he establishes as being completed by the voice. And, in the way that earlier the exhibitionist enjoyed himself, it is in this supplement of the Other - and not without a certain derision being possible which appears in the margins of masochistic functioning - it is at the level of the Other and of the remitting to him of the voice that the functioning axis, the axis of gravitation of the masochist operates. Let me say it. It is enough to have lived in our epoch to grasp, to know, that there is an enjoyment in this remitting to the Other, and all the more when he is less valorised, has less authority, in this remitting to the Other of the function of the voice. In a certain way, this style of evasion, of stealing of enjoyment can be, of all the perverse ones imaginable, the only one that is ever fully successful.

It is certainly not the same when the sadist tries in his way, he also, in the inverse way, to complete the Other, by removing the word from him, certainly, and imposing his voice on him. In general that fails. Let it suffice in this regard to refer to the work of Sade where it is really impossible to eliminate this dimension of the voice, of the word, of discussion, of debate. After all, we are told about all the most extraordinary excesses exercised with respect to the victims as regards whom one can only be surprised by one thing, their unbelievable survival. But there is not a single one of these excesses that is not in a way not simply commented on but in a way fomented from an order about which the most astonishing thing is that moreover it does not provoke any revolt. But after all we have been able to see through historical examples that this is how it can happen. There was apparently never seen in these herds that were pushed towards the crematory furnaces someone who all of a sudden (215) simply bit the wrist of a guard. The operation of the voice finds its full register here, there is only one thing, which is that enjoyment escapes here exactly as in the case of the voyeur. Its place is masked by this astonishing domination of the o-object, but enjoyment for its part is nowhere. It is quite clear that the sadist here is only the instrument of something that is called a supplement given to the Other, but which in this case the Other does not want. He does not want, but he obeys all the same. Such is the structure of these drives, in as much as they reveal that a topological hole just by itself can fix a whole subjective behaviour and make everything that may be forged around so-called Einfühlung highly relative.

Since the hour is late and since moreover it required a lot of subtlety to get this across, I had to give it all the time necessary, I announce nevertheless that the problem of the neurotic is the following. You can consult the article that I wrote under the title Remarks on the discourse of Daniel Lagache. It is indispensable to find our bearings in all the distractions of everything that is said in the Freudian texts about identification. The uncertainty, the clear contradiction there is throughout his works, throughout his statements about what is involved in what he calls the reservoir of libido, that sometimes is put forward as the Ich, namely narcissism, sometimes on the contrary as the Id, the ego being obviously inseparable from narcissism is found in a problematic position. Namely, is it because of the object that it offers the covetousness of the Id, that the ego must be said to introduce itself as the effective agency from which there would re-emerge in its turn the interest bestowed on objects.

Is it on the contrary, from the object fomented at the level of the Id, that the ego finds itself secondarily valorised, as a fellow, as well as the objects? This introduces us to posing in a radical fashion, to posing again the whole question of what is involved in identification. It is only in so far as the neurotic wants to be the One in the field of the Other, it is only in so far as idealisation plays a primordial logical role that it finds itself from then on confronted with narcissistic problems. But to simply make this remark, that I am suggesting to you at the same time, of asking ourselves whether we are not undergoing, with Freud in imagining primary narcissism, a deferred, imaged effect, even one that is unspeakably falsified. We add a little bit to it, just what is needed to fall into the snare of the neurotic. Namely, that it is in the measure that secondary narcissism, in the form characterised by imaginary capture, is the level where there is presented for him in a way whose problem is completely different from what is involved for the pervert. This is what I will try to make you sense the next time. It is in the measure that we believe that we are able to think that there was somewhere this relation not of supplement, but of complement for the One and that we invest the oral drive that it presents, nevertheless apparently on the single condition that (216) one is undeceived from the fascination of the neurotic, that there is presented apparently the same character of being centred around a third object which slips away, just as ungraspable in its way as the look or the voice and this famous breast, which with the help of a play on words one makes into the maternal lap. Behind the breast and just as stuck on as it onto the wall that separates the child from the woman, the placenta is there to remind us that far from the child in the body of the mother forming a single body with it, it is not even enclosed in its envelopes. It is not a normal egg. It is broken, broken in this envelope by this element of sticking on through which moreover we now know, there can be bound and played out all the conflicts, that fall under the jurisdiction of 'Byzantism', in the mixture of bloods and the incompatibility of one group with another.

This function of a third object that I call a plaque, or I might say pendant, because we will see it in its outstanding forms in everything that is built up from culture, the thing that is hung on the wall and that lures people. Is this not what appears effectively in the experience of the neurotic? I mean that by converting it, by completing it with the myth of a primitive unity, a lost paradise, supposedly ended by the trauma of birth, we do not fall into what is precisely at stake in the neurotic's affair. What is at stake for him, we will see, I will articulate it in detail and already you can find its first lines sketched in a perfectly clear fashion in this article, is the impossibility of bringing this little o-object onto the imaginary plane in conjunction with the narcissistic image. No representation supports the presence of what is called the representative of representation. One sees only too well here the distance, marked by this term, that there is between one and the other. Between the representative and the representation, there is no equivalence. This is what allows me to initiate, to indicate the point where all of this will be reorganised. The third line of the graph, the one that crosses the two others, is properly speaking what from a symbolic concatenation is carried on to the imaginary where it finds its ballast. It is on this line that in the complete graph you will encounter the ego, desire, the phantasy and finally the specular image before its point, its point which can only here on the left, at the bottom, be grasped as a retroactive effect. Its point only consists in the equally retroactive illusion of a primary narcissism. It is around this that the problem of the neurotic will be re-centred, the manifestation also of the fact that, qua neurotic, he is precisely destined to a failure of sublimation. So then, if our formula of S barred diamond o, ($ ♦ o), as formula of the phantasy is to be put forward at the level of sublimation, it is very precisely not before a critique has been brought to bear on a whole series of lateral implications which were given in an unjustified fashion because the experience, which nevertheless could not have taken place otherwise, the experience of the incidences of the signifier on the subject, was carried out at the level of neurotics.

The Klein Bottle

(217) The vacation time interrupted our remarks. As you see, I also took my time in starting up again.

I left you on the subject of sublimation once it had been opened up, and we will have to continue on with some tallying about what is involved, from the point of structure, about what is involved in perversion. To this, I contributed this specification that we have to define, in a way that my schemas, my notions if you wish at a push, make very simple and very accessible. Namely, does the subject, in perversion, himself take care to supply for this flaw in the Other, which is a notion that you do not get into right away, since it requires a certain development of psychoanalytic experience. It is then uniquely for those who are familiar with my terms

that this formula can take on the value of a step forward. This is certainly an inconvenience that is not the privilege of my teaching. It is a common factor in every science from the moment that it begins to be constructed. That is not for all that, of course, enough to authenticate as scientific what my teaching tries to provide against, to provide against something that in the name of a so-called reference to the clinic, always leaves the review of this experience at what one might well call a function reduced to some sort of sniffing out or other. This of course could not be exercised if there were not already given to it the points of an orientation that, for its part, was the (218) fruit of a construction and a very learned one, that of Freud. It is a matter of knowing whether it is enough to lodge oneself in it, and then, starting from there, to let oneself be guided to what one takes to be a more or less living apprehension of the clinic, but which is only quite simply giving a place to what the blackest prejudices regulate in it. That is taken as having a sense. It is to this sense that I think there ought to be applied a rating (censitaire) requirement, namely, that those who boast of it should prove themselves with sufficient guarantees taken from elsewhere. I will try to say today why these guarantees ought to be taken from somewhere other than in the field where ordinarily they have done nothing either to authenticate what they have received from Freud concerning what makes up the structure of this field, or – which is indeed the minimum requirement – account for it, in order to try to continue it.

I was among the first to hear about the publication of a scurrilous satire whose title, just by itself, is disgraceful, and I will not mention it here because of that fact. Under the avowed patronage of authors who declare themselves from the first lines to be two analysts, it claims to draw up an account, to measure, to reduce to its value - which does not go any higher than horizons that I must say are despicable, that are the rule in a certain field of psychoanalytic experience - to reduce what is involved to what they call, the name is included in their title, to what they broadly speaking designate as contestation. After that, you know what you can expect! The psychic regression, infirmity, sordid infantilism that is supposed to be shown by all of those who, under whatever heading, manifest themselves in this register – and God knows how nuanced it can be. These are really brought down to the level of what in a certain field, in a certain frame of psychoanalytic experience, people are capable of thinking. It does not go any further! I will not add another word. Simply I note, I record that, whatever suspicion there may have arisen in some of my most authentic pupils, this does not come from anyone whose face has ever been seen here. It is a fact. It is a fact that I even confirmed, in addressing myself to one or other person who may have fallen under suspicion.

I must say that the very fact of posing this question had something a little offensive about it. But in any case, from where I am, I have to be able to respond, and respond in the firmest way that none of those who, at any time appeared here to collaborate on occasion, to answer me, who to some degree attended this seminar, did anything other than repudiate with horror the slightest approbation that they may have given to this extravagant initiative, to this veritable debagging of the lowest kind of thinking.

So then these things have been aired. This moreover does not also rule out that, from some quarter, particular people that I am evoking just now may not also engage on a slope that, in the final analysis, does not fail to rejoin (219) what can be expressed in a certain register. That they do not do so, that the whole of French psychoanalysis is not behind the two authors whose names I happen to know through certain communications, and they are not trivial ones, they belong to an eminent Institute that everyone knows, that things are not at the stage that the whole of psychoanalysis is behind them in connection with contestation, after all I can indeed pride myself that it is because of my teaching.

One cannot say that it had much success in psychoanalysis. But, as was said on one occasion at a certain turning point of the adventures, the avatars of this teaching, by one of the very people that I thought I should question, without my suspicions properly speaking going to the point of believing that he would not repudiate this work, it is all the same the same person who, on one of these occasions, in connection with what I was

stating, spoke about nothing less than terrorism. It is supposed to be then the terrorism brought out by my teaching that ensures that French psychoanalysis, after all, let us say, apart from certain rare exceptions, has not distinguished itself either by a great originality, nor by a particularly effective opposition to my teaching, nor by an application of it either. It nevertheless remains that certain types of discourse are impossible because of this teaching. One must really, and this exists, live in a milieu where it is properly speaking forbidden even to thumb through the few pages that I allowed to be published, for such statements to be produced that, I repeat, you will very quickly get to know. If I am speaking about it, it is because a particular weekly that is done by computer already highlights the narcissism imputed in this work to those who carry on a contestation, totally ignoring, of course, the renewal, make no mistake that I brought to this term.

Well then, since there is terrorism and because after all it is not limited to me, that it might perhaps have caught the attention of the authors, for example, that terrorism is not absent from the field they are considering, that it is not simply a search for comfort and reciprocal mirages that governs it. That certainly, in a rather varied way, something is exercised in it that cuts and that excludes, indeed that cuts people off from one another. This reflection, this description of what is an essential and characteristic effect of certain functions in our epoch and very especially of those that, under whatever heading, may be authorised by a school of thought, made me think that I ought to share with you today some reflections that connect very well to this term of what is involved in what must be understood under the register of the customary term that is brandished rightly and wrongly as freedom of thought. What does that mean? How the devil can people even consider that there is a value inscribed in these three words?

(220) As a first approach, let us spell out that if thought has some reference, if we consider it in what we could quickly call its objective relationship, naturally there is not the slightest freedom. The idea of freedom in this quarter of objective references has all the same a core point

around which it arises. It is the function, or more exactly the notion of the norm. From the moment that this notion comes into play, there is introduced correlatively that of exception, indeed even that of transgression. It is here that the function of thinking can take on some sense by introducing the notion of freedom. In a word, it is by thinking about Utopia that, as its name states, is a place that is nowhere, no place, it is in Utopia that thinking would be free to envisage a possible reform of the norm. This indeed is how in the history of thinking from Plato to Thomas More things have been presented. With regard to the norm, the real locus in which it is established, it is only in the field of Utopia that freedom of thought can be exercised. This indeed is what results in the works of the last of those that I have just named, namely, the very creator of the term Utopia, Thomas More. And moreover by going back to the one who put forward, who consecrated under the function of the Idea the term of norm, Plato. Plato at the same time constructs for us a Utopian society, the Republic, where there is expressed freedom of thought with regard to the political norm of its time. Here we find ourselves then in the register not simply of the Idea. And moreover the slightest exercise of everything that I have promoted as distinguishing the imaginary from the real makes us clearly see the framing and formative effect in this register of a reference which goes entirely to its term in the register of the body image. As I underlined, the very idea of macrocosm was always accompanied by a reference to a microcosm that gives it its weight, its sense, its height, its depth, its right, its left. This is the basis of a mode of apprehension described as knowledge, the one in which there is exercised a whole development that quite correctly, is inscribed in the history of thinking.

On my graph where the two horizontal lines that I retraced the last time in order to have them intersected by this hook-shaped line that cuts both of them and determines the four essential crossroads where there is inscribed a certain mapping out. This hook-shaped line that rises and descends to cut both of them, is precisely, I remind you, the line in which there are inscribed and very precisely in the interval left by the two respective lines of stating and stated, in which there are inscribed the properly speaking

imaginary formations, specifically, the function of desire in its relationship to phantasy, and of the ego in its relationship to the specular image. This means that the registers of the symbolic, in so far as they are inscribed in the two horizontal lines are not without a relationship, do not fail to find support in the imaginary function. But what is legitimate about them, I mean what can be rationally assimilated, must remain limited. This is why (221) the Freudian doctrine is a rationalist doctrine; it is uniquely in function of what can be articulated in defensible propositions, in the name of a certain logical reduction, that anything whatsoever can be admitted or on the contrary ruled out.

What is the status, at the point that we are at in science, of this imaginary function taken as a foundation for scientific investigation? It is clear that it is completely foreign to it. In anything we tackle, even at the level of the most concrete sciences, biological sciences for example, what is important is not to know how things are in the ideal case. It is enough to see the embarrassment of having recourse to the thinking that solicits from us every question of this order, namely, what is health for example? You should consider that what organises our scientific advance is not situated in the order of the ideal. What is important, in connection with everything that is and that we have to question, is how it can be replaced.

I think that this is sufficiently illustrated for you by the way it is used with the organic questioning of the functions of the body. It is not by chance, excess, acrobatics, exercise, that what appears to be most clear in the analysis of a particular function, is that one can replace an organ by something that does not look the least bit like it. If I started from an example that is raging today, it is certainly not to create an effect, because what is at stake is of a quite different nature. If this is how things are, it is because science did not develop from the Platonic idea but from a process linked to the reference to mathematics. Not what manifested itself as such at the origin, the Pythagorean one for example to give you an idea, namely, the one that connected the number to an ideal of the sort of those that I was referring to in speaking about Plato. In Pythagoras there is an essence of the One, an essence of the Two, even of the Three, and at the end of a certain time one comes to a stop. When one gets to Twelve, one is out of breath, this has absolutely nothing to do with the way in which we now question what number is. Between the formulae of Peano and this Pythagorean exercise there is absolutely nothing in common.

The idea of function, in the mathematical sense, but here it is not for nothing that it is homonymous with the style in which I saidearlier the organic function could be questioned, this function is always in the final analysis organised from a concatenation between two signifying chains, x = function of y. Here is the starting point, the solid foundation on which mathematics converge, because it did not at all appear so pure at the start. In accordance with the style, properly speaking, of the symbolic chain it is the point of arrival that gives its sense to everything that went before.

In so far as the theory of mathematics, I will not say has culminated, because already it is sliding forward, but let us stay with what constitutes (222) its point of equilibrium in our time, set theory, we note that the essential of numerical ordination is reduced in it to what it is, to its articulatory possibilities. It is constructed to strip this numerical order of all its ideal or idealised privileges, those that I was evoking as I could just now in recalling for you what was the One, the Two, indeed one or other number, in a tradition that we can describe broadly speaking as Gnostic. Set theory precisely is constructed to strip this numerical ordering – and this is what I call of ideal or imaginary privileges – of the unit. There is no trace of the unit in Peano's definitions, a number is defined with respect to zero and the function of the successor. The unit has no privilege in it – of unity, of corporeality, of essentialness, of totality itself. It must be clearly marked by the fact that an example cannot in any way be confused with a class. And by some feature like the fact that to speak about the part is profoundly contrary to the functioning of the theory, that the term sub-set is very precisely constructed to show that one cannot in any way inscribe in it that the whole is made up of the sum of the parts. As you know, sub-sets constitute from their union something that is in no way identifiable to the set, even by stripping away from it at the foundation, this is the sense of set theory, of recourse to space itself.

I apologise for this introduction designed to mark out the terms of an opposition that is as profound as it is necessary, the one in which there is defined what? The revolution or the subversion if you wish of the movement of a knowledge because, for some time, it is clear that I have taken off from the functioning here which is only inaugural, indeed supposed by thinking. It is indeed because I started from Plato that I could speak about thinking. So then it is not at all from the side of objective orientation that we have to question thinking about its freedom. In that quarter, it is not free, in effect, except in Utopia, which has no place in the real. Only, one of the interests of the very process that I took, is that undoubtedly, this discourse has something to do with thinking. This retreat from what is involved in the two aspects of knowledge, we shall call what? A reflection? A debate? A dialectic? It is in the subjective field, quite obviously, and inasmuch as, if the thing were possible, you would have an occasion to answer me, that we would, no doubt, have to make other diversities intervene.

In the foreground first of all, the notion of "all" (tous). In what I have just said what can be accepted by all? Does this "all" have a sense? We will rediscover the same opposition here. We will notice the moulting that logical requirements have taken on, and that moreover, to push such a debate sufficiently far, we would be led, to promote the function of the (223) axiom. Namely, a certain number of logical prefigurations that are held to ground what follows and moreover, to make what follows depend on the assent given or not to the axiom. The uncertainty of this "all" will be put in question not at all simply from the fact that concretely the unanimity of the "all" is the most difficult thing to obtain, but that the logical expression of the "all" proves to be very precarious, provided that, in the order of logic, we have the order of requirements that necessitates the theory of quantifiers. Pulling back from this, not going to involve myself in developments that would send us astray with respect to what we have to question, I will ask how there is expressed in this register what is involved in freedom of thought.

Here Hegel is a reference point that is not simply convenient but essential. In this axis that interests us, he prolongs the inaugural cogito. Thinking surrenders itself if one questions the centre of gravity of what is qualified there as Selbstbewusstsein. I know that I think. The Selbstbewusstsein is nothing else. Only what he adds to Descartes, is that something varies in this "I know that I think", and this is the point where I am. This, I was going to say by definition, in Hegel, I do not know. The illusion is that I am where I think. Freedom of thought here, is nothing other than what Hegel forbids me to think about, which is that I am where I want to be. In this respect, what Hegel reveals, is that there is not the slightest freedom of thought. The time of History is necessary so that at the end, I think at the right place, at the place where I will have become Knowledge. But, at that stage, there is absolutely no longer any need for thinking. I am carrying out a rather mad exercise before you because it is obvious, for those who have never opened Hegel, all of this cannot go very far. But in any case I hope all the same that there are among you enough people who are more or less introduced to the dialectic of the master and the slave, to remember what happens to the master who has the freedom – this is how he defines

him at least, he is the mythical master – what happens when he thinks, namely, when he puts his mastery into the strangeness of language. He enters into thinking, perhaps, but undoubtedly it is the moment when he loses his freedom. That the slave, as 'vile consciousness', is the one who realises History. In work, his thinking is at every phase the servant of the step that he has to take to accede to the kind of state where there is realised what? The domination of knowledge. It is almost impossible to undo the fascination of Hegel. It is only some people of bad faith who consider that I have promoted Hegelianism within the Freudian debate. Nevertheless, you must not imagine that I think that one can finish with Hegel like that. This notion that the truth of thinking is elsewhere than in itself and is necessitated every moment by the relation of the subject to knowledge, and that this knowledge itself is conditioned by a certain number of necessary phases, is a grid whose applicability we cannot but sense at every instant, at every detour of our experience. It is of exemplary value as an exercise, (224) as a formation. It is really necessary to make an effort at disorganising, of veritable awakening to ask ourselves why, however little I may know it, there is this delay which means that I must think in order to know.

If one looks more closely at it, questions oneself, what does the articulation of effective knowledge with the way in which I think about my liberty matter, namely, "I am where I want"? It is clear from Hegel's demonstration that I cannot think that I am where I want. But it is no less clear in looking closely at it that it is this and nothing else that is called thinking. So that this "I am there where I want" which is the essence of freedom of thought as a stating is properly what cannot be stated by anyone. At that moment there appears this strange thing that in Hegel, in the Phenomenology and not in the Encyclopaedia, but where there is marked in the sharpest way this dialectic proper to thinking, this can be done in the absence of any history of knowledge. In the whole of the Phenomenology of the spirit, it is a matter of a reference to a truth that allows to be highlighted what thinking does not know about its function. From then on it is clear that where does Hegel detect it if not from his knowledge, I mean the knowledge of his time, of his epoch, of this scientific knowledge as Kant had accounted for it, Newtonian knowledge. Let us say in a word, for those who understand, this limit-knowledge that marks the apogee and the end of theology.

The difference between Hegel and Freud is the following. Thinking is not simply the question put about the truth of knowledge, which is already a lot and essential in the Hegelian step. Thinking, says Freud, bars the entry to a knowledge. Do I need to recall what is at stake in the unconscious, namely, how the first access to a knowledge had been thought out? The Selbstbewusstsein of Hegel, is "I know what I think". The Freudian trauma is an "I do not know", itself unthinkable since it supposes an "I think" dismantled of all thinking. The point of origin, not to be understood developmentally but structurally when it is a matter of understanding the unconscious, is that it is in this nodal point of a failing knowledge that there is born, in the form then of what can be called, on condition that you put the two last words in a sort of parenthesis, the desire (to know). This is simply unconscious desire in its structure. Moreover, I have for a long time marked on the upper line of my graph "he did not know" in connection with the celebrated dream of "he did not know that he had died". The "he did not know" is the putting in question of the stating as such of the subject divided at the origin. This is what creates the dimension of desire, being that of the desire of the Other. It is in so far as in the traumatic phantasy this desire of the Other cannot be formulated, that desire takes seed in what can be called, on the condition of putting the last words in parenthesis, the desire (to know). And we find there right away the fundamental themes on which I insisted. If the desire of the (225) Other is such that it is closed off, it is because it is expressed in what is characteristic of the traumatic scene, that the body is glimpsed there as separated from enjoyment. The function of the other is incarnated here. It is this body perceived as separated from enjoyment.

The step that Freud makes us take concerning this function of thinking with respect to Selbstbewusstsein, is that the essence of the "I know that I think", of this Selbstbewusstsein is nothing other than the excessive accent that is put on what "I know" while forgetting this "I do not know" which is its real origin. It is already against the division that this "I do not know" implies that the simple fact of the presence of the negation puts in suspense, as I might say – but precisely I am not saying it. It is an "I do not know" that the "I know that I think" is designed to screen in a definitive fashion. The truth henceforth is no longer the place where this

"that I think" in Hegel really is. The truth is the designation of the place from which this "that I think" is motivated. Note that if this ought to be taken in all its rigour, there is nothing to be said about this place which has any sense. It is created by a "that means nothing". It is the place where "that means nothing" commands a replacement "that means".

I do not know for how many of you this recalling of these primary truths may be of use. But for the others I put some key words on the board which recall what I have already elucidated at length in a topology. Namely, this reference to the Klein bottle in so far as it gives us in a surface topology the possibility of a division, in which what is at the neck, namely, this little circle, where the surface is supposed to retrogress. And we will put on the one hand the truth and on the other knowledge. Note that in this schematisation there should be here a somewhere that reunites them, that is the same shape as the one that I am trying to make present more simply in the Moebius strip.

What is important is to pose some questions here. This truth which is the one that we question in the unconscious as creative failure of knowledge, as the original point of the desire to know, is the schema that comes from a knowledge condemned never to be in a way anything but the correlate of this failure. Is this not for us, in questioning things further, whether all thinking, and not simply the spontaneous thinking of whoever is oriented in the established realities of life, but thinking as such, namely, as questioning itself on this Hegelian point which is where a certain style of knowledge really situates the subject. If all of this thinking is defined as being essentially censorship, because this is what the Freudian articulation means, it is that this "I do not know", from the fact that it is radically forgotten, is impossible to return to its place, thinking-censorship, call that what you wish, slide the words, pensée-censure. Do we not sense there at least one of these essential correlatives of what is put abroad in our epoch (226) about a so-called end of philosophy?

There is an objection of structure, precisely, which is that philosophy, or even as is better said on occasion metaphysics, metaphysics never did anything but that, to consider itself as at an end. So then it must not be believed that because people bring in Kierkegaard, Marx and Nietzsche, as they say, this takes us so much outside the limits of the blueprint, uniquely seen from this point of view. This is only interesting in order to continue to question what is in our day, you should note it all the same, the most contested thing in the world, even though people arm themselves with nothing else, namely, freedom of thought. Whereever people work to realise something that seems to be the domination of knowledge – I mean where people work seriously, not where it is a fair – there is no freedom of thought. That does not prevent the students in Prague from going on strike for it.

So then what does that mean? It is in the measure that our analytic experience can perhaps contribute here an outline of reflection that this whole discourse is being carried on. If we proceed in experience by making hold up what? A discourse that is defined how? Free associations, that means without a link to the Other. You speak in analysis. This means that you have been freed from all the rules of the game. And to what, great God, is that going to lead? Not even to an aesthetic text. Because the surrealists, when they wanted to proceed along this path, you can imagine that at the end they made good use of a pair scissors, for that to end up by making something that we will speak about again, the work of art. That one should be able to arrive at it like that is already strongly indicative but quite impermeable to anyone who does not have an idea of the o-object.

We are not talking today about the o-object. What we are talking about is the following. That in order to give oneself over to such an exercise, that normally can only end up at a profound logical inadequacy – and that is all Freud means in reality when he says that the unconscious does not know the principle of contradiction, the principle of contradiction is something extraordinarily elaborated in logic and that one can even do without in logic, one can construct a whole logic without making use of negation, I am talking about a formal logic in the field of knowledge – if we can use a discourse that is free of logic, it is certainly not unattached to grammar. The fact is that in grammar there must remain something very rich in properties and consequences which ensures that we notice that a phantasy is expressed in nothing better than a sentence which has no sense other than grammatical. That in its operation in any case, as regards the formation of the phantasy, it is only debated grammatically, namely A child is being beaten, for example. It is in so far as something is only

censored in it and can only be censored in it from the grammatical (227) structure, namely, the agent for example, that something can operate around this sentence.

The neuroses then revealed the distinction between grammar and logic. It might be a matter of taking a further step and even if they do not reveal it right away, like that, openly, to tell us that if we discover – and this is what I am striving for – the homology of something that one can only know obviously by having done a little logic, the homology of flaws that is demonstrated by a correct logic, namely, one that is not more than a century old. Namely, which ensures that one sees for example that it is from the localisation somewhere of an undecideable that there depends the consistency of one of the most secure systems, namely arithmetic. That there is a homology between these flaws of logic and the structure of desire in so far as it is in the final term a connotation of the knowledge of relationships of the man and the woman by something that is most surprising, through the lack or the non-lack of an organon, of an instrument, in other words the phallus. That the enjoyment of the instrument creates a barrier to the enjoyment that is the enjoyment of the Other in so far as the Other is only represented by a body, in a word, as I stated it, I think, with sufficient force. That there is nothing that can be structured that is properly the sexual act, if this is correctly demonstrated, joins it, buckles it, is something that rejoins truth and knowledge from behind is conceivable. Thinking is precisely this Vorstellungs-repräsentanz, this thing that represents the fact that there is something

unrepresentable because barred by the prohibition of enjoyment. At what level? At the most simple, at the organic level. The pleasure principle, is this barrier to enjoyment and nothing else.

That it should be metaphorised in the prohibition of the mother is after all something that is historically contingent and the Oedipus complex itself is only attached to that. But the question lies deeper. Castration, namely, the hole in the apprehension of this "I do not know" as regards the enjoyment of the Other, ought to be rethought as regards its relationships to the widespread, omnipresent effects of our science – these two points that seem to be very far from this dam which ensures that this sex that we speak about all the time, far from taking a step in any solution whatsoever of the field of the erotic, continues rather to obscure it, and marks out more the inadequacy of our reference points - that there is a relationship between that and these effects that I called widespread of our knowledge. Namely, this prodigious unfurling of the relationship to the o-object that the use of our mass-media are only the return, the presentification of, is not this just by itself the indication of what is involved in freedom of thought?

Because suppose that the structure is effectively here that of the Klein bottle, that the limit is effectively this locus of turning inside out where what was the front becomes the back and inversely, where apparently truth (228) is separated from knowledge. Let it be sufficient for us to think that this limit is not fixed, that of its nature it is everywhere, namely, that the question is posed for us of what to do so that there should not be stuck at a purely imaginary fixed point this division between truth and knowledge. And it is indeed this about which, for want of having even begun to suggest the problem in this way, the psychoanalysts are content to give a demonstration in this form of absolutely not being able to detach themselves from a certain stasis of this limit. Every treatment of neurosis that limits itself to the exhaustion of the identifications of the subject, namely, very precisely of that by which he is reduced to the other, no treatment of these identifications, we will come back to it, carries in itself any promise of resolution of what constitutes the knot for the neurotic.

What constitutes the knot for the neurotic, I will not say here today, I would be forced to go too quickly. But what I mean, is that because of what is involved in the nature of the neurotic, which is profoundly that he is asked what is involved in his desire, can the question not be posed whether the psychoanalyst is not here complicit by sustaining without knowing it the foundation of the structure of the neurotic, namely that his desire can only be sustained from this demand. In a word, curiously, if one can say that analysis consisted in a rupture with hypnosis, it is perhaps for a reason that is quite surprising when one considers it. It is that in analysis, at least in the form in which it stagnates, it is the analyst that is hypnotised. At the end, the analyst ends up by becoming the look and the voice of his patient. This is very different from what is presented, an illusion of thought, as recourse to the clinic. It would perhaps not be separating oneself from the clinic to pay attention to the fact that this mutation does not take place. I am only, as you can well imagine, indicating the ways that we will push forward in the sessions to come.

I would only like to end by making this remark. If I limited myself in my life to commenting my experience and questioning it in its relationships to Freud's doctrine, it is precisely with the aim of not being a thinker but, a thinking, the one Freud already constituted. To question it while taking into account what determines it, as regards what, speaking in a Hegelian way, constitutes or not its truth.

Seminar 18: Wednesday 30 April 1969

(229) Perhaps some of you, who by chance, might be philosophers, may glimpse that a question that has been put behind us, through some sort of lassitude rather than from having received an effective solution, the one that opens up between the terms of idealism and realism, is being asked again here. As we are going to see later, it is fairly easy to get the measure of idealism, you can pick it up from the writings of those who have proposed this doctrine. You will see that up to a certain point I will take support in something that has not been refuted. It has not been refuted philosophically. This means that common sense which is, of course, realist, realist in the terms that idealism poses the question, namely, that according to it we are only supposed to know the real from representations, it is clear that this position that, from a certain schema, is irrefutable, can all the same be refuted once one does not make of the representation the pure and simple reflection of the real. I am going to come back to it.

It is notable that it is from within philosophy itself that the decisive blows have been dealt against idealism. Namely, that what was put forward first of all in the mythology of representation was able to be displaced into another mythology, the one that puts in question not representation but the function of thinking qua ideology. Idealism could only hold up by confusing the order of thought with that of representation. The matter is articulated, as you see, very simply and one can believe one is a realist by making of thinking what it is, something that is dependent on what is called on this occasion the real. Is this sufficient? It is difficult not to perceive that even within the mythology, that is what I call it, of ideology as dependent on a certain number of conditions and specifically social ones, namely, those of production, is it a position of realism to refer oneself to a real that as such, namely, in the fact that thinking is always dependent on it, cannot by this fact be fully apprehended, and this all the more in that we consider ourselves to be in a position to transform this real properly speaking. These are global reflections. What I want to point out, is that this real with respect to which we ought to consider – this is the sense of what is called the critique of ideology – our knowledge as in progress, is an integral part of the subversion that we are introducing into the real. The question is the following, is this knowledge in progress already there somewhere? It is the question that I posed (230) under the terms of subject supposed to know.

It is always as a presupposition and, in a word, a prejudice that is all the less criticised because it has not been seen that, even in excluding what the idea of knowledge indicates in terms of mysticism, even by having understood that the step of science consists properly speaking in having renounced it, by constituting a knowledge which is a system developing from the radical presupposition that we are dealing with nothing other than systems, that the subject does not only handle but in which he can purify himself as such, being nothing more than the support of what is articulated as organised knowledge in a certain discourse, a discourse separate from that of opinion, and that as such is distinguished from it as a discourse of science. It remains that even when this step has been taken, no serious question has been posed about the implications that, despite ourselves, persist of this prejudice in so far as it is not criticised. Namely, that in order to discover this knowledge ought we, yes or no, to think - a fact of thinking - that there is a place where, whether we want to or not, we conceive of this knowledge as already organised. As long as the consequences properly speaking of a radical putting in suspense of this question of the subject supposed to know have not been tested, we remain in idealism and, in a word, in its most backward form. In the one that, when all is said and done, has remained unshaken in a certain structure and that is called, neither more nor less, theology. The subject supposed to know is God, full stop, nothing else. And one can be a savant of genius, and not, as far as I know, for all that be obscurantist, one can in a word be Einstein, and have recourse in the most articulated way to this God. He has to be already there, supposed to know, since Einstein, arguing against the restructuring of science on the foundations of probability, argues that the knowledge that he articulates in his theory presupposes somewhere, commends itself, by something that is homogenous to what is indeed a supposition concerning this subject. He names him in the traditional terms the good old God, difficult perhaps to penetrate in that he sustains the order of the world, but not a liar. He is fair. He does not change the goalposts during the game.

And it is on this admission that the rules exist already, that somewhere the rules of the game, the one that presides over this deciphering that is called knowledge, are established simply by the fact that the knowledge already exists in God. It is at this level that one can question what results from a veritable atheism, the only one, as you see, that merits the name, which is the following: is it possible for thinking to sustain the confrontation of the putting in question of the subject supposed to know.

This, it must be said, is a putting in question that, though I am reformulating it, in no way means that again this formula here constitutes a step forward in anything whatsoever. Not of course that it is not a step that essentially occupies me. The fact is, in what I have to (231) articulate, which is solidary with it, namely psychoanalysis, I can only manage by getting across first of all what I solicited from the analysts: at least to have an up-to-date discourse about what they are effectively handling. Call that what you want, treatment, analytic experience, it is all one. And, in this respect, their thinking remains backward to the point that it is easy to put your finger on the fact that it is, when all is said and done, to one of the briefest forms of summing up the subject that there are attached particular notions that are by no means harmless. To take account of what the subject does in the treatment, to account for it in terms that by being attached to prejudices that for their part are summary, a veritable degradation of what critical thinking has been able to touch on at one or other of its turning points, is not without multiple consequences. First of all, by reinforcing everything that is signalled to us in thinking as being essentially constituted by a resistance. And then styles of intervention that can only reinforce in the subject described more or less correctly as the patient, but in any case, anyway, treated, woven into the very act of psychoanalytic experience, reinforce the same prejudices in the subject.

And to say what is at stake in a really obvious way, I will focus it on the terms of inside and outside that are evoked. That these terms are, of course, in Freud's discourse from the origin, is not a reason for us not to question them in the closest possible way. Otherwise we risk seeing being produced these sorts of deviations that hinder what might be glimpsed in analytic experience that is of a nature to nourish or at the very least flow into the essential question, that of the subject supposed to know. As long as the subject supposed to know before we know has not been put in question in the most serious way, one could say that our whole approach remains attached to what, in a thinking which is not detached from it, is a factor of resistance. Because a defective conception of the terrain on which we pose questions inevitably leads to their radical distortion.

How, with the use that is currently made by the analyst, not simply day by day but every minute, of the terms projection and introjection, how, if they are not criticised in themselves in a correct fashion, how can we not see their inhibiting effect on the thinking of the analyst himself. And much more their suggestive effect in the interpretative intervention and in a style that there is no excess in saying can only be cretinising. Does an inside and an outside, which seem to be self-evident if we consider the organism, namely, an individual who in effect is indeed there - what is inside, is what is in his sack of skin, and what is outside, is all the rest. That from there the step should be taken that what he represents to himself about this outside ought also to be inside the sack of skin is something that, in a first approach, appears a modest, self-evident, step. It is exactly on this after all that there is (232) based the articulation of Bishop Berkeley. After all, about what is on the outside, you only know what is in your head and what will consequently under some heading always be representation. Whatever you may put forward about this world, I can always point out that it comes from the way you represent it to yourself. It is really very curious that such an image was able to take on, at a moment in history, a dominant character. To the point that a discourse was able to be based on it that effectively, in a certain context, that of a representation that is designed to sustain this idea of representation, could not be refuted. I would like to imagine this representation that allows there to be given to representation this advantage in which there consists, when all is said and done, the secret knot of what is called idealism.

It is certainly quite striking that by simply approaching it in the way that I do, its canvas, as one might say, vacillates. If it is so simple, how were people even able to consider it? And to give body to this vacillation, I am going to do something that is of course required, namely, show how this mirage-representation is constructed. It is the simplest thing there is. There is no need even to have recourse to something that is all the same rather striking, Aristotle's text in his little treatise on Sense and sensibilia, to notice the style with which he tackles what is involved in sight, in the eye. What he says about it, where he tackles it from, the way in which he intends to account for the fact of vision, is something that just by itself makes us notice that he is lacking in a striking way what is unquestioned for us. Namely, the most elementary apparatus of optics. This is the time to say what an advantage it would be for a study to be made of the point that ancient science was at about optics, properly speaking. This science went very far, much further even than is believed, in all sorts of mechanical views. But it seems in effect that, on the proper point of optics, it presented a remarkable blank. In this model which gives its status at that time to representation in which the kernel of idealism was crystallised, the very simple model is that of the dark room. Namely, a closed space protected from all light, in which only a little hole opens up to the outside world. If this outside world is illuminated, its image is depicted and moves around, according to what is happening outside, on the inner wall of the dark room.

It is extremely striking to see that at a certain detour of science, and it is not for nothing that it is Newton's, who as you know was just as inaugurating and brilliant as regards optics as he had been as regards the law of gravitation. It is not for nothing at this turning point that I will recall that what earned him the praise of his time, was very exactly to have been able for – this was articulated by the best minds – the plans of God that he found himself deciphering. This to confirm the remark that I was making earlier about the theological envelope of the first steps of our science. Optics is therefore essential to this (233) imagination of the subject as something in an inside. A singular thing, it seems to be admitted from the place of this little hole on which the site of the image depends. It is enough because this little hole, this place is indifferent. An image will always be produced, in effect, in the dark room opposite the little hole. The difference of the place of the little hole does not appear to give rise to a question about the fact that one only sees the world from the side that the little hole is turned towards. It seems to be implied in this function of the subject modelled on the dark room that, in the room, this apparatus of the little hole should be compatible with the fact that, from what is outside and is only an image since it can no longer be expressed except as an image inside, outside in a space that nothing limits, in principle, everything can come to take up a place within the room. It is nevertheless manifest that if the little holes were multiplied, there would no longer be any image anywhere.

Nevertheless we are not going to insist too heavily on this question, this is not what is important to us. It is simply to remark that here, and

here alone, is the support for the fact that what concerns the psyche is to be situated in an inside limited by a surface. A surface, of course, we are told, is already something in Freud's text. It is a surface turned towards the outside and it is on this surface that we henceforth localise the subject. It is, as they say, defenceless with respect to what is inside which is not of course simply representations but also, since the representations cannot be put elsewhere, at the same time one puts all the rest there, namely, what is called differently, confusedly, affects, instincts, drives. All of that is inside.

What reason is there, to know the relationship of a reality with its locus, whether it is inside or indeed outside. It would be well first of all to question oneself about what it becomes qua reality and perhaps for that to detach oneself from this fascinating virtue that there is in the fact that we can only conceive the representation of a living being inside its body. Let us go out of it a moment and let us pose the question of what is happening in the inside and the outside when it is a commodity that is at stake for example. The nature of commodity has been sufficiently illuminated for us for us to know that it is distinguished between use value and exchange value. Exchange value is, all the same, what functions outside. But let us put this commodity in a warehouse. That must also exist. A warehouse is an inside. That is where it is kept, that it is preserved. The barrels of oil, when they are outside, are exchanged and then consumed, use value. It is rather curious that it is when they are inside that they are reduced to their exchange value. In a warehouse, by definition, one is not there to break them up or to consume them; they are kept. The use value on the (234) inside, where one might expect it, is precisely prohibited, and it only subsists there by its exchange value. Where things are more enigmatic, is when it is no longer commodity that is at stake but the

fetish par excellence of money. In that case, this thing which has no use value, which has only exchange value, what value does it preserve when it is in a safe? It is nevertheless quite clear that it is put there and that it is kept there. What is this inside that seems to make what is locked up in it completely enigmatic? Is it not in its way, with respect to what constitutes the money, is it not an inside that is altogether outside, outside of what constitutes the essence of the money?

The only interest of these remarks is to introduce what is involved in thinking which also has something to do with exchange value, in other words, circulates. This simple remark should suffice to mark the timeliness of the question for those who have not yet understood that a thinking cannot be properly speaking conceived of unless it is articulated, unless it is inscribed in language, unless it can be sustained in conditions that are called dialectic. This means a certain operation of logic, with rules, and of knowing then if there is any way of us not questioning ourselves in exactly the same way as we were doing a moment ago for the money placed in a safe. What is meant by a thinking when one keeps it to oneself? And if one does not know what it is when one keeps it to oneself, it is all the same because its essence must be elsewhere, namely, already outside, without one needing to make a projection to say that thinking is involved. In other words, something must be noticed that perhaps did not appear right away to everyone. This is that what is convincing in Berkeley's argument, what gives it its force, is perhaps indeed this intuition grounded on a model, I cannot have representation elsewhere. But the important thing in the affair is not that, namely, that we allow ourselves to be caught by another image, and one particularly dependent on a certain state of technique. The fact is that effectively his argumentation is irrefutable. In order for idealism to hold up, there must be not simply Bishop

Berkeley but some other people with whom, on this subject of whether we only have an apprehension of the world that the philosophical limits of idealism defines. It is in the measure that one cannot get out of it, that, in the discourse, one has nothing to retort to it that it is irrefutable.

(235) So then on the subject of idealism/realism, there are quite obviously those who are right and those who are wrong. Those who are right are in the real, I am speaking from the realists' point of view; and those who are wrong, where are they? This should also be inscribed in the schema. The important thing is the fact that in the debate, the articulated discussion, Berkeley, at the point that he is at in the philosophical discussion of his epoch, is right, even though, of course, he is clearly wrong.

This is precisely what proves that the first outline of the field of objectivity grounded on the darkroom is false. But then is it necessary or not to substitute another one for it? And how can it be done? What becomes of inside and outside? And if what we are forced to redraw to find ourselves on this limit, on this middle line between the symbolic and the imaginary that a minimum of support, of intuitive support, for our cogitations, demands does this not involve us having, in analytic intervention, to radically abandon these terms of projection and introjection, as we constantly use them without contributing in the slightest to the schema that, in order to designate it, we will call Berkeleyan, the one marked by this little ring on top. This is the darkroom, in which I put the subject of representation with a real outside that is distinguished simply as being, as if it were self-evident, everything that is there outside. It is the real.

Probably another very unfortunate apprehension of things, because it does not to distinguish in everything that is constructed outside different orders of the real. To pose the question simply of what this building, this house owes to an order that is not at all necessarily the real, because we made it, is something it would be well to put in place if we have to intervene in a field that is not at all the one that has been said to be that of elementary, organic, carnal, facts, biological pressures but of something that is called the unconscious. And that by being simply articulated as being of the order of thinking, does not escape from the fact that it is articulated in language terms. The radical character of what is at the foundation not of what I teach but of what I have only to recognise in our daily practice and in Freud's texts, poses the question of what is involved in the inside and the outside, and the way in which we can and ought to conceive of what corresponds to the facts always so awkwardly handled in the terms introjection and projection. To the point that Freud dares, it has to be said, at the origin of the definition of the Ego, to articulate things in these terms. Namely, that starting from a certain state of confusion (236) with the world the psyche is separated out into an inside and an outside. In his discourse, nothing is distinguished about what is involved in this outside, namely, whether it can be identified to what in this representation in common opinion, whether this outside can be identified to this indeterminate space. And this inside to something that we will hold henceforth to ground a rule of the organism all of whose components we are going to find inside.

It is quite clear that one can already take a step, in demonstrating how unthinkable the schema of the darkroom is. There is no need to go back to Aristotle to see that because he does not refer himself to the dark room, the questions are completely different to the ones that are

posed to us and render properly speaking unthinkable the whole conception, let us say, of the nervous system. Read this text, it is piquant, this text with which there begin some chapters of a little treatise that he calls Sense and sensibilia. He already touches on the problem, namely, this something that is going to give rise to so many developments subsequently, namely, that there is something in vision that opens out to reflection. He approaches the "seeing oneself seeing" of Valery in the drollest way in the fact that when one puts pressure on an eye, this gives rise to something, it gives rise to phosphenes, namely, something that is like light. It is only there that he finds himself able to apprehend that this eye that sees, also sees itself in a way, since it produces light if you press on it. Many other things are piquant, and the formulae that he ends up with, make the dimension of the diaphanous essential to things. This accounts for the fact that the eye sees from the fact, and uniquely from the fact that, in this order of the diaphanous, it represents a particularly qualified system. Namely, that far from us having something that in any way resembles an inside and an outside, it is in so far, as one might say, as the eye shares a quality that we would describe as visionary (visionnaire) that the eye sees. It is not so stupid. It is a certain way, on this occasion, of plunging the subject into the world.

The question has become a little bit different. In truth, the people that Aristotle had to fight with, namely, a thousand other theories stated at his time, all of which moreover, from some point of view, share in something that we have no difficulty in finding in our images, including projection. Because, I ask you, what does this term projection presuppose, when it is a matter no longer of what sees itself but of the imaginary, if not that we suppose, with regard to a certain affective configuration, the one around which, at a particular moment,

at a particular date, we suppose the patient-subject modifies the world. What is this projection if not the supposition of the fact that it is from inside that there begins the luminous pencil that is going to paint the (237) world, just as in ancient times, there were certain people who imagined these rays that, starting from the eye, went on in effect to illuminate the world and objects for us, however enigmatic this radiation of vision was. But we can, we prove it in our metaphors, be still at this point. And when you refer to this Aristotelian text, it is not the least brilliant aspect of what he shows us, that one can put one's finger on in a way, not so much what he constructs himself but everything that he refers to. Empedocles, notably, who makes the eye share in the function of fire, to which he himself retorts by an appeal to the element of water. Incidentally, what is annoying, is that there are only four elements, and since there are five senses, it is hard to see how the link can be made; he says it quite literally. He gets out of it at the end by unifying taste and touch as equally referring to earth, but let us not amuse ourselves any longer, moreover these things have nothing especially comical about them, there are rather exemplary. What appears in a way, in reading these texts, is this something that, for us, localises this field of vision by revivifying it, as I might say, with what we have put into it, thanks to perversion, with the desire that is put into it. One can see this, by simply allowing oneself, as one might say to be impregnated by what animates these texts which, however futile they may appear to us, were nevertheless not produced by stupid people. The mainspring of why they could be said in this way is in a way suggested to us, provided we have done some exercises in what is involved in the visual field in terms of the function of the o-object.

The o-object in the visual field, as regards the objective structure, falls under the jurisdiction of the function of this third term. And it is striking that the ancients literally do not know what to make of it, miss out on it, even though it is the crudest thing there is. They too found themselves between the two, sensation, namely the subject, and then the world that is sensed. They have to shake themselves, as one might say, to bring into play as third term, quite simply light, the luminous focus in so far as its rays are what are reflected on the object and which, for ourselves, come to form an image inside the darkroom. And then? Then we have this marvellous stupidity of the conscious synthesis which is somewhere, and, it appears, particularly easily thinkable uniquely from the fact that we can lodge it in a cortical fold. And why would the image in the cortical fold become something synthesising, all of a sudden, just because it is in a cortical fold rather than on the retina? The concept of the o-object is sufficiently indicated to us by the very hesitations that are outlined throughout tradition and which ensured in effect that they grasped very well that the solution of the problem of vision is not at all simply light. Light is a condition, of course; for one to see something there must be daylight; but how does (238) this explain the fact that one sees?

The o-object, in what concerns the scoptophilic field, if we try to express it at the level of sensibility (esthésie), is very exactly what you like, this white or this black, this something lacking behind the image, as one might say, and that we put so easily, by a purely verbal (logomachique) effect of synthesis, somewhere in a cortical fold? It is very precisely in so far as something is lacking in what is given as an image of it, that there is the mainspring of which there is only one solution, that, like the o-object, it is precisely qua lack and, if you wish, qua stain. The definition of the stain, is precisely what, in the field, is distinguished as the hole, as an absence. And we know precisely from zoology that the first appearance of this thing that

astonishes us, which is so well constructed as a little optical apparatus, and that is called an eye, begins in lamellar beings as a stain. Will we make of this stain purely and simply an effect, because light produces stains? This is something certain. We are not at that point. To put the stain as essential and structuring as a place of lack in all vision, to put the stain at the place of the third term of the objectified fields, to put the stain at the place of light as the Ancients could not prevent themselves from doing – and this was their nonsense – here is something that is no longer nonsense. If we see that this effective metaphor, the metaphor of the point denied in the field of vision, as being at the source of what constitutes not its deployment more or less as a mirage but what attaches the subject, in so far as this subject is something whose knowledge is entirely determined by another more radical, more essential lack. This is the one that concerns it qua sexed individual, this is what shows how the field of vision is inserted into desire. And after all why is there no means of admitting that what ensures that there is sight, contemplation, all these relationships that have a hold on the speaking being, that all of this only really takes on its attachment, its root, at the very level of that which, by being a stain in this field, can succeed in filling, in completing what is involved in the lack. Of the lack itself perfectly articulated and articulated as lack, namely, the only term thanks to which the speaking being can find its bearings with respect to what is involved in its sexual belonging.

It is at the level of this o-object that there can be conceived this articulated division of the subject into a subject who is wrong because he is in the truth – this is Bishop Berkeley – and another subject who, putting in doubt that thinking is worth anything, in reality proves the fact that thinking is of itself censorship. And that what is important, is to situate the look qua subjective, because it does not see. This is how it can be thought that thinking itself is based on the fact that it is (239) censorship and on this alone. It is this that allows it to articulate itself metaphorically as creating a stain in logical discourse.

What I want to say today at the end of this long articulation - at least I can begin it - is the following. We had remained at the level of perversion founded on a different way of inscribing this outside. This outside, for us, is not a space open to infinity where we put anything whatsoever under the name of real. What we have to deal with, is this Other, which has its status as such. It is certainly not only from the efforts of psychoanalysts that we can articulate this status today as presenting itself to be explored by a simply logical questioning, as marked by a flaw. Which in the schema here, presents the big Other, the sign as giving the term of what is posited at the level of enunciating, of desiring enunciating. The fact is that the response that it gives is very exactly the flaw that this desire represents.

After all, it is not for nothing that these terms are manifested by little letters, by an algebra. What is proper to an algebra is to be able to have different interpretations. S(Ø) can mean all sorts of things, up to and including the function of the death of the father. But at a radical level, at the level of bringing logic into our experience, S(Ø) is exactly, if it is somewhere and can be fully articulated, what is called structure. If one can in any term qualify as structuralism – and you know the reservations I have about this philosophical label – it is in so far as the relationship between what allows there to be edified a rigorous logic and what on the other hand is shown to us in the unconscious by certain irreducible faults of articulation from which proceeds this very effort that bears witness to the desire to know. As I told you, what I defined as perversion, is in some way the primary restoration, the restitution, of the o, to this field of O. This is made possible because this o is an effect of the grasping of something primitive, primordial. (240) And why would we not admit it, on condition of not making a subject of it. It is in the measure that this animal being that we were taking earlier at the level of its sack of skin is caught up in language that something in it is determined as o, this o given over to the Other, as one might say. That indeed is why the other day, in introducing the pervert before you, I compared him to the man of faith, indeed ironically to a crusader; he gives to God his veritable plenitude.

Allow me to end on some rather humorous word play. If it is true that the pervert is the structure of the subject for whom the castration reference, the fact that the woman is distinguished by the fact that she does not have the phallus, that this if filled, masked, completed, by the mysterious operation of the o-object, is it not here that there is articulated this formula that I once put forward once. That this way of warding off the radical gap in the order of the signifier that the recourse to castration represents, warding it off is the basis and the principle of the perverse structure. And providing something that completes, that replaces the phallic lack, in providing this Other, in so far as he is asexual, is this not what one day, before you, I designated by the term l'hommelle. This is a reference that, as regards the basis of a certain outside with regard to the operation of the unconscious, will render you some service by this pinpointing, even though it appears to be simply picturesque.

But to leave you and moreover because today, as usual, I was not able to go through, as usual, as much of the field as I wanted to open up for you. Because this is what leads from perversion to phobia, by seeing in it the intermediary that is going to finally allow you to situate the

neurotic authentically and what is involved at his level by inside and outside. If we write this hommelle, by modifying the term which is here, S(O), by modifying it in this sense that it is an unfailing O, that this O of a signifier of O, that is at stake, and which gives the key to perversion, is it not – I will show you more in our next meeting – is it not inversely at the level of the signified s(O) of the flaw, that the division of this O is brought to bear in the neurotic? This is of great interest in topological organisation. Because it also shows that it is at the level of the statement that the text of the neurotic symptom is articulated. Namely, that this is how it is explained that it is between the field of the ego as it is organised in a specular way and that of desire in so far as it is articulated with respect to the field dominated by the o-object that the fate of the neurosis is played out.

This is what we will see better the next time when, founded on the old graphs, I will be able to show you the place taken in the operation of neurosis – I will take it up first of all in the phobia, taking up again everything that I already articulated in connection with little Hans and which was, I noticed, rather inadequately transmitted in the accounts (241) that were given of it..... So then, but if this signified of O qua barred, qua marked by its logical failure, if it comes to signify itself fully in the neurotic, this is indeed also what enlightens us about the way in which the experience of the neurotic was inaugural. He does not mask what is involved in terms of conflictual articulation at the level of logic itself. That because thinking falters in its own place of well regulated game, this is what gives its true import to the distance that the neurotic himself takes from it in his own experience. And in a word and to end on this wordplay that I announced to you, what is astonishing, if we amuse ourselves with the word hommelle, on the stage beneath to transform it into famil. The games and the encounters

the state of the tongue allows, is this famil not truly something that appears to show us, like a sort of flash between two doors, what is involved in the metaphorical function of the family itself?

If for the pervert, it is necessary that there should be an uncastrated woman, or more exactly if he makes her so and hommelle, can it not be noted at the horizon of the field of neurosis that this "He" somewhere, of which the "I" is truly what is at stake in what is involved in the family drama, it is this o-object qua liberated. It is what poses all the problems of identification. It is with it that it is necessary, at the level of neurosis, to finish off, so that the structure of what it is a matter of resolving, namely mere structure, the signifier of Ø, is revealed.

Seminar 19: Wednesday 7 May 1969

Anxiety, as I once said, is not without an object. This means that this something called objective, starting from a certain conception of the subject, that there is something analogous corresponding to anxiety, something – this is how it is expressed in psychoanalysis – of which anxiety is the signal in the subject. This is the sense of this "not without" in the formula which unveils nothing other than that this term, this something analogous to the object, is not missing. But this "not without" does not designate it; it simply presupposes the support of the fact of the lack. Now any evocation of lack supposes an established symbolic order, more than simply a law, an accumulation, and again a numbered, ordered one, as I underlined at the time.

If we define the real as a sort of thought abolition (abolition pensée) of symbolic material, nothing can ever be lacking. The animal, any one whatsoever, that dies because of a succession of perfectly adapted physiological effects, and the fact of calling that the effects of hunger, for example, is completely ruled out; it is the end of the organism qua soma. It lacks nothing. It has enough resources within the perimeter of its organism to measure what is described as its mortal reduction. The cadaver is also a real. It is through the effects by which the organism subsists that we are forced to conceive the imaginary. Something indicates to it that a particular element from the outside, from the milieu, from the Umwelt as they say, can be absorbed or more generally is favourable for its preservation. This means that the Umwelt is a sort of halo, a double of the organism, and that is all. That is what is called the imaginary. A whole order of the Umwelt can be described certainly in terms of adequation; without this the organism would not subsist for an instant. The category of the imaginary implies in itself that this Umwelt is capable of failing. But here also, this failure is not a lack of anything. It is the beginning of a succession of effects through which the organism is reduced, like earlier, carrying its Umwelt with it. It dies with its mirage which can very well be what is called, it is hard to say why, an epiphenomenon of this hunger that I evoked earlier.

So then up to this everything is reduced to a different level of the structuring of the real. For the fact of lack to appear, it is necessary that it should be said somewhere "it does not add up". For something to be lacking, things must be counted. Once there is something counted, there are also the effects of counting on the order of the image. These are the first steps of episteme, of science. The first (244) copulations of the act of counting with the image, is the recognition of a certain number of harmonies, musical ones for example. They give the type of it. This can be noted from lacks that have nothing to do with what, in harmony, are simply posed as intervals. There are places where there is no counting. The whole science that we describe as ancient consists in wagering that these places where there was no counting would be reduced one day in the eyes of the wise man, to the constitutive intervals of musical harmony.

It is a matter of establishing an order of the Other thanks to which the real takes on the status of world, cosmos, implying this harmony. Things were done in this way once there were in the world, in this world of adventure and of concreteness called historical, emporiums, shops where everything is properly arranged. The emporiums and the empires that exist for some time, we are not the ones who invented them, are the same thing. It is the lining and the support of this conception of ancient science that is based, in short, on the fact that was accepted for a long time, that knowledge and power are the same thing. Because the one who knows how to count can divide up, he distributes, and by definition the one who distributes is just. All empires are just. If some doubt has been cast on this recently, there must be a reason for it. The horizon of what is happening here – and this is the excuse for this public discourse, for this something that I continue despite the fact that in principle it is only addressed to psychoanalysts – is something the times bear witness to, something that the wise men do not want to see, something that is already no longer a prodrome but an open tear. That fact is that a discordance has exploded between knowledge and power. It is a matter - it is interesting, in order quite simply for things not to delay any longer in this discordance, with all that it involves in terms of strange stammerings, of restatements, of absurd collisions - it is a matter of defining how this disjunction operates and to name it as such. So that people do not think it can be warded off in some episodic fashion or other by changing whoever is in power. To say that everything is all right because it is those who up to now were oppressed who are now going to exercise it, for example.

Not of course that I am personally setting aside in any way the possibility of this happening. But it seems sure to me that it only has

meaning in as much as it is inscribed in what I have just called the essential change of course, the only one that is of a nature to change the sense of everything that is organised as presumed empire, even if it were knowledge itself, namely, this disjunction between knowledge and power. This formula which has only a crude value, which does not lead properly speaking to anything, which does not consist in any Weltanschauung, a utopian presumption or not of a mutation pushed by something or other, ought to be articulated. And it can be, not by reason of the fact that Freud allows it to be grasped, renewing in a (245) system that is in any way comparable to the one that wanted the myth of the conjunction of knowledge and power to perdure. But Freud here is himself much more the patient, the one who, by his word, the word of a patient, testifies to what I am inscribing here under this title, the disjunction between knowledge and power. He does not testify to it alone. He reads it in the symptoms that are produced at a certain level of the subjective. And he tries to ward it off, precisely where it can be read that he himself as well as them, those who testify in their particularity to this disjunction of knowledge and power, he is like them a patient of this effort, of this work, of the testimony given at one point of the effects that I am entitling the disjunction of knowledge and power.

This is how, at the point that I myself am only following this discourse, that in my very discourse I bear witness to what the testing of this conjunction leads to. Namely, to nothing that apparently completes it nor permits it to be hoped that it will ever be reduced to a norm, to a cosmos. This is the sense of what I am trying to pursue before you in terms of a discourse that Freud inaugurated. That is why I began by a careful reading of what this discourse bears witness to, and not simply

in its mastery, because very precisely it is in its inadequacies that it is more instructive.

I re-read the seminar that I gave in 1956-57, a derisory distance of 13 years that, all the same, allows me to measure something of the path that has been taken, by whom? By what? By my discourse on the one hand and then, on the other hand, by a sort of obviousness, a manifestation of a tearing apart that this discourse designates. This, of course, owes nothing to this discourse itself but thanks to it perhaps testimony can be given that there is a discourse that I would not say of course is up to date, let us say is not trailing too far behind what has been produced. This having been said, by reason of the laws that pass as the reigning ones, those described as being of the status of the university, it is necessary in effect that this discourse should not simply be trailing behind but should always be forced to correct itself in principle as nachträglich, subsequently. This by reason of the fact that nothing registers it in a renewal of form like the one where there subsists what is involved in terms of major steps taken for some time in knowledge and in such a way that it is marked as an interring disconnected from any effect of power.

We will start again then at the source and this term of o-object that I produced, which was not there in 1956-57 while I was trying to work things out. If this were now published beyond the summary, moreover not so badly done, presented in the Bulletin de Psychologie under the heading of Object relations and Freudian structures, it could, if it could be done, follow the very text of what throughout more than a trimester I followed the scent of. This text just by itself, so confusing because it is like a labyrinth, attesting to a sort of spelling out, stammering, turning in circles, and in truth, whose outcome, apart from

(246) the fact that little Hans is no longer afraid of horses, and so what? Is the interest of such a research to ensure that one or a thousand little boys are freed from something embarrassing that is called a phobia? Experience proves that phobias do not take any longer to cure spontaneously than with an investigation like the one involved on this occasion, that of his father, a pupil of Freud's and Freud himself. What at that epoch, 13 years ago, I had to underline, I had to spell out, is the real import of what is at stake, in terms of the study of a frontier, of a limit of what is played out at every instant - it goes well beyond the case - the frontier, the limit between the imaginary and the symbolic. And it is here that everything is played out. I will come back to it perhaps to add a few strokes in the course of what I say today.

But let us start again from the point where we have to fix what is involved in the operation of three orders, the real, the symbolic and the imaginary. What is really at stake, this turning point at which we are all patients, whatever may be the misadventures and symptoms of each one of us. Namely, what I am designating as a certain disconnection between knowledge and power. Let us posit somewhere at a point – let us be crude, let us be summary – what I earlier called the real. It is quite obvious that as I described it, it is involved. I have not yet gone to see it but there is, it appears, a film by Louis Malle on Calcutta. In it you see a great number of people dying of hunger. That is what the real is. Where people are dying of hunger, they die of hunger. There is nothing lacking. Why do people start talking about lack? Because they formed part of an empire. Otherwise, it appears, there would not even be a Calcutta. Because it appears – I am not enough of a historian to know but I accept it because we are told that – without the requirements of this Empire there would have been no conurbation in this place. Modern empires allow their dimension of lack to manifest itself precisely in the fact that knowledge achieved a certain growth in them, no doubt a disproportionate one, with respect to the effects of power. The modern empire has also this property that everywhere it stretches its wings, this disconnection also appears. And it is uniquely in the name of this that one can make of the famine in India a motive to incite us to a subversion or a universal revision of something, the Real!

In what concerned the symbolic, it must be counted as at least 1. For a long time, people believed that counting could be reduced to the One. To the One of God – there is only one – to the One of the Empire, to the One of Proclus, to the One of Plotinus. That is why there is nothing excessive in our symbolising the field of the symbolic here by this 1. What has to be grasped, is that of course, this 1 that is not simple and which – that was where the progress took place – people noticed, functioned as a numerical 1, namely, generated an infinity of (247) successors, on condition that there was a zero. This to give an example of the symbolic by one of the systems that are currently best established, it must be emphasised here. The fact is that this counting, whatever it is, at whatever level of structure we may place it in the symbolic, has its effects on the imaginary. And what is established, what is organised in my discourse, for those who follow it by experiencing it, is that these effects of symbolic counting, in the order of the imaginary that we recalled earlier, namely, in the fact that the imaginary is the order through which the real of an organism, namely, a quite established real is completed by an Umwelt, counting has, at the level of the imaginary, the effect of making appear in it what I call the o-object.

Now in the human being - and without this making of him a particular exception in the domain of living beings - one image plays a privileged role, as in many other animals. It is the one that is at the source of this dimension that we call narcissism, it is the specular image. We know that this is not limited to men, that among many other animals, at certain levels of their behaviour, of what is called ethology, animal behaviour, images of an apparently equivalent structure, privileged in the same way, exercise a decisive function on the organism. Everything that is observed, articulated by psychoanalysis as a phase in the relationships between i(o) and this o-object, this is the key point that for us is of primary interest, r: i(o)/o, to estimate at its value as a model everything that psychoanalysis gives us at the level of symptoms. This in function of what is involved, as is obvious in our epoch, about the effects of disconnection between knowledge and power.

I therefore first defined the o-object as essentially founded on the effects of what happens in the field of the Other, in the symbolic field, in the field of arranging, in the field of order, in the field of the dream of unity, on these malicious effects in the field of the imaginary. Note that this implies the very structure of the field of the Other as such, as I tried, thanks to a schema, to make you sense in more than one of my previous lectures this year. What is indicated here as effect in the field of the imaginary, is nothing other than the fact that this field of the Other is, as I might say, in the form of o. In this field, this is inscribed in a topology that, to image, because of course this is only an intuitive (248) image, presents itself as holing it.

The following step, the one that I made by stating in a way that after all is striking in that when I say things like that, they get across, like

slicing butter – which obviously proves that the analysts have not a very sure idea of what they can hold onto in such a field – I said something simple. Namely, that to bring back these effects of the o in the imaginary to the Other, the field that they start from, to render to Caesar as I might say the things that are Caesar's - as was said one day as you know by a little imp, because he was that, the blackguard - was the essence of perversion, to render o to the one from whom it comes, the big Other. It is of course a rather apologetic way of presenting things. What has to be known, is what one can draw from it. If effectively something that is the subject, from some quarter, because an effect of the symbolic on the field of the imaginary we can consider still problematic, what place is it going to take? But that touches the subject, we can have no doubt about it, we who make of the subject something that is only inscribed from an articulation of one foot inside and another outside the field of the Other.

Let us try to recognise this aspect of what is at stake about the subject. It is of interest, it is important here to recognise what is involved in a term that Freud put forward, the one that before me had begun to take the dimensions of a certain room whose blackness is much less easy to calibrate than the one that I evoked the last time, the one that served for two centuries in the name of an optical model. That he should have done the circuit several times and given different names to the same things that he found himself discovering after his periplus should not surprise us. Freud spoke a lot about love, keeping the appropriate distance. It is not because this has gone to the heads of those who followed him that we do not have to put things back at the level at which he started them. At the level of love, he distinguished the anaclitic relation and the narcissistic relation. Since it happens that in other places he opposed object cathexis to that of the body, described as narcissistic on this occasion, people thought they could build on this some type of communicating vases or other thanks to which it is object cathexis that, just by itself, proved that one had got out of oneself, that one had brought the libidinal substance to bear where it should be. It is on this that there reposes this lucubration which that I went through that year, because it was still lively, on object relations, with the whole myth of the so-called oblative stage, also qualified as genital. It seems to me that what Freud articulates about the anaclitic, about the support taken in the Other, with what it implies about the development of a sort of mythology of dependency, as if this were what was at stake, that the anaclitic takes on its status, its true relationship by defining properly (249) what I am situating in fundamental structure of perversion. Namely, this operation through which the status of the Other is assured by being covered, by being filled, by being masked by a certain operation described as perverse, from the operation of o and which by this fact makes a stage of it, by taking – I am saying discursively if we want to give a logical approximation to what is in operation in all sorts of effects that interest us – the anaclitic relation here as being primary. And moreover this is the only foundation by which there can be justified a whole series of supposedly significant clouds through which the child is supposed to long for his paradise in some maternal physiological environment that, properly speaking, never existed in this ideal form. It is only essentially as an operation of this object definable as an effect of the symbolic in the imaginary, as the operation of this imaginary with regard to something that can claim, under some heading, for a while – and in this respect the mother can play this role just as well as anything else whatsoever, the father, an institution, even a desert island. It is as the operation of o, as mask, what I called this structure that is the same thing as this o, the in-form of o of the Other, it is uniquely in this formula that there can be grasped what one can call the effect of masking, the effect of blinding, that is precisely how the whole anaclitic relation is fulfilled.

To express things in this form, the important thing is not what it says because, as you can grasp, it is not easy to get into, precisely on the plane of what is called imagination. Because living imagination, the one from which we take, pick up what we avidly call varyingly pleasant meanings, depends on a completely different sort of image, and one much less obscure, the specular image. Much less obscure especially since our mirrors have become clear. We will never know, unless we reflect a little bit on it, what we owe to the emergence of clear mirrors. Every time that, in Antiquity, and this continues of course in the time of the Fathers of the Church, you see something indicated as being in a mirror that means something completely different to what it is for us. Their mirrors, because they were polished metal, gave much more obscure effects, this is perhaps what allowed there to subsist for such a long time a specular vision of the world. The world might well appear obscure to them, as for us, but this went along quite well with what was seen in the mirror. That was able to make the idea of a cosmos last for a rather long time, it was enough simply to perfect mirrors. It is because we have done so, along with other things, the elucidation of the symbolic, precisely, that things appear less simple to us.

Let us note that in this we have not yet advanced very far but, since it is knowledge that is at stake, let us observe that the order of satisfaction rendered to the Other, by way of this inclusion of the o, the (250) novelty, the one that analytic experience allows us to envisage It is very precisely this that, whoever he may be, the one that finds himself in the role, in the position of functioning as this Other, from all time, as long as he has been functioning, never knew anything about what was happening there. This is what I allow myself to articulate under some heading here and there, by posing insidious questions to theologians, of the type as to whether, for example, it is all that sure that God believes in God. If the question introduced as fundamental in any psychoanalytic approach is thinkable – I believe I formulated it along the line of something that, like all prodromes, had begun to be outlined at a certain philosophical turning point – the fact is that the interesting thing, in an altogether living fashion, and this in the measure that the impasses in which knowledge corners us progresses, is not to know what the Other knows. It is to know what he wants. Namely, with his form, his form in-form of o (en-forme de a), which is outlined quite differently than in a mirror. But in an exploration of perversion that has, moreover, scarcely been touched on, which makes us say that this topology that is outlined, and that the advance of knowledge specifies at many other levels than that of pathological experiences, means what? Where does it lead? It is not moreover quite the same thing. The question is still being studied. If one imagines that even as regards perversions, psychoanalysis closes the circle, that it has found the last word, even by using the o-object relation in a more applied way than I can do here, one would be wrong.

The important thing, is to take up, under the heading of symptoms that in a way enlighten us about what is involved in the relationships of the subject to the Other, ancient themes which are not the same at different epochs. And if I have not been able to make room here for Angelus Silesius of the Cherubinic Pilgrim whom I made such use of at one time in those lost years - and I do not know whether one day someone will be able to measure out the journey along which I brought to light the precarious sequence of this discourse - whom I made such use of, it is in the light of this relation that I define as anaclitic that there can be taken up the demistichs of his Cherubinic pilgrim, these distichs cut, balanced in four parts in which there is outlined the proper identity of what appeared most essential for him, what was impossible to grasp otherwise than in terms of the o-object and of God himself. Suffice it to note that everything that can be inscribed in function of order, of hierarchy and moreover of division, everything that is of the order of this fact of exchange, of transitivism, of identification itself, all of this depends on the quite different relation that we posit as specular. All of this refers to the status of the body image in so far as it is posited at a radical turning point as linked to this essential thing in the libidinal economy, considered as being the mastery of the motor activity of the body. It is not for nothing that the same consonants are found in the (251) one and the other, mastery of motor activity (maîtrise motrice), everything is there. And it is through this that witness is born on every occasion to what is called good behaviour. Thanks to this mastery of motor activity, the organism qualified from its relationships to the symbolic, man on this occasion as he is called, moves about without ever leaving an arena that is well defined by the fact that it prohibits a properly central region which is that of enjoyment. It is there that the body image as I organise it from the narcissistic relation takes on its importance.

Consult the schema that I gave under the title of remarks to some propositions of a gentleman whose name will survive thanks to me. You will see there that the relationship that is designated is very properly the following. From the relationship that is established of the subject to the field of the Other, in so far as here I cannot do anything other in an image than something homogeneous to common space, and it is indeed for this reason that I make the Other function there. And

why not, because moreover it is not withdrawn from the imaginary, like a mirror. This with the only purpose of being able to posit the second term. The signifier for whom the subject is represented by another signifier, is found there to be highlighted at a place that is none other than the one that I designate here by this enigmatic I [in French], from which there is presented the conjunction in another mirror, the conjunction of the o and the body image. This precisely designates what happens in phobia.

If we take any observation of phobia whatsoever, provided it is a little bit serious, which is the case, one cannot afford the luxury of publishing an observation in psychoanalysis without a rather complete anamnesis. To take for example in the book by Helene Deutsch on the Psychoanalysis of the neuroses the chapters that refer to phobia, what do we see, for example, by taking any of them? She was asked to treat someone because he had at a particular moment a phobia about hens. What do we see? The matter is perfectly articulated, but is only revealed of course, in a second phase of exploration. Namely, that at a time before the emergence of the symptom, hens were certainly not indifferent for him. They were birds that he looked after with his mother and from whom he also collected eggs. We are given all the details, namely, that in the way in effect of all of those who work with these fowl, feeling the cloaca from the outside is enough to see whether the egg is there, and ready to be laid. After that you just have to wait. This indeed is what interested the little the X in question to the highest degree. Namely that when he was being washed by his mother, he asked her to do the same thing to his own perineum. How can one not recognise that at this very place he points to himself as aspiring precisely to furnish the object of what no doubt, for reasons that are not otherwise explored but that are quite tangible there, were the object of a quite particular interest for the mother. The first phase, (252) is quite obviously "since you are interested in eggs I'm going to have to lay some for you". But moreover it is not for nothing that the egg here takes on all its weight. If it can happen that the o-object is thus involved, it is indeed in this sense that there is what I might call a demographic aspect of the relationships between the subjects which implies that, naturally, what is born is found in place of an egg.

I repeat, I am only evoking this moment in order to give right away the sense of what is going to be at stake when the phobia is unleashed. An older brother, much older in fact, much stronger than him, takes hold of him one day from behind, and this boy who knows perfectly well of course everything that is happening in the farmyard, says to him: "I'm the cock and you're the hen". He defends himself and fights back with the greatest energy declaring: "I won't be the hen!" Note that this "hen" in English, has exactly the same pronunciation with the aspiration as the "n" of the "un" that I spoke to you about earlier. He does not want to be the "hen". There was already someone called Alain who thought he made a great discovery when he said that to think, is to say no. He says no. Why does he say no when earlier he was so happy with his mother at being able to be for her, as I might say, an extra hen, a deluxe hen, one that was not in the farmyard, if not because narcissism is involved there. Namely, the rivalry with his brother, the passage, as has been well proved, to a power relation. The other holds him by the waist, by the hips, immobilises him and keeps him in a certain position as long as he wants.

The transfer (virement), I am not saying the tacking (virage), of what is invested in a certain meaning between one register and the other is the point at which the earlier function comes to grief. There comes to birth

the fact that the hen is henceforth going to take on for him a perfectly signifying function, and no longer an imaginary one. Namely, that she frightens him. The passage from the field of anxiety, the one by which I inaugurated my discourse today, namely, that it is not without an object, on condition that one sees that this object is what is involved for the subject in the field of narcissism. It is here that there is unveiled the true function of phobia which is to substitute for the object of anxiety a signifier which is frightening. As compared to the enigma of anxiety, the relation to the danger that is signalled is reassuring. Moreover what this experience shows us, is that on condition that there is produced this passage to the field of the Other, the signifier is presented as what it is with respect to narcissism, namely, devouring. And it is indeed here that there originates the type of prevalence that the oral drive has taken on in the classical theory.

What I wanted to begin today, is properly speaking the following. That it in phobia that we can see not at all something that is a clinical entity but that is in a way a sort of turntable. It is by elucidating its relationships with what it most commonly veers towards, namely, the two great orders of neurosis, hysteria and obsessional neurosis, but also (253) by the junction that it realises with the structure of perversion, that this phobia enlightens us about what is involved in all sorts of consequences that have no need to be limited to a particular subject to be perfectly perceptible. Because it is not a matter of something that can be isolated from the clinical point of view but much more rather a figure clinically illustrated in a brilliant fashion no doubt, but in infinitely diverse contexts. It is from the point of this phobia that we will question again what we started from today, namely, the disjunction between knowledge and power.

(255) It is impossible not to consider the incidence of the subject as primary in psychoanalytic practice. It is ceaselessly in the forefront in the way, to listen to him, the psychoanalyst thinks, at least if we keep to what is reported. It is from a particular point defined by what is called an identification that the subject is found to act, for example, to manifest a particular intention. A particular paradoxical behaviour will be stated to come from the fact that he goes back, for example, to himself, and from what point if not from another that he had been taking up. He goes back, to the place of someone to whom he is going to be identified, his first aggression. In short, at every instant the subject presents himself as provided with what is at least a curious autonomy, a mobility, especially, equal to none. Because there is almost no point in the world of his partners, whether or not they are considered as his fellows, that he cannot occupy, at least, I repeat, in a thinking that tends to account for a particular paradox in his behaviour. Let us say that the subject – and here there is no place, in this literature, to contest the legitimacy of this term – the subject is moreover absolutely not criticised. At the end in fact there are produced these singular statements that go as far as to talk about choice of neurosis, as if at one moment it was to some privileged point or other of this pulverised subject that the switching of points was reserved.

Naturally, it can be admitted that, in a first phase of analytic research, we were not in any way in a phase when there could be articulated in any kind of logical way what might be involved, in effect, in what presents itself as being apparently altogether determining at the beginning of an anamnesis, in a certain way of reacting to trauma. It would be enough perhaps to see that this point considered as original, directive in an anamnesis, is a point that was well and truly produced retroactively by the totality of interpretations. I am not talking only about the interpretations that the psychoanalyst makes, as they say, in his head or when he is writing his observation, but where he has intervened in what links him to the patient. This register, this register of questioning, of suspension of what is involved in the subject, is far from being able in any way to be purely and simply described as a relationship of one power to another, even when subjected to all that can be imagined there about the transference.

(256) That is why it is always essential to take up again the question of structure in psychoanalysis at the level of the subject. It is what constitutes the real progress. It is, of course, the only thing that can make what is improperly called the clinic progress. I hope that no one is deceived and that if, the last time, you were able to take some pleasure in seeing my discourse being illuminated at the end by the evocation of a case, it is not specifically the fact that a case was evoked that constitutes the clinical character of what is stated in this teaching.

Let us take things up then at the point where we can formulate them after having on several occasions, on several occasions, marked how

there is formed, from a first and very simple definition, namely, that where we start from is a signifier. This is where we start from, this is where we start from because after all the only element analysis gives us certainty about - and I must say that it gives it its full relief - gives its weight to, is the signifier. If one defines the signifier, the signifier is what represents the subject for another signifier. Here is the formula, the originating formula, as I might say, that allows us to situate correctly what is involved in a subject, which we would not in any way be able to handle according to formulae that are apparently those of common sense, of good sense. Namely, that there is indeed some thing that constitutes this identity that differentiates this gentleman here from his neighbour. By being satisfied with this, we find ourselves in fact making every statement, every simple descriptive statement of what effectively happens in the analytic relation look like a puppet show. In it, I repeat, the subject is as mobile as the word itself, the very word of the master of these so-called puppets. Namely, that when he talks in the name of the one that he is holding in his right hand, he cannot at the same time speak in the name of the other one. But he is in fact capable of passing from one to the other with the rapidity that we know.

Here then is something that has already been sufficiently described here for me not to have to redo its whole construction and commentary, the first relationship that moreover is pregnant with all the others, from S_1 to S_2, from this signifier that represents the subject for another signifier. In the effort that we make to circumscribe what is involved as regards the other of these signifiers, we try, as we have already written, to open up the field in which everything that is second signifier, namely, the body, at the level of which the subject is going to be represented by a signifier, to inscribe at the locus of O, this locus

which is the big Other. I think that you sufficiently remember that by writing what is involved in this way, all we can do, at the level of the very inscription of S_2, is to repeat that for everything that follows, namely, everything that may be inscribed subsequently, we must put the mark of O again as locus of inscription. Namely, to see in short there being hollowed out from what I called the last time the in-form (l'en-forme) of this O - a new noun that we are making up for our own (257) use, the in-form of O - the o that holes it.

Let us pause for a moment at something that I consider as sufficiently understood because of having been - I had some testimony of it - tangible to some people who found some evidence, I mean in clinical work, for this in-form of O, a formula designed to show what is really involved in o. Namely, the topological structure of O itself, which means that the O is not complete, is not identifiable in any case to a 1, to a whole. In a word that this O is absolutely to be felt, to be represented, as if it were at the level of paradox, the paradox that logicians had good reason for creating, the paradox of the set described as that of all the sets that do not contain themselves. I think that you have already handled this paradox sufficiently. It is quite clear that as regards this set of all the sets that do not contain themselves, we have either one thing or the other. Either it is going to contain itself and that is a contradiction, or it does not contain itself, so then not being one of those that does not contain itself, it contains itself, and we find ourselves before a second contradiction. This is quite simple to resolve: the set of all the sets that do not contain themselves can only in effect be written as a function in the following form. Namely E, having as a characteristic this x in so far as it is different from x.

$$E\,(x \neq x).$$

Now this is where it overlaps our difficulty with the big Other. If the big Other presents this topological character which means that its in-form is o, and we are going to be able to touch very directly what that means, it is because it is true. It is because it must be posited that, whatever may be the conventional usage that is made of it in mathematics, the signifier cannot in any case be held to be able to designate itself. S_1 or S_2 in themselves are not each, in any way, cannot be, the representative of themselves except by being distinguished from themselves. This alterity of the signifier to itself is properly what is designated by the term of big Other marked by an O. If we inscribe this big Other, marked by an O, if we make of it a signifier, what it designates is the signifier as Other. The first Other there is, the first encountered in the field of the signifier is radically other, namely, other than itself. It introduces the Other as such into its inscription, as separated from this inscription itself.

This O, qua exterior to S_2 that inscribes it, is the in-form of O, namely, the same thing as o. Now this o, as we know, is the subject itself in (258) so far as it can only be represented by a representative that is S_1 on this occasion. The first otherness, is that of the signifier which can only express the subject in the form of what we have learned to circumscribe in analytic practice in terms of a particular strangeness. And it is this that I would like, I would say not to open up today because moreover in a seminar that I gave at one time, it was in the year 1961-62, on Identification, I laid its foundations. It is these foundations themselves that I am recalling, simply summarised and brought together today, to make you sense something that is not to be taken as given to any analyst, of course, except by analytic experience. He knows what is involved in this o as essential to the subject and as marked by this strangeness. Besides I already enumerated these o's long enough ago for it to be well known, from the breast to excrement, from the voice to the look, what is meant in its ambiguity by the word strangeness, with its affective note and also its indication of a topological margin. What is at stake, is to make those who do not have this as a datum of experience sense something or other that can evoke its reasonable place in the reference points of what is considered as practical experience – wrongly, it is no more practical than analytic experience. But let's go! What might be least strange in appearance could represent the subject for us here. Take it, at the start, as being as undetermined as you wish. What distinguishes the one who is here from the one who is there and who is only his neighbour, of course, we can grasp. We can make a start on it, from something that is supposed to be not strange at all, from a type of quite common material. This is what I did when I was talking about identification, I designated the trace (trace). The trace means something, the trace of a hand, the trace of a foot, an imprint. Observe carefully here, at this level, that trace is distinguished from signifier differently to what in our definitions we have already distinguished as sign. The sign, I said, is what represents something for someone. Here there is no need for someone. A track is sufficient in itself. And starting from there are we going to be able to situate what is involved in what I called earlier the essence of the subject?

We can here and now posit that what the trace becomes through metaphor, the sign if you wish, through metaphor also, these words are not in the right place because I have just ruled them out, what a subject signifies qua this trace, this sign, contrary to the natural trace has no other support than the in-form O. What does that mean? The trace passes on to the in-form of O the ways (façons) in which it was effaced. The subject is the very ways by which, as imprint, the track finds itself effaced. A witticism that I already pinned to this remark, entitling what could be said about it: the four effacings of the subject (les quatre effaçons du sujet). The subject is the one that effaces the trace, by transforming it into look, look to be understood as slit, half glimpse. It is through this that he tackles what is involved in the other who has left the trace. He has passed that way, he is beyond.

(259) It is not enough to say, of course, that a subject as such does not leave a trace. What defines him and at the same time delivers him (le livre), is first of all something through which he is effectively distinguished. As compared to any living organism what is involved in the animal that speaks, is that he can efface them, and efface them as such, as being his tracks (traces). This is enough for him to be able to make of them something other than tracks, rendezvous' that he gives himself, for example. When Tom Thumb lays a trail of white pebbles, it is something different to a track. You should sense here the difference that is already being outlined in the pack that, in pursuing something, behaves in a particular way, make no mistake about it, but behaves in a way that is inscribed in the order of smell, of sniffing, as they say. And this is not necessarily foreign to the human animal himself. But this behaviour is different to the scansion of a track that has been mapped out as such on the support of the voice.

Here you are touching the limit. At the level of the pack, who would dare to sustain that their baying covers their tracks? It is all the same already what can be called an outline of the word. But it is distinct, this support of the voice is distinct, this the datum of the voice, where there is language, where there is this support that characterises in an autonomous way a certain type of track. A creature that can read its tracks is able through this to re-inscribe himself elsewhere than where he found them. This re-inscription is the link that makes him henceforth dependent on another whose structure does not depend on him.

Everything opens up to what belongs to the register of the subject defined as "what effaces his tracks". The subject, at the limit and to make you sense the original dimension of what is at stake, I would call him the one that replaces his tracks by his signature. And you know, a signature, not much is asked to constitute someone as a subject. An illiterate at the mairie who does not know how to write, it is enough for him to make a cross, a symbol of the bar barred, of the effaced track, the clearest form of what is at stake. When first you leave a sign and then something cancels it, that is enough as a signature. And the fact that it is the same for whoever is asked for it, changes nothing in the fact that this will be accepted to authenticate the act in question, the presence well and truly of someone who, juridically, is held to be a subject. Nothing more and nothing less but whose level I am trying to define, certainly not to make an absolute of it but precisely to mark its links of dependency. Because the remark begins here. The signifier is born from effaced tracks. What is then the consequence of this? It is that these effaced tracks are only worthwhile through the system of others, whether they are similar or the same. It is only in these others established in a system, that there begins the typical import of language. These effaced tracks are the only ones accepted. Accepted by whom? Well then, here we land on our feet again. In the same way (260) that in the definition of the subject a signifier represents for another signifier, they are the only ones accepted by whom? Answer:

By the other traces. A pa-âté does not count, as Bridoison says in The marriage. That indeed is why he takes such an interest in it because for him, Bridoison, who takes tracks seriously, it might count. It is a step taken in haste (pas hâté).

So then, if we know that these traces, these traces that are only effaced because they are there, an effaced embossing, these traces that have a different support that is properly the in-form of O in so far as it is necessitated by the fact that it makes an O, an O that functions at the level of the subject, we have then to consider them from the level of their substance. This indeed is what constitutes the import of an element like a look, for example, in eroticism and that the question arises, because it is tangible, of the relationship between what is inscribed in the look and the trace. Does an erotic look leave traces where it is inscribed, in the other, namely, in someone else? It is at this level that there is posed, inserted, the dimension of shame. It is demonstrated here in a tangible fashion. Shame is simply a dimension proper to the subject as such.

Will we briefly, at this turn, organise in a way that is a little different to the usual litany, this relation of the signifier to the in-form of O? Certainly yes, even though rapidly, to recall that it is not by chance that, at the high point of our contemporary life, writing is affirmed to be a relationship of writing to the look as o-object. This alone is what gives its correct status to a grammatology. The look, in all the ambiguity that I already marked earlier in connection with the relationship to the track, the glimpse and, in a word, the cut in what is seen, the thing that opens out beyond the seen. Undoubtedly the accent to be put on writing is capital for a correct evaluation of what is involved in language. And that writing is first and ought to be considered as such with regard to speech, is something after all that can be considered not simply as licit but made obvious by the simple existence of a writing like Chinese where it is clear that what is of the order of apprehension of the look is not unrelated to what is translated into the voice. Namely, that there are phonetic elements, but that there are many also that are not so. This is all the more striking in that, from the point of view of structure, of the strict structure of what is involved in a language, no tongue holds up in a purer fashion than this Chinese tongue where every morphological element is reduced to a phoneme. So then it is there that it would have been most simple, to say that writing is only a transcription of what is stated in words. It is striking to see that, quite the contrary, writing, far from being a transcription, is a different system, a system to which eventually there is attached what is cut up in a different support, that of the voice.

(261) Undoubtedly, the term cut is what predestines these supports, definable materially as look and voice, what predestines them to this function of being what, replacing the track, establishes this sort of totality from which a topology is constructed as defining the Other, at its term. As you see, only substructural considerations are involved here. Not at all, of course, original ones because, after all, this does not say how this Other began. It says how it holds together when it is there. Where it originated, is indeed something that up to the present is left in parenthesis. A marginal remark, because I continue, after this 1 and 2 concerning look and voice, to say what can come subsequently in an approach taken from this angle. It is not, as you see, immediately in the relationship of the subject to the Other qua structured that there comes what is announced now as demand.

It is a curious thing that while in the order of the o-object the breast and the waste product seem to come in the forefront, to the point almost of leaving in a certain shade, in the most frequent handling of what is at stake in analytic regression, the terms of look and of voice, you see here that we are forced on the contrary to suppose as constructed on the support of look and voice, what is going to be of course an element in the demand. And if we rediscover an o-object here, it is for all that an opportunity to highlight that what is demanded is never anything but a place. And it is not for nothing that place evokes this sticking on (placage) which is the essence from which we define the breast as analogous to the placenta, in so far as it defines the subjective relationship founded, as it should be established, on the relationships of the child to the mother. The amboceptor role of the breast between the child and the mother is in reality a prevalent role. It is qua o-object, in so far as he is stuck onto its wall, that the child-subject is articulated, that his message is received from the mother and he is answered. The third term is what one asks for with these signifiers, and you see its link with this other element "o".

Finally, by articulating things from this angle, we will see, we will put our finger on the fact that what is generated, namely, any sense, the signified properly speaking, it is as an effect of a fall from this operation that it is to be situated here. Sense, which is not simply an effect but a rejected effect, an effect that is carried away, and moreover an effect that accumulates, culture in a word, participates in this something that flows from an economy founded on the structure of the o-object. Namely, that it is indeed as waste product, as excrement of the subjective relation as such, that what gives material for dictionaries, about what is said to be the accumulation of senses that have been concentrated around a signifier, in the course of a certain recordable practice, as having become common, it is indeed in the register of the second o-object, of the anal object that it must here be inscribed, in this perspective.

(262) Such are the four fashions/effacings (effaçons), in which the subject can be inscribed, the subject that, in the middle of this, is of course properly speaking ungraspable because of only able to be represented by a representative. It is in so far as it is inscribed in the field of the Other that it subsists, and this is what we have to deal with if we want to account in a correct fashion for what is at stake in psychoanalysis. The distance can be measured between what is defined as a subject and what is held to be a person. The distance can be measured, namely, they must be very severely distinguished. Every kind of personalism in psychoanalysis lends itself to every deviation, to every confusion. In the psychoanalytic perspective, what is defined, marked, in other registers described as moral, as being the person, we cannot situate at any other level than that of symptom. The person begins where, of course, this subject as I have situated it for you, is differently anchored, is anchored in a much broader way, the one that brings into play what, no doubt, is placed at its origin, namely, enjoyment.

It is because analytic experience teaches us here to outline differently the cartographical atlas, as I might say, of what is involved in these operations that refer to the subject, that it takes on its importance. It is in this that it inaugurates a method. It does not claim to reconstitute any new whole, but assuredly, here and now it upsets the old systems of projection that constituted a whole.

Obviously there should here be pointed out in the margin all sorts of indications that are suggestions, indices. An important point in the meaning of the index, in a discovery in progress, is assuredly something quite different to the way we are able to distinguish it, for example, in the tongue. To make of it something distinctive in a certain sort of signifying indication, that I propose to those who may here have a penchant to come back to what Freud stated in Group psychology and analysis of the ego. To consider the degree to which the chief, the leader, the key element in identification as he states it, becomes clearer in this perspective in that there is shown there the solution that makes possible the way in which the subject is strictly identified to o. In other words that he becomes what he truly is, namely, a subject that is itself barred.

What we have seen and what henceforth ought to be considered by us as always being able to be reproduced, the passage from a whole mass to the function of univocal look, as I might say, is something that can only be accounted for by the perception of the possibilities offered in this register to the signifier that is privileged by being the most summary one, by being reduced to what Freud designates as being purely and simply the mark, the function of the 1 as unique. Now here then is the system to which thinking is entirely subject. From it, you should clearly sense, there is no question in any case of anything that can be articulated, and specifically as knowledge, going outside it. The consequences on something living of language, the system of signifiers, enveloping it, is very specifically that starting from it, the image is always more or less marked by being assumed into the system as signifying. This is necessary from the function of the type, and of what is called the universal.

Why is it not tangible? Why has it not yet become common, and why is it not yet in some way effective in the renewal of institutions, that the fact that the images are taken up in the operation of the signifier is there to make us sensitive, the whole of psychoanalytic experience bears witness to it, to the fact that what is lost there, is the imaginary function in so far as it corresponds to the harmony of male and female. If there is something that analysis demonstrates it is that it is because of the grip in the subject not simply that everything that can be designated as male is ambiguous, indeed can be revoked when closely criticised, but that it is just as true on the other side. And that this is sanctioned by a very specific fact of experience that at the level of the subject, there is no recognition as such of the male by the female nor of the female by the male. Everything that any kind of deep exploration shows us about the history of the couple, is that identifications are multiple, overlapping one another and always at the end forming a composite whole. The ambiguity that remains about everything that could be inscribed in the signifier about what is involved in what distinguishes radically, as we know, at the biological level – when I say radically I am omitting of course at the level of mammals the characteristics described as sexually secondary and the possible distinction between sex tissue as compared to phanerogamic sex. But let us leave to one side what may be involved in this. Let us note that what analytic experience designates is very precisely that at this level, there is no signifying coupling. It is at the point that, in the theory, although active-passive, voyeur-seen, etc oppositions are made, no opposition designating male-female has ever been promoted as fundamental.

The important thing, and the important thing that is in a way preliminary to the question that is raised of what is involved, in the signifying system, of the function described as the phallus, in so far as it is what is effectively found to intervene, and in a way which it is of course never in any case anything but a third function. It represents either what is first defined as what is lacking, namely, grounding the type of castration as establishing that of the woman, or what on the contrary, on the side of the male, is indicated in a way that is so problematic, what one could call the enigma of absolute enjoyment. In any case, it is not a matter here of correlative reference points, of distinctive reference points. One and the same reference point dominates the whole register of what is involved in the relation of being sexed. This privileged signifier, I want to mark here, justifies (264) in a long construction, which was made in close contact with the analysis articulated of what has been written, from what remains as a testament of our experience of neurotics, I was able to qualify as missing signifier? The question is important because if assuredly for what is involved in the articulation of the function of the subject, you clearly see that, however far the articulation of knowledge may be pushed, the subject shows the flaw there. To say that the phallus is the missing signifier at the level that I was able to state it, at the point of my discourse when I risked, let us say, first putting it forward, I believe that the context was not yet sufficiently articulated for me to be able to say what I am now specifying.

Let us start again, and this is the interest of our reference today, of starting from the trace. Let us start from this supporting point and let us remember the Arab proverb that, in my Ecrits, I quoted somewhere a long time ago. There are four things (I no longer know which, I must say that I forgot the fourth or that I am not trying to remember it immediately) that leave no trace, the one that I evoked at this turning point. The foot of the gazelle on the rock, there is also the fish in the water and what interests us more, the man in the woman, says the proverb, does not leave a trace. This can on occasion be objected to in the following form, whose importance one knows in the phantasies of neurotics, a little sickness from time to time. But precisely this is what is instructive. The role of venereal diseases is not at all random in the structure. We cannot start from any trace to ground the signifier of the sexual relationship. Everything is reduced to this signifier the phallus, precisely, which is not in the system of the subject since it is not the subject that it represents but, as one might say, sexual enjoyment qua outside the system, namely, absolute. Sexual enjoyment in so far as it has this privilege as compared to all the others, the fact is that something in the pleasure principle, that we know constitutes a barrier to enjoyment, the fact is that something in the pleasure principle allows it access all the same. You must admit that even from Freud's pen, we read that this is enjoyment par excellence, and what is more it is true. But that it should be read from the pen of a savant who merits so much this title as our Freud does, this has all the same something that may make us dream. But it is not in this system of the subject, there is no subject of sexual enjoyment.

And these remarks have no other interest than to allow us to specify the sense of the phallus as missing signifier. It is the signifier outside the system, and in a word the conventional one to designate what is involved in sexual enjoyment as radically foreclosed. If I spoke about foreclosure quite rightly to designate certain effects of the symbolic relation, it is here that it must be seen, that the point must be designated where it cannot be revised. And if I add that everything that is repressed in the symbolic reappears in the real, it is indeed (265) because enjoyment is quite real. The fact is that in the system of the subject, it is nowhere symbolised, nor can it be symbolised. This

indeed is why there is necessarily, in Freud's remarks, this enormity that seems to disturb no one, except a few people: a myth that strictly does not resemble any myth known to mythology. Old Kroeber and Levi-Strauss see very clearly that this does not form part of their universe and they say so, but it is exactly as if they had said nothing, since everybody continues to believe that the Oedipus complex is an acceptable myth. It is so, in effect, in a certain sense, but note that this means nothing other than the place where this enjoyment that I have just defined as absolute must be situated. The myth of the primordial father, is of the one who confuses in enjoyment all the women. The simple form of the myth says enough about it. It means that we do not know what enjoyment is at stake, is it his own or that of all the women? Except that feminine enjoyment has remained, as I have pointed out to you, also still at the state of an enigma in analytic theory.

What is meant then by this phallic function that seems, by not representing the subject, to mark nevertheless a point of his determination as a field limited by a relationship to what is structured as Other. It is by auscultating more closely, by coming back from these radical perspectives towards our experience, that we are immediately going to see how things are expressed. The turning point from which the birth of a neurosis emerges, is what? It is the positive intrusion of an auto-erotic enjoyment that is perfectly typified in what are called the first sensations more or less linked to onanism, however you want to describe it, in the child. The important thing is that it is at this point, for the cases that fall under our jurisdiction, namely, those that generate a neurosis, it is at this precise point, at the very moment that this positivisation of erotic enjoyment is produced that correlatively there is also produced the positivation of the subject as dependency, anaclitism I said the last time, on the desire of the Other. Here there is designated the entry point through which the structure of the subject becomes a drama. The whole experience that is going to confirm at what frontiers, at what junctions this drama is going to explode, deserves to be articulated. I think that I already sufficiently marked the last time the weight the o-object takes in it, not so much in so far as it is presentified but in demonstrating retroactively that it was what previously constituted the whole structure of the subject.

We are going to see at what other frontiers the drama breaks out. But here and now we know from the fall-out of these effects, that it is thanks to the positive relation, to the enjoyment described as sexual, but without, for all that, the sexual conjunction being in any way (266) assured, that something is designated as essential for the position of the subject. It is the desire to know. The decisive step taken by Freud about the relation of sexual curiosity to the whole order of knowledge, is the essential point of the psychoanalytic discovery. And it is from the connection between what is involved in o - namely, where the subject can rediscover his real essence as essentially lack of enjoyment, and nothing more, whatever representative he may be designated by subsequently - and the field of the Other, on the other hand, in so far as the knowledge that is at the horizon of this domain forbidden of its nature which is that of enjoyment is organised in it. With it the question of sexual enjoyment introduces this minimum of diplomatic relations that I would say are so difficult to sustain. It is in as far as something is produced that I called drama, that the significance of the Other qua structured and holed is something different to what we can metaphorically call the signifier that holes it, namely, the phallus. It is in so far as it is something different that we see what happens when the young subject has to respond to what is produced by the intrusion of the sexual function into his subjective field.

I made great play, and those who attended still remember it, in connection with little Hans. Little Hans which is the exemplary observation of a first absolutely disorganised exploration, going around in circles, up to a certain point undirected, with nevertheless the imperialist direction of the reference to the father first who plays a role whose flaws I marked and the Freud does not dissimulate. But Freud himself is for his part also the final reference, that of a knowledge presumed to be absolute. I took care, as I said, to take up at length everything that is outlined in this disorder in order to show its different strata. But one of them is nothing other than the game that little Hans indulges in which is that of the confrontation of the big giraffe and the small giraffe. I was able to underline its importance by showing what the phobia reveals at its foundation. Namely, the impossibility of making the hommelle, namely, this phallic mother - which is the relationship that Hans expresses in the big giraffe – co-exist with, on the other hand, anything whatsoever that might reduce it. If he draws the little giraffe, it is clearly to show not that it is an image comparable to the other, but that it is a writing on a sheet of paper. And for that reason, he zerwurzelt's it, as it is put in the text, he crumples it up and sits on it.

The important thing here is not the imaginary or identificatory function of Hans to this complement of the mother, the phallus, which is fundamentally his great rival. It is that he makes this phallus pass over into the symbolic because it is there that it is going to have its efficacy, and everyone knows what the order of efficacy of phobias is. If there is one thing that is useful in political vocabulary, and it is not for nothing at the joining of power and of knowledge, it is to launch into a corner of the world to which I already made an allusion earlier with language, that of the paper tiger. What is more of a paper tiger than a (267) phobia, since very often, the phobia is a phobia that a child has for the tigers that are in his album, tigers that are really paper. Only, if politicians have all the trouble in the world in persuading the masses to put paper tigers in their place, here the function, or more exactly the indication, to be given is exactly the opposite. It is to give all its importance to the fact that, to complete something, something that cannot be resolved at the level of the subject, at the level of intolerable anxiety, the subject has no other resource than to foment for himself the fear of a paper tiger. This all the same is what is instructive, because as well, of course, it is not a subject of the type that psychoanalysts imagine. Namely, the way it expresses itself, is a facility of style. He does all of that by arranging it as best he can. The paper tiger, at a moment, at the moment when what is at stake is precisely the person of little Hans, is entirely a symptom. At that moment, all by itself, the world, or at least its foundation, the hommelle before whom he is, all by herself is transformed into a paper tiger.

There is the closest link between the structure of the subject and the fact that the question is thus posed that the hommelle, is something that all of a sudden grimaces, is frightening. And whether it is a tiger or a smaller animal, a cat, this is of no importance, no analyst is deceived about its true function. If then we have been led, at the end, to see the importance of lack as regard the quite real object that the penis is in everything that determines what one can call a sexed relationship, it is because the path has been opened up for us by the neurotic, and by the castration complex, in so far as it effectively realises the place of lack in the field of the signifier. It is only the result of the discourse through which we have to ward off the questions posed by the neurotic. It is only at the end of a psychoanalysis that it is necessary that what is and well and truly remains, as little Hans says, rooted, angewachsen, and thank God, one would wish it to be, at least for most, in a position to be put to use, it is necessary that on a certain plane it should have been zerwurzelt, that one should clearly show that it is only a symbol.

Hence, of course, what I already said was a problem at the end of the treatment of little Hans. If it is necessary, of course, that he like every neurotic should come at the end to the formula that to become a man I do not have the penis as a symbol, because that is the castration complex. But it must be observed that this can be cut in two ways. The "I do not have the penis" which is precisely what is meant by saying that the end of analysis, is the realisation of the castration complex. This, of course, rejects elsewhere the pure and simple function of the penis as it functions, namely, outside the symbolised register. But this could also be cut differently. Namely: "I do not have the penis as a symbol, it is not the penis that qualifies me as signifier of my virility", and this was not obtained from little Hans because this is (268) what passed through the mesh of the net. Little Hans who never stopped during all this time playing with little girls his role of the one who has it, preserves, as I well and truly made the reservation at one time, preserves in sexual relationships this something that puts in the foreground the penis as an imaginary function. Namely, that this is what defines him as virile. Namely, that however heterosexual he may show himself to be, he is very exactly at the same point that the homosexuals are at, I mean those that recognise themselves as such. Because one cannot extend the field of what structurally corresponds properly to homosexuality too far into the field of the appearances of normal relations, when what is at stake are sexual relationships.

Hence the importance of the exploration and the statement of this joint that, between the imaginary and the symbolic, is at its correct place the function, or more exactly the aspects of the function that we define as castration complex. How this is further fed by the experience we have of the joint between the Other and enjoyment in other forms of neurosis, is what I will subsequently continue with.

Seminar 21: Wednesday 21 May 1969

(269) The system of nowhere (nulle part), one could say, is what we have to present. It is here indeed that the term utopia would finally take on its sense, but this time realised from the proper end, as I might say. The old "nullibiquity" to which, in the distant past, I had given again the lustre it deserves for having been invented by Bishop Wilkings, is nowhere. What is it? It is enjoyment. What analytic experience demonstrates, it must be said again, is that by a link to something that is nothing other than what permits the emergence of knowledge, enjoyment is excluded, the circle is closed. This exclusion is only stated from the system itself in so far as it is the symbolic. Now, it is through this that it is affirmed as real, the last real of the functioning of the system itself that nowhere excludes it. It has become everywhere again from this very exclusion which is the way through which it is realised. This indeed, as we know, is what our practice applies itself to unmasking, unveiling in what we have to deal with, in the symptom, unmasking this relation to enjoyment, our real, but in so far as it is excluded.

That is why we advance these three terms as a support: enjoyment in so far as it is excluded, the Other as locus where that is known, the o as an effect of the fall that results - because that is what is at stake in the affair - that results from the fact that, in the operation of the signifier, it is nevertheless enjoyment that is aimed at. The signifier arises from the unspeakable relationship of this something that, by having received from somewhere, this means, the signifier, is stamped by it with a relation to this something that from there develops, takes shape as the Other. This link of the subject to the Other, an Other which has avatars, has not said its final word. This indeed is what we are grappling with. It is at the level of these terms that we have to situate this psychoanalysis which is, as I might say, from its origin the crude experience of them, which came to birth no doubt in an exceptional flash through Freud. Ever since, it has never ceased to be at the mercy of the different aspects presented to it, which are identical to those in whose network the subject it treats is caught.

I would like to start from something that is as close as possible. Listen, you can talk to me about morality as much as you want, analytic morality if you wish, or another one, it does not matter. Good. Here is an object that I have a preference for, a preference as an apparatus. It is a fountain pen that in its slenderness is as close as possible to a pen, a pen in the antique, antediluvian sense; there are only very few people (270) who use it. As such its content is very limited because as you see, its reservoir can fit in and end up by becoming reduced to something that can be held in the palm of your hand. Its reservoir contains very little. The result is that it is very difficult to fill, because osmotic effects are produced, which means that when one pours in a drop, the drop is just the same size as the entrance. It is therefore very inconvenient; and nevertheless I am fond of it. I have a very special preference for it, because it reproduces a certain type of pen with a feather, a real feather and in effect it dates, it dates from an epoch

when it really was a feather and not something rigid like it is now. Someone who knew that I was looking for one gave this pen to me. It was a present that had just been made very few minutes, or hours or days before, it does not matter, by someone who certainly made of it a homage of a rather precise order, that was in fact fetishistic. It was moreover an object that was distinguished by coming from the grandmother of the person who donated it to the person who gave it to me. That indeed is why it is not easy to find. There are very particular shops, it appears, in New York where they sell pens from the Belle Epoque. I got one as you see along a different path.

I have then a glimpse of the history of this object that, moreover, is close to my heart for its own sake, altogether independently of this history, because in truth I am not specially grateful to the person who gave it to me for having made this present. My relation to it is independent; it is certainly very close to what the o-object is for me. I have a glimpse of its history but, for every object, do you not see something from the way I have brought this one to life, that this question of its history is posed just as much as for any subject. How can one imagine that one knows this history, who can answer for it except by establishing this Other as the locus where it is known. And who does not see, if one opens up this dimension to him, that at least for some people, and, I would dare to say, for everyone, it exists. For some people it is altogether prevalent, but for everyone it forms a foundation. There is somewhere where everything that has happened is known. Once one begins to question oneself along this path, one recognises that the signifier of O as completed is implicit and that for the obsessional neurotic it is much more so than for the others. That is why, at the level of history, in so far as – that is why I took this angle – it is suggested not at all directly about the subject but moreover about the fate of objects, it is along this path that we can see how mad is the presupposition of some locus or other where it is known. This is important because it is clear that "it is known, ça se sait" turns immediately into the interest the question takes on. There where it is known, in the neutral sense that we have introduced it, this is where the question is posed about whether it knows itself.

Reflexivity only emerges from consciousness by this detour that must (271) be verified, the fact is that where one supposes that it – everything - is known, does it know that it is known? If one questions oneself about what is involved in mathematical activity, it is a funny thing to note that the mathematician very specially is still just as incapable of saying anything about its foundation, except that he knows very well when he is doing mathematics. As far as telling you how he discerns it, up to the present, mum's the word. He can say that this is not it, but what it is has not yet been found. We are putting forward a statement that perhaps may begin something along this path; to organise things, things that are said, in such a way that it knows itself, undoubtedly, at every instant, and that it can bear witness to it. As someone said to me quite recently, a mathematician with whom I was speaking about it, what characterises a mathematical statement is the freedom of its context. A theorem can be stated all by itself and be defended. It carries in itself this sufficient dose of overlapping itself that makes it free of the discourse that introduces it. The matter is to be looked at again closely. This aspect of difference to other discourses where every quotation risks being excessive with respect to what surrounds it, what is called context, is important to note. This substance of instantaneous "it knows itself" as such, is accompanied by the fact that it supposes that everything that is reached there is known, in the sense of "it overlaps itself", it is known as a whole. Namely, that what is revealing, is that the presuppositions of a discourse that aspires to be able to entirely overlap itself encounters limits. It encounters limits in the fact precisely that points exist in it that cannot be posited. The first image of them will moreover be given by the sequence of integers and by something that articulates that what is defined as being greater than any other one can precisely not be posited, I mean in an infinite series, as they say, of integers.

It is precisely because this number is excluded, and properly qua symbol – nowhere can there be written this number greater than any other – it is very precisely from this impossibility of writing it that the whole series of integers takes on its character, not of being a simple representation (graphie) of something that can be written, but of being something that is in the real. This very impossibility is what the real arises from. This mechanism is very precisely what allows it to be taken up again, at the level of the symbol, and to write under the heading of transfinite this very sign that cannot be posited in the series of integers, and to begin to question what can be done starting from this sign that has been posited as not able to be posited in the series of integers. And to notice that effectively this sign, a symbol taken up at the level of what constitutes the reality of the series of integers, allows a new symbolic treatment where the relations acceptable at the end of the series of integers can be taken up again. Not all but very certainly a part of them. And this is the progress that is being pursued by a (272) discourse that, knowing itself at every instant, is never found without this combination of limits with holes that is called infinity. Namely, not graspable until precisely it is, by being taken up into a different structure, reduced to this limit, the aporia in any case only being the introduction to a structure of the Other.

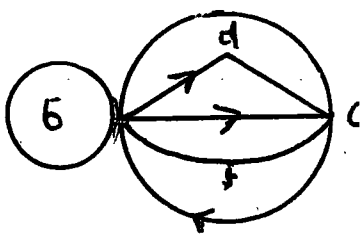
This is what is very clearly seen in set theory, into which one can for a certain time in effect advance innocently. It interests us in a particular way because after all, at the more radical level that we have to deal with, namely, the incidence of the signifier in repetition, in appearance there is no objection. There is no objection at first to the O being the entire inscription of all possible histories. Every signifier refers all the more to the Other in that it cannot refer to itself except as other. There is no obstacle then to the signifiers being divided up in a circular fashion, which, under this heading, allows it very easily to be stated that there is a set of everything that of itself is not identified to itself. By going around in a circle, it is perfectly conceivable that everything is organised, even the catalogue of all the catalogues that do not contain themselves. It is perfectly admissible on this single condition that one knows, and it is certain, that no catalogue contains itself, except by its title. This does not prevent the set of all the catalogues having this closed character that each catalogue, in so far as it does not contain itself, can always be inscribed in another that it contains itself. The only thing excluded, if we trace out the network of these things, is the sketch that would be written in this way. The one that admits from one point to another of any network whatsoever from an oriented network, that excludes, if b refers to a certain number of other points, d, e, f that excludes the fact that b refers to itself. It is enough on this occasion for b to refer to c, and that c itself refers to b for there no longer to be any obstacle to the correlative subsistence of b and c and that a set includes them. [e ?]



If something questions us, it comes precisely from analytic experience as locating somewhere this point at the infinity of everything that is organised in the order of signifying combinations. This point at infinity being irreducible in so far as it concerns a certain enjoyment, that has remained problematic, and that for us sets up the question of enjoyment under an aspect that is no longer external to the system of knowledge. It is around this signifier of enjoyment, this signifier excluded in so far as it is the one that we promote under the term of (273) phallic signifier, it is around this that there is organised all the biographies to which analytic literature tends to reduce what is involved in neurosis.

It is not because we can overlap with as complete a homology as possible what are called the interpersonal relations of what we call an adult – an adult, it must be said, fundamentally adulterated. Because what we find throughout these relations, we seek in the second biography that we say is original, which is that of his infantile relations. And there, at the end of a certain familiarisation by the analyst, we take as accepted the relations of tension that are established with respect to a certain number of terms, the father, the mother, the birth of a brother or a little sister that we consider as primitive. But that, of course, only takes on this sense, only takes on this weight by reason of the place that they hold in my articulation. Like for example – there will perhaps be more developed ones, I hope so – but like in fact the one I am articulating for you with respect to knowledge, enjoyment and a certain object in so far as primordially it is with respect to them that there are going to be situated all these primordial relations. In these it is not enough to bring up simple homology by going into the past with whoever comes to tell us about his present day relations. Whether we want it or not, whether we know it or not, we bring into play its weight, its presence and its agency in the whole way in which we understand this second primary biography, described as infantile. This is only there, quite often, to mask the question from us, the one on which we for our part should really question ourselves, I mean we analysts. Namely, what determines in this way the infantile biography whose mainspring is quite obviously always only the way in which there are presented what we call desires in the father, in the mother. These consequently stimulate us to explore not simply the history but the style of presence in which each of these three terms, knowledge, enjoyment and o-object were effectively presented to the subject. This is what ensures, and here there lies, what we call improperly the choice of neurosis, indeed the choice between psychosis and neurosis. There was no choice, the choice was already made in what is presented to the subject but is only perceptible, locatable in function of three terms as we have just tried here to bring them out.

This matter has more than one implication. It has a historical aspect. Who does not see that if we must posit what psychoanalysis signifies in history, and if certain choices are also offered to it, it is in as far as we live in a time when the dimension of community, the relationships of knowledge to enjoyment, are not the same as they were, for example, in ancient times. And that, undoubtedly, we cannot take our position as being comparable, for example, to that of the Epicureans or (274) any other such school. There was a certain position of withdrawal with respect to enjoyment that was possible for them, in a way that was rather innocent. At a time when, through the bringing into play of what we call capitalism, a certain position includes all of us in relation to enjoyment in a characteristic fashion, as one might say, by the purity of its framework. What is called the exploitation of the worker does not consist, very precisely, in the fact that enjoyment is excluded from work. At the same time, it does not give it all its real in the same way as we have evoked earlier the effect of the point at infinity. It is through this that there arises this sort of aporia that suggests the new sense with regard to the dominion of society, the new sense - without precedent in the ancient context - that the word revolution takes on. And this is why we have our word to say in it. To recall that this term is, as Marx perfectly well saw, and this is why he articulates the only thing that has been found efficacious up to the present, it is the close solidarity of this term called revolution with the very system that carries it, which is the capitalist system.

That on this we have something that can perhaps offer the opening through a series of examples of what can be involved in a joint where the circle will open out, this is the interest of psychoanalysis. I mean its interest in history. It is moreover what it must totally fail at. Because to take things at the level of biography, what we see being offered at the turning point that the moment of the outbreak of neurosis constitutes biographically is the choice that is offered. It is offered in a way that is all the more insistent in that it is what is determining in this turning point. The choice between what is presentified, namely, the approach to this point of impossibility, of this point at infinity, that is always introduced by the approach of sexual contact. And the correlative aspect that is announced from the fact that at the level of the subject, by reason of the premature moment – but how would it not always be premature with regard to impossibility – by reason of the premature moment that it comes into operation in childhood, what projects, masks, diverts this impossibility by having to be exercised in terms of inadequacy, of being only qua living being, a living being reduced to his own forces, necessarily not up to it. The alibi taken for impossibility in inadequacy, is moreover the slope that what I called the direction of psychoanalysis may take. And this, after all, is not humanly speaking something in which in effect we cannot fail to feel ourselves the ministers of a help that on one or other point, with respect to one or other person, may be the occasion of a benefit. Nevertheless, this is not what justifies psychoanalysis. It is not from there that it emerged. It is not there that it has its sense and for a simple reason, which is that it is not this that the neurotic bears witness to. Because what the neurotic testifies to us, if we want to hear what he (275) is telling us through all his symptoms, is that where his discourse is placed it is clear that what he is looking for is something different than to be equal to the question he poses.

The neurotic, whether it is a hysteric or an obsessional that is at stake – we will subsequently make the link between the two aspects and this o-object that we have brought forward in the efficacy of phobia – the neurotic puts in question what is involved in the truth of knowledge. And very precisely in the fact that he/it is attached to enjoyment. And in re-posing the question, is he right? Yes certainly, because we know that it is only from this dependency that knowledge has its original status and that in its development, it articulates its distance. Is he right? His discourse is certainly dependent on what is at stake in the truth of knowledge. But as I already articulated before you, it is not at all because this discourse relates to this truth, that it is true. The consistency of the suspension of knowledge on the prohibition of enjoyment does not render any more legible in what, at a certain level, exposes this constitutive knot, and moreover why would it also not express, in the final term, a certain form of aporia? If I said it earlier, in what is presented as a position taken up in the impasses that are formulated as the law of the Other, when it is the sexual that is at stake, I would say that in the final term, after having sifted as much as I could the angle from which the obsessional and the hysteric are distinguished, the best formula that I could give proceeds precisely from what is offered in nature, naturally, as a solution of the impasse

of this law of the Other. For the man who has to fulfill this identification to this function described as that of the symbolic father, the only one that is satisfying - and this is why the position of virile enjoyment in what is involved in sexual conjunction is mythical - for the man, what is offered at the level of the natural is very precisely what is called knowing how to be the master. And, in effect, this was, this probably still is, this was and this still remains sufficiently within someone's reach.

I would say that the obsessional is the one who refuses to take himself as master because, with respect to what is at stake - the truth of knowledge - what is important for him, is the relationship of this knowledge to enjoyment. And what he knows of this knowledge, is that it has nothing, nothing more of what remains from the first incidence of its interdiction, namely, the o-object. Any enjoyment is only thinkable for him as a treaty with the Other as whole always imagined by him as fundamental, with whom he deals. Enjoyment for him is only authorised by a payment, by an always renewed payment, into the insatiable jar of the Danai, into this something that is never finished and that makes of the modalities of the debt the ceremonial where alone he encounters his enjoyment.

Inversely, on the opposite side, the hysteric, and it is not for nothing that there is met this form of answer to the impasses of enjoyment, at the opposite side, the hysteric – and it is precisely because of this that this style is more especially found among women – the hysteric is (276) characterised by not taking herself for the woman. Because in this impasse, in this aporia, just as naturally as for the master, things are offered just as plainly to the woman to fulfill a role in sexual conjunction in which naturally she has a rather large part. What the

hysteric, they say, represses, but what in reality she promotes, is this point at infinity of enjoyment as absolute. She promotes castration at the level of this name of the symbolic father in the place of whom she posits herself, or as wanting to be, in the final moment, his enjoyment. And it is because this enjoyment cannot be reached that she refuses any other which, for her, would only have this diminished character of only being, which moreover is true, something external, by only being at the level of sufficiency or insufficiency, with respect to the absolute relationship that it is a matter of positing.

Read and re-read the observations of hysterics in the light of these terms, and you will see in a completely different way from that of anecdote, from a biographical going around in circles, that the transference by repeating no doubt makes more manageable, but only tempers, to understand the source of what comes to us as an opening, as a gap, by whatever means moreover we try to calm it. Is it not essential to spot this source from which it arises and which is nothing other than the way in which the neurotic questions again this frontier that nothing can in fact suture, the one that is opened up between knowledge and enjoyment.

If, in the articulation that I gave of the 1 and the o, which is certainly not promoted here by chance or in an out of date way, which is nothing other, as I told you, than the way in which, in a mathematical model there is inscribed – and there is no reason to be surprised at it because it is the first thing that you have to encounter – there is inscribed in a series what is connected to the simple repetition of the 1, on the single condition that we inscribe its relation in the form of an addition. After two 1's, a 2, and to continue indefinitely, the last 1 joined to the 2, a 3, 5, and afterwards an 8 and after that a 13, and so on. It is this, as I told you, that by the proportion that it generates, that gets tighter and tighter as the numbers grow, strictly defines the function of o. The series has this property of exposing by being taken up in the opposite sense, by proceeding by subtraction, of culminating at a limit in the negative sense. Which, marked by this proportion of o, will continue to diminish and come to what one makes of it, in this direction, the sum, at a perfectly well defined limit that, then, taken up again is a starting point.

What the hysteric does can be inscribed in this direction, namely, that he or she subtracts this o as such from the absolute 1 of the Other, by questioning it. By questioning whether it delivers or not this final 1, that is in a way her assurance. In this process, it is easy with the help of the model that I have just recalled, to demonstrate that at best all her effort, I mean the effort of the hysteric after having put in question this (277) o, will be nothing more than to find herself as such, strictly equal to this o and to nothing else. Such here is the drama that is expressed, by being transposed from the level where it is, where it is stated in a perfectly correct way in another, is expressed by the irreducible gap of a castration that has been realised.

There are other ways out of the impasse opened up by the hysteric by the fact that it is resolved at the level of statements, at this level that I characterised by the label "famil", by the encounter with castration. But at the other level, at that of stating, at that which promotes the relation between enjoyment and knowledge, who does not know that illustrious historical examples allow it to be grasped that at the level of a knowledge that is supposed to be a knowledge overlapping itself by an experienced knowledge of the relation as it is presented, of the sexual relation as it is only grasped from the apprehension of this point

at infinity which is impasse and aporia, certainly, but which is also a limit, the solution can be found of a subjective equilibrium, on this single condition that the correct tribute is paid from the edifice of a knowledge.

For the obsessional, everyone knows that it is the same; everyone knows that a whole sector depends on the productivity of the obsessional; even those most blind, most closed to historical reality have glimpsed his contribution to what is called thinking. Is this not also here what expresses his limit, what necessitates it being exorcised to the highest degree? It is to here that Freud takes the question when he speaks about the relationships of obsessional ritual to religion. Assuredly all religion is not exhausted in these practices. And this indeed is what is anxiety-provoking in Pascal's wager. It makes us see that by taking things even at the level of the promise, by proving oneself to be a partisan of the God of Abraham, of Isaac and of Jacob, and by rejecting the Other, by rejecting him to the point of saying that one does not know whether he is, nor of course much more what he is. It is nevertheless him, at the level of whether he is or not, of odds or evens, that he questions in the wager, because he is caught up, given his epoch, in this questioning of knowledge.

It is at this point that I will leave you today.

Seminar 22: Wednesday 4 June 1969

(279) There are fewer people standing. For their sakes I am not sorry, but if this means that the audience is becoming depleted, I am sorry since moreover it is necessarily – this is my style – in the final meetings that I will say the most interesting things! This reminds me that last year, of my own volition and for reasons that I will not repudiate, I suspended what I had to say at the beginning of a memorable month of May. However legitimate these reasons may have been, it nevertheless remains that what I said about the psychoanalytic act remains truncated. Given what was at stake, namely, precisely the psychoanalytic act, that no one had even dreamt of naming as such before me, which is an altogether precise sign that people had not even posed a question about it. Since otherwise it was the simplest way to name it, once people realised that in psychoanalysis there was somewhere an act, we must believe that this truth had remained veiled.

I do not think that it is by chance that what I had to state that year about the act found itself then, as I have just said, truncated. There is a relationship, a relationship that is naturally not one of causation, between this shirking of psychoanalysts about the subject of what is involved in an act – specifically the psychoanalytic act – and these events. But there is a relationship all the same between what causes events and the field in which the psychoanalytic act is inserted. So that up to the present one can say that it is no doubt because of some lack of interest in this act that psychoanalysts have not shown themselves to be very prepared or available to even give a hint of a grasp, even a superficial one, of these events. Naturally, it is only accidental that, in the other sense, the events interrupted what I might have had to say about the act, but all the same it does not fail either to represent something that, for my part, I consider to be a certain rendezvous. A rendezvous that I do not regret because it spared me, on the subject of the psychoanalytic act, in short, from coming to say what should not be said.

There you are. All the same, we find ourselves, after what I put forward the last time, brought back to something that is not far from this field. Because what is at stake, as I announced last year, is indeed an act in so far as it is in relationship with what I called, stated, (280) proposed, as being the o-object. Let it be quite clear that, since it is in my title this year and this is what is at stake in my discourse, this is something that ought to find its most formal expression in these final meetings. And, at least for those who are au fait with what I ended on the last time, it seems to me that it is no harm to recall – I advanced it in terms of Pascal's wager – that it is at least the path that I chose this year to introduce it. To introduce it as being in the field of the Other, as defining a certain game (jeu), precisely the stake (enjeu), with the play on words that I make about this term en-je.

It may appear curious that a position that, in this respect, is not ambiguous, that is certainly not a position of religious apologetics, should introduce this element of the wager. And of a wager that finds itself formulated as responding to a certain partner. A partner who is taken there, as one might say, at his word, at the word of a statement that is attributed to him, under a heading, my God, that is generally accepted, the promise of eternal life, for every believer who follows God's commandments. This is held to be something accepted, at least in the field of what constitutes with respect to him, this God, the largest religious reference, namely, the Church.

It is not out of season to start from there, because it has a quite lively relationship with what is at stake as permanent in our structures, and in structures that go much further than structures that could be qualified as mental structures. Structures in so far as they are defined by common discourse, by language, obviously go much further than what can be reduced to the function of mentality. As I very often insisted, this enfolds us from every side, and in things that, at first sight, do not seem to have an obvious relationship. So that this structure which is the one that I am aiming at to start again from today, the original structure, the one that I called that of an Other, to show where, through the incidence of psychoanalysis, it is going, to reveal a quite different other, namely the o. This Other – let there be no doubt about it within our horizon - this Other which is precisely the God of the philosophers, is not so easy to eliminate as people believe. Since in reality it undoubtedly remains stable at the horizon, in any case, of all our thoughts. It is obviously not unrelated to the fact that there is the God of Abraham, of Isaac and of Jacob – you will see it, I will come back to it – and this will be my subject today, the structure of this Other. Because it is very necessary carefully to establish what is to be designated there. It is no less timely, at the outset, to indicate that what constitutes for us, in a certain horizon of structure, in so far as it is determined by common discourse, it is clear that it is no harm to recall that, if this structure, that of the big Other, is for us in a certain field, the very one Freud designated as civilisation, namely, Western civilisation. The presence of the other God, the one that speaks, (281) namely, the God of the Jews, the God of Abraham, Isaac and of Jacob, is not for nothing in the maintenance of this Other.

This is not simply because the God of the philosophers, this big Other is One. What distinguishes the God of the Jews, the one designated as being at the origin of monotheism, is not some development that the One was subsequently able to make. It is not that he posits himself as being himself One that characterises him. The God of the burning bush, the God of Sinai did not say that he was the only God. This deserves to be recalled. He says: "I am what I am". That has a completely different meaning. That does not mean that he is the only one. That means that there is none other at the same time as him where he is. And in truth, if you look at it closely in the text of the Bible, you will see that this is what is at stake. There where he is, in his field, namely in the Holy Land, there is no question of obeying anyone but him. But nowhere is the presence of others denied, where he is not, where it is not his land. And if you look closely at it, it is only when there is an encroachment of the honours rendered to others where there reigns alone the one who said "I am what I am", that chastisements rain down. This might seem in the eyes of some people to have only a historic interest. But I am laying my cards on the table. It is only coming back to what I stated at first, which is that this god that is in question, designates himself by the fact that he speaks. This is what makes it legitimate that whatever distortion was undergone later by this word, because it is not sure that they are saying quite the same thing in the Catholic Apostolic Roman Church, in any case the God that is defined by his relationship to the word, is a God that speaks. This

indeed is why the prophets, as such, are pre-eminent in the Jewish tradition. In other words, the dimension of Revelation as such, namely, of the word as carrying the truth, was never highlighted as much outside this tradition. Elsewhere the place of the Truth is filled, it is necessary for it to be covered, on occasion by myths for example. It is not so by prophesy except in a quite local way that is called oracular but which has a completely different sense to that of the prophetic tradition.

A rather heavy introduction, but all the same necessitated by the reminder of certain quite massive reliefs to be maintained in order to properly understand what is at stake when we put forward, that with regard to the field of truth that interests us as such in an outstanding way, even if we do not identify it to revealed formulae, with respect to this field of the truth, knowledge is elsewhere. That indeed is why, once the dimension of Revelation is introduced, there is introduced at the same time the dimension traditional in our culture that one must not believe extinguished because we are in our time, the dimension of what is improperly called the double truth. That means the distinction between truth and knowledge.

(282) So then what interests us, because this is what psychoanalysis revealed, is what is produced in knowledge. What is produced in knowledge, but was not suspected before psychoanalysis, is the o-object in so far as analysis articulates it for what it is. Namely, the cause of desire, of the division of the subject, of what introduces into the subject as such what the cogito masks. Namely, that alongside this "to be, à être" that it thinks it can reassure itself with, it is essentially and from the beginning lack. It is here that I remind you that I am taking up again the plan through which I believed last year I should

introduce the paradox of the psychoanalytic act, which is that the psychoanalytic act is presented as a stimulus to knowledge. It implies, in the rule that is given to the psychoanalysand, it implies this, since you can say anything you want. And God knows what this may represent at first in terms of being senseless, if we were taken at our word, if people really set about saying - and if this had a sense for those that we introduce to this practice - everything that passed through their heads. If everything that passed through their heads really meant anything at all, where would we end up? If we can have faith in those that we introduce into this enterprise, it is very exactly because of the fact that, even if the person that we introduce into this practice is not capable of saying it, is nevertheless there. Namely, that what is implicit, is that whatever you may say, there is the Other, the Other who knows what it means.

The God of philosophers, however he may have been throughout history attached to the train of the God that speaks, is certainly not foreign to him of course. It was not illegitimate to make of this God of the philosophers the base, the throne, the support, the seat of the one who spoke. That the seat remains even when the other has risen to go, at least for some, the seat remains of this Other, of this Other in so far as he situates this unifying, unified field that has a name for those who think. Let us call it, if you wish, the principle of sufficient reason. That you may not suspect, I mean at least a part of you, a part that I suppose, after all - I do not know whether it exists - you are perhaps all capable of perceiving that you are sustained by the principle of sufficient reason. If you do not perceive it, it is exactly the same thing. You are in the field where the principle of sufficient reason sustains everything. And it would certainly not be easy to make you conceive of what is happening where things are otherwise. What is perfectly conceivable from the moment that it is put to you, when it is stated as being, for example, at the horizon of what renders psychoanalytic experience possible, namely, that if there is not a sufficient reason for whatever you may say, in looking no further than to say what passes through your head, there will always be a sufficient reason for it. And that is enough to put on the horizon this big Other, the one who knows.

The thing is in any case quite clear in the privileged subjects of this (283) experience, namely, the neurotics. The neurotic seeks to know. We are going to see more closely why, but he seeks to know. And at the beginning of analytic experience, we have no trouble in encouraging him, in short to have faith in this Other as a locus where knowledge is established, in the subject supposed to know.

It is then as an intervention on the subject of what, at the most basic level, at the most basic level there is, is already articulated as knowledge, that we intervene by an interpretation that is distinguished from what supports the term interpretation everywhere else. Everywhere else an interpretation, that for example of any logical system whatsoever, is to give a system of lesser import that, as they say, illustrates, illustrates it in a way that is more accessible by the fact that it is of lesser import. We remain at the superimposition of articulations of knowledge. Analytic interpretation is distinguished by the fact that, in what is articulated here and now as knowledge, however primitive it may be, what it aims at, is an effect, an effect of knowledge by being articulated there and that it makes tangible under the heading of its truth.

Its truth, as we have said, is on the side of desire, namely, of the division of the subject. And to go straight to it, because naturally we cannot go over the whole path here and what I have to say today is something different to be gone through, which is that the truth that is at stake is summarised as follows. That the Freudian thing, namely, this truth – the Freudian thing, this truth is the same thing – has the property of being asexual, contrary to what is said, namely, that Freudianism is pansexual. Only since the living being who is this being through whom a truth is conveyed has a sexual function and position, there results something from it, something that I tried to articulate for you two years ago now and not simply one. Namely, that there is not, in the precise sense of the word relationship, in the sense where sexual relationship is would be a relation that is logically definable, there is precisely none. What could be called sexual relationship is missing, namely, a relation definable as such between the sign of the male and that of the female. Sexual relationship, what is usually called by this name, can only be made by an act. This is what allowed me to put forward these two terms that there is no sexual act in the sense that this act is supposed to be that of a correct relationship, and that inversely, there is only the sexual act, in the sense that there is only the act to make the relationship.

In what psychoanalysis reveals to us, the fact is that the dimension of the act, of the sexual act in any case, but at the same time of all acts, what has been obvious for a long time, is that its proper dimension is failure. That is why at the heart of the sexual relationship, in psychoanalysis, there is something called castration. I spoke to you earlier about what is produced in knowledge. Necessarily, of course, you did not pay much attention to it. I should have said, what knowledge produces. I was not able to say it in order not to go too (284) quickly. Because in truth, for that to have a sense, it is necessary to come back to it more closely and to denote here the relief of this

dimension that is articulated as properly speaking production. This dimension that only a certain process of technical progress has allowed us to discern, to distinguish as being the fruit of work.

But is it so simple? Is it not apparent that in order for production as such to be distinguished from what was always poiesis, fabrication, work, the level of the potter, it is necessary that there should be made autonomous as such what is very well distinguished in capitalism, namely, the means of production. Since it is around this that everything turns, namely, who disposes of these means. It is by such a homology that the function of knowledge and what its production is will take on its relief. The production of knowledge qua knowledge is distinguished by being a means of production and not simply work of the truth. What knowledge produces, is what I designate under the name of o-object. And this o is what comes to be substituted for the gap that is designated in the impasse of the sexual relationship. This is what is going to duplicate the division of the subject by giving him what was not graspable up to then in any way, because what is proper to castration, is that nothing can properly speaking be stated, because the cause is absent. In its place there comes the o-object as cause substituted for what is radically involved in the flaw of the subject.

And what I told you last year, after having defined the function of the o-object in this way the previous year, is that the psychoanalyst is the one that by this incitement to knowledge even though he does not know all that much about it, and simply by having this path, this means, this device, this analytic rule, finds himself taking on the charge of what is truly the support of this subject supposed to know. And I told you on every tone of the scale that the problem of our epoch, of the state of psychoanalysis, is only itself to be taken as one of the symptoms. The fact is that it is certain that this subject supposed to know, this Other, this unique locus where knowledge is supposed to connect up, does not exist. Nothing indicates that the Other is One, that it is not like the uniquely signifiable subject of the signifier of a particular topology that is summarised by what is involved in the o-object.

How can the psychoanalyst then, and this is where I accentuated the enigma and the paradox of the psychoanalytic act, the psychoanalyst in so far as he induces, as he incites the subject, the neurotic on this occasion, onto the path where he invites him to meet the subject supposed to know, how can the psychoanalyst, if it is true that he knows what a psychoanalysis is, how can he proceed to this act. Because he knows what is involved about what, at the end of the operation and with his very in-self (en-soi) he the analyst is going to represent the evacuation of the o-object. From this incitement to knowledge that ought to lead to the truth and that represents the gap in it, he falls by becoming himself the rejected fiction.

(285) I put forward here the word fiction. As you know, I have for a long time articulated that the truth has the structure of fiction. Is the o-object to be taken as simply marking this subject of the truth as division, or ought we as it seems give it more substance? Do you not sense there where we find ourselves at this crucial point, the one already properly marked in Aristotle's logic and that justifies the ambiguity of substance and subject. Of hupokeimenon in as much as it is logically nothing else properly speaking than what mathematical logic was afterwards able to isolate in the function of the variable, namely, what can only be designated by a predicative proposition. The ambiguity is maintained right through Aristotle's text not without there being distinguished like a tress the function perfectly isolated by him of hupokeimenon and that of ousia. Honestly, it would be much better to translate it by being or by "étance", by Heideger's Wesen on this occasion, than by this word that only conveys this aforesaid ambiguity of substantia, substance. It is indeed there that we find ourselves brought when we try to articulate what is involved in the function of the o-object.

It is around the enigma, the questioning that remains here about an act that cannot be initiated for the very one that inaugurates it except by a veiling of what would be for it, I mean the one that inaugurates this act and specifically the psychoanalyst, its term. And not simply its term but properly speaking its end, in as much as it is the term that determines retroactively the sense of the whole process, is properly its final cause, which does not deserve any derision because everything that belongs to the field of structure is unthinkable without a final cause. The only thing that deserves derision in terms described as finalistic, is that the end is of the slightest use.

Does the analyst know or not what he is doing in the psychoanalytic act? This is the precise term where there came to a halt in the previous year suspended by the eventful encounter with which I introduced my remarks today. As I told you, this was what dispensed me, at the horizon of such a difficult knot, so rigorously questioned by a putting in question of what is involved in the psychoanalytic act, dispensed me from the undoubtedly embarrassing resonances around which, nevertheless, can be questioned what is involved both in the theory and in the psychoanalytic institution.

Before indicating perhaps a little more about it, let us clearly recall what results from this way of posing between knowledge and truth and in the proper field of a production as regards which in short you see, it is the psychoanalyst as such that himself incarnates it. It is in terms of this production, it is in these terms that there ought to be situated the question, for example, of what is involved in transference. What need is there for everything that we designate as transference to be (286) interpreted in analysis in terms of repetition, except by those analysts who are absolutely astray in this network as I articulated it. What need is there to put in question what is objective in it and to claim that transference is a retreat before something or other that is supposed to be what is really operating in analysis. Since it is a situation that only takes its support from the structure, nothing can be stated within as discourse of the analyst that is not of the order of what the structure commands, and which then can grasp nothing except the order of repetition. The question is not of knowing here whether repetition is a dominant category or not in the story. It is that in a situation designed to question what is involved in what presents itself starting from the structure, nothing of the story is organised except from repetition. It is a matter, I repeat, of what can be said at the level of this putting to the test of the effects of knowledge. So that it is not correct to say that transference isolates in itself the effects of repetition. Transference is defined from the relationship to the subject supposed to know in so far as it is structural and linked to the locus of the Other, as the locus as such where knowledge is articulated in an illusory way as One. And that by questioning in this way the functioning of whoever seeks to know, it is necessary for everything that is articulated to be articulated in terms of repetition.

To whom are we indebted for such an experience? It is clear that it would never have been established if there were not the neurotic who needs to know the truth. Only those that the truth makes uncomfortable. That is the definition of the neurotic. This we are going to have to circumscribe more closely. And there again, before leaving this field, and with good reason, where I have not looped the loop, I want, in something that with respect to what I outlined may pass for a parenthesis, to highlight all the same a final one of these reference points with which I try to punctuate in a correct way this field in so far as we operate in it. If this is how it is, as I have reminded you, in a way accepted as partial, we ought to admit that the only thing that can be interpreted in analysis is repetition, and this is taken to be transference.

On the other hand, it is important to punctuate that this end that I designate as the capture of the analyst, of the analyst in himself in drilling for o, is precisely what constitutes the uninterpretable. That in a word, in analysis, the uninterpretable, is the presence of the analyst, and that is why to interpret him as has been seen, as has even been printed, is properly to open the door to what is called this place, namely, acting out. I recalled it in my seminar on the act, that then of last year and in connection with the myth of Oedipus. Namely, the distinction to be made between the heroic staging that serves as a mythical reference for our analytic practice, and what is articulated behind it, in terms of a knot of enjoyment at the origin of all knowledge. It is the psychoanalyst who is at the place, certainly, of (287) what was played out on the tragic stage and it is this that gives its sense to the psychoanalytic act. And on the other hand, it is striking that he renounces there, that all he does is to be at the place of the actor, in so far as one actor is enough just by himself to hold the stage of tragedy. This division between the spectator and chorus in which there is modelled and is modulated the division of the subject in the traditional play, I recalled it last year, to designate what is involved exactly in the place of the analyst. Another paradox of the psychoanalytic act, this actor who is effaced, rejoining earlier what I said about him evacuating the o-object. If the passage à l'acte is in the rule of analysis what the person who enters into it is asked to avoid, it is precisely to privilege this place of acting out that the analyst just by himself takes and keeps charge of. To keep quiet, to see nothing, to hear nothing, who does not remember that these are the terms in which a wisdom that is not ours indicates the path to those who want the truth. Is there not something strange on condition that one recognises the sense of these commandments to see there an analogy in the position of the analyst? But with this singular fruit that gives it its context. Because he is isolated from it by keeping quiet, the voice that is the kernel of what, by being said, creates speech. By seeing nothing, which is very often only too well observed by the analyst, isolating the look that is the knot tightened on the sack of everything that is seen at least. And finally to hear nothing of these two demands into which desire has slipped, of these two demands that summon him, these two demands that block him from the function of the breast or indeed of excrement.

What reality is there to push him to fulfill this function? What desire, what satisfaction can the analyst encounter there? I do not intend to designate this right away even if before leaving you I should say something more about it. It is appropriate here to throw into relief the dimension of scapegoat, a theme cherished by Frazer. We know that its origin is properly speaking Semitic. The scapegoat, the one who takes on himself this o-object, the one who ensures that forever, the subject can be reprieved from it. The one that ensures that the fruit of a terminated analysis, I was able last year to designate as a truth of which the subject is henceforth incurable, precisely because one of the terms of it have been evacuated. How can it not be seen that it is from there that there is explained the singular position that, in the social world this community of psychoanalysts occupies, protected by an international association for the protection of scapegoats! The scapegoat escapes by forming a group, and better still by degrees. It is true that it is difficult to conceive of a society of scapegoats. So then you make sergeant majors out of some scapegoats. And from the scapegoats who are only waiting in the antechamber to become so. Curious!

This facile derision would have no other reason for existing if, in the text that I have just received of an upcoming congress that will have the cheek to be held at Rome, there were not already texts, I mean (288) already published exemplary ones. Because it is not because people do not know Lacan's discourse that they do not find themselves face to face with the difficulties that I have just articulated here, and particularly what is involved in transference. When people struggle to define what is non-transferential in the analytic situation, some statements have to be brought out that are the confession, properly speaking, of the fact that nothing is understood about it. Nothing is understood about it because people do not have the key. And they do not have the key because they do not go looking for it where I stated it! In the same way, they invent a term called the self, and I must say that it would be no harm for someone who has some curiosity to see how this can both be justified and be resolved in a discourse like the one that I have articulated today. If I have the time at our next meetings, I will say more about it then. Likewise the error and properly speaking

the ineptitude of what is put forward on the subject of what is involved in psychoanalytic treatment of psychosis, and the radical failure marked in it to situate precisely psychosis in a psychopathology that is of an analytic order, comes from the same source.

Undoubtedly, if I indicated that I could have articulated something different, something from which I declared I was happily dispensed, about the subject of the psychoanalytic act, it is in the horizon of what is involved in the masochist that this articulation should be posed. And assuredly, of course, not in order to confuse them, psychoanalytic and masochistic practice. But it would be instructive and, in a way opened up, already indicated by what we were able to say, by what is literally displayed in masochistic practice, namely, the conjunction of the perverse subject with the o-object properly speaking. In a certain way, one can say that as long as he wants it, the masochist is the true master. He is the master of the true game. He can fail at it, of course. There is even every chance that he will fail, because he needs nothing less than the big Other. When the Eternal Father is no longer there to fulfill this role, there is no longer anyone. And if you address yourself to a woman, Wanda of course, there is no chance. She will understand nothing about it the poor thing. But even though the masochist fails he enjoys it all the same. So that he can say that he is the master of the real game. It is quite obvious that we do not dream for an instant of imputing such success to the psychoanalyst. That would be to trust him about the search for his enjoyment and we are far from according this to him. Besides it would be very inappropriate.

To put forward a formula that has its interest because I will have to take it up again and you must not be surprised, in connection with the obsessional, we will say that the psychoanalyst plays/makes the master

(fait le maitre) in the two senses of the word faire. Pay a little bit of attention for just five minutes more because it is very much of a short circuit and it is delicate. You sense well that the question about the psychoanalytic act, is, as I told you earlier, that of the decisive act that (289) from the psychoanalysand makes there arise, be inaugurated, be established the psychoanalyst. If, as I indicated to you earlier the psychoanalyst is confused with the production of the doing, of the work of the psychoanalysand, it is here that one can really say that the psychoanalysand makes (fait), in the strong sense of the term, the psychoanalyst. But one can also say that at the precise moment the aforesaid psychoanalyst emerges, if it is so hard to grasp what can push him into this, it is indeed because the act is reduced to playing, in the sense of a pretence, to playing the psychoanalyst, to playing the one that guarantees the subject supposed to know. And who, at the start of his career, has not confided to whoever wants to aid him in his first steps that he has precisely this feeling of pretending to be a psychoanalyst (de faire le psychoanalyste)? Why remove its value from this testimony?

But this is what allows, by taking up these two functions of the word faire, to say that it is quite true that in leading someone to the term of his psychoanalysis, to the term of this incurable truth, to the point of the one who knows that if there is indeed an act, there is no sexual relationship, is it not here, even if this does not happen too often, to ensure somewhere a true mastery? But on the other hand, contrary to the masochist, if the psychoanalyst for his part also can be said to have some relationship to the operation, it is certainly not because he is the master of it. But that all the same, he supports, he incarnates the trump card, in so far as he is the one who brings into play the whole weight of what is involved in the o-object.

What then, after having only pushed this discourse this far today, what about the point where this discourse itself can be situated, namely from where I state it? Is it from where the subject supposed to know keeps himself? Can I play the scholar in speaking about the psychoanalytic act? Certainly not. Nothing is closed off about what I am opening up as a question concerning what is involved in this act. That I am the logician of it, and in a way that is confirmed by the fact that this logic makes me odious to everyone, why not? This logic is articulated from the very co-ordinates of its practice and from the points where it takes its motivation. Knowledge in so far as it is produced by the truth - is this not what a certain version of the relationships between knowledge and enjoyment imagine?

For the neurotic, knowledge is the enjoyment of the subject supposed to know. This indeed is why the neurotic is incapable of sublimation. Sublimation for its part is the proper of what makes the circuit of what the subject supposed to know is reduced to. Every artistic creation is situated in this circumscribing of what remains irreducible in this knowledge qua distinguished from enjoyment. Something nevertheless comes to mark its enterprise, in so far as never in the subject does it designate what is its inaptitude for its full realisation.

Does not this imputation that the work of the exploited person is supposed in the enjoyment of the exploiter find something like its analogue at the entrance of knowledge? In the fact that the means that (290) it constitutes will make those that possess these means profit from those who win this knowledge by the sweat of their truth. No doubt the analogy would miss the point by operating in such distinct domains, if for some time, knowledge had not shown itself so

complicit with a certain mode of exploitation. Under the name of capitalist, as it happens, the excess of exploitation is something that is not liked. I am saying is not liked because there is nothing more to be said. The principle of revolutionary agitation is nothing other than that there is a point where things are not liked. Now, if you remember, did I not mark last year that the position of the analyst, if it ought to remain in conformity in all rigour to his act, was that, in the field of what he inaugurates with the help of this act as doing, there is no place for there to be something that he does not like, nor that he likes either. And that if he makes room for this, he leaves it.

But this is not to say for all that that he will not have his word to say about what can divert, limit those who, in a certain field which is the field of knowledge, have got to the point of rebelling about a certain going astray of knowledge, about the correct way, that favours knowledge emerging once again from a field where it exploits. It is on this last word that I am leaving you, promising you for the next time to enter into the detail of what is at stake concerning the respective positions of the hysteric and the obsessional with regard to the big Other.

(307) I would be in an even more excellent mood if I didn't feel like yawning as you have just seen me do, because of the fact that I had, I do not know why, by pure chance, a short night. My excellent mood is founded on these things that you have between two doors and that is called a hope. On this occasion, that it is possible, if things turn out in a certain way, that I may be liberated from this weekly sublimation that consists in my relations with you. "You do not see me from where I look at you", I stated in the course of one of these seminars of the previous years, to characterise what is involved in a type of o-object in so far as it is grounded in the look, that it is nothing other than the look. "You owe me nothing from where I devour you, tu ne me dois rien d'ou je te devore". Such is the message that I might well receive from you in the form that I defined in its inverted form in so far as it is itself mine. And I would no longer have to make the return journey here every week around an o-object which is properly what I am designating thus by a formula that as you sense – duty (devoir), devouring (dévoration) – is inscribed in what is properly called an oral drive. It would be better to refer it to what it is, the placentary thing onto which I stick myself as I am able. This great body that you constitute, to constitute from my substance something that might be for you the object of a satisfaction. "Oh! My mother Intelligence" as someone or other has said.

Today then, I am only going to half keep my word about what I told you the last time. Because it is only in the form of a riddle that I am rapidly questioning you about what may take shape in your minds about something which explains why, from next year, I will no longer have at my disposition this place where you do me the honour of crowding in, because of what I produce here. I was made an assistant lecturer by a rather noble school, the one described as Hautes Etudes. I was offered shelter by this School in this School here, Normale Supérieure, a protected place, that is distinguished by all sorts of privileges within the university. It was an eminent philosopher, whom I am designating, I think, sufficiently in these terms – an eminent philosopher, there are not a lot of them – who teaches here, who became my intercessor with the administration here so that I could occupy this room. Is it this very occupation that serves as a reason for my no longer disposing of it? I do not think that I am occupying it at a time that anyone else might envy. Is it because my presence here (308) generates a sort of confusion in that my teaching is authorised by the Ecole Normale Supérieure, that I have just characterised here by the eminence it benefits from being in the university or more exactly excluded from it in a certain way. It should be remarked here that I have never authorised myself here by anything except the field whose structure I am trying to maintain in its authenticity. And that in truth I never authorised myself by anything else, and very especially not from the fact that these statements are produced in the Ecole Normale. Perhaps having me as a neighbour induced a certain movement in the Ecole Normale, a short, limited one moreover, that in no case seems to be able to be inscribed as a deficit. The Cahiers pour l'analyse that have appeared, in a way induced by the field of my teaching, cannot be seen as a deficit, even if one can say that it was not at all by me that the work was done.

So then, many reasons here for there to be no urgency to distinguish me from the Ecole Normale. Certainly there was somewhere, in a single place, a confusion made in this respect. Namely, a person I told you about on 8th January last. In an article that I must say is rather comical, that appeared in a journal that protected him very well, the Nouvelle Revue Française, someone brought up something or other that was called an extract, indeed an exercise of my style. And in this connection I was qualified, entitled by what was called my quality of professor, that I certainly am not, and still less at the Ecole Normale.

If it is because of this confusion in an article that moreover was marked by many other confusions, I mean that articulated my teaching in function of something or other that made of it a commentary on de Saussure, which it never was. I took de Saussure as one takes an instrument, a system, to be used for quite different ends, those of the field that I designated earlier. In this connection something or other was stated which is supposed to be articulated from nothing other than from the fact that I am supposed to have read him, as they say, diagonally. This simply shows in the person who wrote this article a surprising ignorance of the uses that this word diagonal can have. Because it is quite clear that I did not read de Saussure diagonally in the sense that I read the articles in Le Monde diagonally. They are made for that, de Saussure's course is certainly not. On the other hand the method described as diagonal is well known for its fruitfulness in mathematics, namely, by revealing that from any series (sériation) that claims to be exhaustive one can, by the diagonal method, extract some other entity that it does not include in its series. In this sense, I would be happy to accept that I made a diagonal use of de Saussure. But that from this, namely, from something that comes from an uncritical attitude that one might benevolently account for by an oversight that goes completely beyond this lack of criticism, to find in it material to (309) consider that some third person might see in it the justification for taking precautions, while it would simply be enough to point out that this oversight is nothing but that, and this on the part of someone who gave sufficient proofs of it in the rest of his text, there is obviously something or other rather curious. It suggests that when all is said and done the discussion about knowledge is excluded from the university. Because one can accept that someone who obviously is mistaken on one point may be able on another one to advance an incorrect qualification. This of itself justifies that it should be corrected by a measure other than pointing out to the person that there could be no confusion. This indeed is the conclusion that I am indicating now and that deserves to be drawn from it.

I will leave things there then, leaving you in suspense about whether any more can be said about it today. I am giving you explicitly a rendezvous then, the next time. This will be my next seminar when, accepting that it is in any case the last for this year, I believe I will be able in any case to promise you that I will distribute a certain number of little papers that I have in this briefcase, already prepared for you. In the case that this accent of finality is subsequently reinforced, this will mark at least something that will of course not be a diploma but a little sign that will remain to you of your presence here this year.

At this point, I am taking up again what I stated then the last time. Namely, what is pointed up by what I meant to articulate this year about the terms From an Other to the other, to which I was able the last time to give a certain structural form. I recall in short that what is involved is the following. That anything that allows itself to be caught up in the function of the signifier can nevermore be 2 without there being hollowed out in the locus described as that of the Other this something to which I gave the last time the status of empty set. This to indicate the way in which, at the present point of logic, there can be written what, on this occasion and without excluding that this can be written differently, what, I say, changes the relief of the real.

I am writing again the 1, this circle that we first used to write the Other. And in this circle, taken here to function as a set, two members, the 1, and then something that, if it is still the Other, is to be taken here under the heading of set. A set in which for reasons linked to mathematical usage it would be wrong to put a zero to designate the empty set. It is therefore more correct to represent it according to the classical style of set theory as follows, namely, to mark it with this oblique bar that you know moreover I make use of. Anything that allows itself to be taken up into the function of the signifier can no longer be 2 without there being hollowed out, and in a way that organises the field of this dual relation, in such a way that nothing can (316) any longer happen in it without being obliged to turn around this thing here at the extreme right that I called an empty set. That is properly – this for those that have put in the time to understand it – what, in my Ecrits as well as in my propositions, I always designated as the additional one (un-en-plus). This then means, indicates, that in the measure that my discourse, as I might say, advanced, if I had to introduce into the function and into the field of speech and language what was involved in the function of the unconscious by having recourse to this fragile and oh so problematic term of intersubjectivity,

to put the accent more and more on what, of course, is required by Freud's second topography, namely, that nothing functions or is regulated there except intra-subjective correlates. Here comes the decisive accent put on this function of the additional one as exterior to the subjective.

Let us consider the drawing in which already the last time I made operate what I wanted to articulate for you about these remarks that I am taking up again today. Who does not see, I said, how by implicating a subject in the formula that a signifier represents it for another signifier, from an Other is already inscribed in this formula. This signifier for which the subject is represented is properly this an Other that is at stake in my title. This an Other that here you see inscribed because it is the resource for which what has to function as a subject is represented, in this field of the Other. This one in the Other as such cannot work without involving the additional one. That is why it is only at the moment that these three basic signifiers are inscribed, in so far as of themselves they already carry an effect of signifier and that it is sufficient to have to be inscribed in this way, as you see in a way that is not self-evident, that demanded months and years of explanation for those very people whose practice could not be sustained for a moment without being referred to this structure, I mean psychoanalysts. Just by themselves, these three terms inscribed under this mode of inscription, these three terms indeed constitute, in terms of what they already imply, before there is a question of making the apparition of the subject arise from it, a structure. Already, by their articulation, they constitute a knowledge.

This an Other here inscribed by 1 on the left of the circle, shows itself for what it is, namely, one in the Other, the one for whom the subject is found to represent itself from the One. What does that mean? Where does this 1 come from, this 1 for whom the subject is going to be represented by the 1? It is clear that it comes from the same place as this 1 that represents, that this is the first phase from which the Other is constituted. And if the last time I compared this locus of the Other to a Trojan Horse that functions in the opposite sense, namely, that each (311) time swallows a new unit into its belly instead of allowing them to be disgorged into the nocturnal city, it is because in effect this entry of the first 1 is foundational. Foundational in something that is very simple, namely, that it is the minimum necessary for this to be. The Other cannot in any way contain itself except in the state of subset.

Let us clearly understand one another. Can one say that here this Other contains itself, if I furnish this empty set with something that repeats these members, first a 1, and the empty set? It is not true that one can say that this means it contains itself. Because this set transformed in this way, is inscribed from members that we have just mentioned. And the totality of these members is not what is reproduced here from the couple first inscribed as that of the first set E_1, namely, the member 1, then the empty set, the empty set where now there is reproduced the member 1, the empty set. There is therefore no question of the set of all the sets that might not contain themselves, for the simple reason that at the level of the set, there are never sets that contain themselves. To talk about the set of all the sets that do not contain themselves does not constitute a set. But it is clear that the question of whether the set can, yes or no, contain itself is only posed, can only be posed by having absorbed this an Other, so that by its inclusion there appears as the additional one the empty set, for the reason that grounds the empty set as not being able to be in any case 2. There is no empty set that contains an empty set. There are not two empty sets.

The inclusion then of the first 1 is what makes it necessary that in the field of the Other, the most simple formula for 2 to be inscribed is the 1, member, and the empty set, inasmuch as it is nothing else but what is produced in a set with one member, by distinguishing the subsets from it. The 1 just by itself sufficed for a long time. This allowed it to be said that the Other, was the 1, a confusion in that the structure of the set was not recognised. Even in the set with one member posited as such, there emerges as a subset this additional one that the empty set is. In other words the Other needs an other to become additional one, namely, what it is itself. What is produced then from the one to the other, in so far as it is a second, is another signifier, And in the Other, it is properly this that ensures that it is only at the level of the second 1, of S_2 if you want to write it in this way, that the subject comes to be represented. The intervention of the first 1, of S_1 as representation of the subject only implies the apparition of the subject as such at the level of S_2, of the second 1. And from then on, as I pointed out the other day, namely, that the additional one, the empty set, is S(O) namely the signifier of the Other, the inaugural O.

What this shows us, is that there is going, in the structure thus defined, that the relationship of the 1 inscribed in the first circle of the Other, to this second circle of the additional one, which can itself contain the 1 + the additional one which is distinguished from this relationship to this 1, and only by this not being the same empty set, but can repeat the same structure indefinitely. This same indefinitely repeated structure of the 1, circle 1, circle 1 and so on, this is what defines the Other. Namely, this is the very thing that constitutes the agency of the o-object as such. It is indispensable that there is at least one member reduced to the member 1 in the Other. This is what made the Other be taken for 1 for a long time. As I told you, there is a psychical structure that restores, as I might say, the apparent integrity of O, that grounds in an effective relation the S(O) as not marked by what the bar on the top left of our graph designates, S(Ø). This is nothing other than the identification of this indefinitely repeated structure that the o-object designates. In truth, I would employ the following metaphor to designate as a perverse structure the apparent restoration of the integrity of the Other in so far as it is the o-object, that is in a way the imaginary moulding of the signifying structure.

We are going to see later in effect what fills the place of this O, in the operation of psychic identification. In a word, let us see it right away. Let us spell out the texts, taking the first case to be presented under the figure of the hysteric, to Freud. We are going to see how he, who gives to this economy its first explanation, goes along with her. How in connection with Anna O, he does not question himself about what is involved in the relationship between these narratives, this talking cure, as she herself puts it, inventing the term, and this symptom that is particularly clearly designated in the case of the hysteric. Something at the level of the body that is emptied out, a field where sensitivity disappears. An other connected or not whose motor activity becomes absent without anything other than a signifying unit being able to account for it. The anti-anatomical nature of the hysterical symptom was sufficiently highlighted by Freud himself. Namely, if a hysterical arm is paralysed, it is because it is called arm (bras) and nothing else. Because nothing in any real distribution of impulses whatsoever accounts for the limit that designates its field. It is indeed the body here that comes to serve as a support in an original symptom, the most typical in that, because it is at the origin of analytic experience itself, we question it.

Where then is, with respect to the progress operated by the talking cure, la cure parlante, how not remain as close as possible to the text. And even without knowing any more about it – which is not the case because we know a lot more, I mean that it is necessary to organise this structure differently – how can we not see that Freud here is at the place of the 1, here placed as inside. It is in Freud that there is established a certain subject. Without the listener, Freud, the question (313) is to know how he could subject himself to this function for one year, two years, to listen every evening, at the moment that a dissociated state marked the cutting, the cut by which Dora, by which a symptomatic Anna was separated from her own subject. How can we not question ourselves about the hidden relationship that ensured that simply by taking things as they were presented, that it is from the fact that a subject comes to know something that is a feature (trait), if you remember this observation, a feature moreover followed like a historical reprise, not lost in the darkness of some forgetting or other, simply cut off just the previous year. And that, in the measure that with this delay which just by itself ought to have a sense for us, means that when Freud was informed about it, the symptom whose relationship is only a distant one, is only forced with respect to what is articulated in it, the symptom is removed.

This foundation of a subject creates knowledge in a field which is that of the Other, and its relationship with this something creates a hollow at the level of the body. Such is the first outline that when we have elaborated it sufficiently after decades in order to be able from this structure in its unicity to make the collection, under the heading of what functions as the object described as o, which is this structure itself, we might say that with regard to this body emptied in order to function as a signifier, there is something that can be moulded there and this metaphor will help us to conceive as a statue properly speaking what, at the level of the pervert, comes to function as that which restores as plenitude, as O without a bar, this O. To appreciate the imaginary relation of what is involved in perversion, it is enough to grasp the statue of which I speak at the level of a baroque contortion whose representation of an incitement to voyeurism is only tangible in so far that it represents a phallic exhibition. How can we not see that used by a religion concerned with re-establishing its empire over souls at the moment that it is contested, the baroque statue, whatever it may be, whatever male or female saint it represents, indeed the Virgin Mary, is properly this look that is designed so that the soul may open up before it. If the rapprochement I made between a single feature of the perverse structure and some capture or other of the faith that must indeed be called idolatrous, puts us at the heart of what is presentified in our West by a quarrel over images, it is something exemplary that we have to draw profit from.

I said that I would tackle today what is involved in neurosis. And, as you heard, I began at the level of the obsessional, by articulating that nothing of the obsessional can be conceived of except by referring to a structure in which, for the master, in so far as he functions as 1, a signifier that only subsists by being represented for a second 1 that is in the Other, in so far as this represents the slave in whom alone resides the subjective function of the master. Between one and the other there is nothing in common except what I said had first been (314) articulated by Hegel as the bringing into play at the level of the master, of his own life. The act of mastery consists in this, the risk of life. Somewhere in this little book that has come out under the heading of the first number of Scilicet, I highlighted in the miraculous remarks of a child, what I gathered from the mouth of his father, because he had told him that he was "a trickster of life, tricheur de vie". An extraordinary formula, like those that undoubtedly one can only see flowering in the mouths of those for whom no one has yet confused matters. The risk of life, this is the essential of what one can call the act of mastery. And its guarantor is none other than what is, in the Other, the slave as signifier by whom alone the master is supported as subject. His support being nothing other than the body of the slave in so far as it is, to use a formula that had good reason to come into the forefront of spiritual life, perinde ac cadaver. But it is such only in the field by which the master is supported as subject. Something remains outside the limits of this whole apparatus, which is precisely what Hegel wrongly brought into it, death. Death, as has been sufficiently noted, is only profiled here in that it does not contest the whole of the structure except at the level of the slave. In the whole of the phenomenology of the master and the slave, only the slave is real. And this indeed is what Hegel glimpsed and it would be enough to ensure that nothing goes any further in this dialectic. This situation is perfectly stable. If the slave dies there is no longer anything. If the master dies everyone knows that the slave is still a slave. As long as we have known about slaves, the death of the master never freed anyone from slavery.

Such is, I would ask you to note, the situation when it is the neurotic that introduces the dialectic. Because it is only from the moment that we presuppose somewhere the subject supposed to know that in effect, with this horizon and with good reason, just like the rabbit in the hat, it is put in at the start, we can see there progressing then in a dialectic what is stated about the relationships of the master and the slave. And where? At the level of the slave himself towards an absolute

knowledge. The subject, it is in so far as the master is represented at the level of the slave that the whole dialectic is pursued and culminates at this end which is nothing other than what is already put there under the function of knowledge. This function precisely in so far as it is not criticised, that nowhere is there questioned the order of underpinning of the subject in knowledge. This thing which nevertheless leaps to the eye, which is that the master himself knows nothing. Everyone knows that the master is a fool (un con). He would never have entered into this whole adventure, with what the future designates for him as a resolution of his function, if for an instant there existed the subject that, in his facile way of talking, Hegel imputes to him. As if this function of the fight to the death, of the fight for pure prestige, could be set up, in so far as it also makes him substantially depend on his partner, if the (315) master were not something other than what we properly call the unconscious, namely, unknown to the subject as such. I mean this unknown from which the subject is absent, the subject of which is only represented elsewhere.

All of this is only done to introduce the next step of what I have to articulate today. Previously, I spoke in connection with the hysteric about the analogue she took on from her reference to the woman. Just as I said that nothing that is articulated about the obsessional constitutes him except to introduce into the dialectic of the subject-master, what necessitates something that calls him, namely, the truth of this process. And, on the path of this truth, the taking up, the bringing into play of the subject supposed to know.

I am taking this up at the level of the other neurosis, of the hysteric. And to put at the heart of it the analogous apparatus, the model that is at stake, to which the obsessional refers himself, I already said, the

hysteric, just as one can say that the obsessional does not take himself to be the master but supposes that the master knows what he wants, in the same way, the hysteric for the woman – not that the hysteric is for all that obligatorily a woman any more than the obsessional is obligatorily a man, it is a matter of the reference to the model of the master – in the same way, the hysteric, her model, is what I am now going to state in that what is involved in the model in which the woman establishes this thing that is much more central, as you are going to see, in our analytic experience.

When I put it forward, sometime around the 21st May, someone here posed me the question: but do we know what the woman is? Naturally, no more than we know what the master is. But what one can outline, is the articulation in the field of the Other of what is involved in the woman. It is just as stupid as the master, make no mistake. I am not for the moment talking about women, I am speaking about the subject "the woman". Do we not see what is involved in these two 1's when we are dealing with the woman? The inner 1, S_2, make no mistake, what it is a matter of seeing being erected does not appear doubtful to me and it then becomes very clear. It is to know why the 1 by which the woman subject is supported is so ordinarily the Phallus with a capital P. It is at the level of the 1 that it is a matter of bringing up that the identification of the woman in the dual mirage in so far as this Other is at its horizon, the empty set, namely a body, a body here emptied of what? Of enjoyment. Where the master-subject takes on the risk of life, in the inaugural wager of this dialectic, the woman – I did not say the hysteric, I said the woman because the hysteric, as the obsessional earlier does, is only explained by reason of these references – risks, wagers this enjoyment which everyone knows is for the woman inaugural and existing, and is such that without any of these efforts, of these detours that characterise autoerotism in the man, not only does she obtain but she always subsists distinct from and parallel to the one that she takes from being the wife of a man, the one (316) who is satisfied by the enjoyment of the man.

This enjoyment of the man that the woman takes, captures for herself as the master does to the slave, this is the stake of the game and gives its radical origin to what is involved in what here plays the same role as death for the obsessional and is just as inaccessible. Namely, that to say the woman identifies to it – I said the woman – is just as false, is just as vain as to say that the master identifies to death. On the contrary, just as the slave is bound and in the same way, I mean only subsists through the relation to death and with this relation makes the whole system subsist, the relationship of man to castration is also what here makes the whole system hold together. And moreover, if I earlier spoke of perinde ac cadaver, I would evoke here something rather remarkable that for the being caught up in the field of the signifier, the dimension called necrophilia exists, in other words erotism and very properly applied to a dead body. Do I need to evoke here on the horizon the figure Jeanne la Folle and her trailing about for a fortnight the body of Philippe le Beau?

It is only with respect to these structures, to these inaugurating functions in so far as they alone correspond to the introduction of what is properly the dependency on the signifier as analytic experience allows us to articulate it, that we can here see, just as for the obsessional, the hysteric is introduced as not taking herself for a woman. How does she not take herself for a woman? Precisely in the fact that she supposes that, in this structure, that I have just articulated as being that of the woman subject, this subject, at the level of the starting S_1, she makes into something supposed to know. In other words she is captivated, interested – remember Dora – by the woman in so far as she believes that the woman is the one that knows what is necessary for man's enjoyment. Now, what results from this something that is absent in the model, the function of the woman-subject, God be praised, make no mistake, does not know that what she is sustaining culminates in the castration of the man.

But, on the contrary, the hysteric is not unaware of anything about it and that is why she questions herself beyond what I already articulated about Dora, centred on a first approach that I made to transference. Beyond. Re-read the observation, and moreover do not omit everything that in the prior observations, those of Studies in hysteria, allows simply the following to be seen. The correlation between the fact that, for the hysteric, the woman supposes her knowledge of what is in the model, she does it unconsciously. That is why the two models not being able to be distinguished by this factor that is introduced that reunites under the heading of neurosis one type just as much as the other, you can note that the correlate of death is at stake in what the hysteric tackles about what is involved in being a woman.

The hysteric plays the man (fait l'homme) who supposes that the (317) woman knows. That indeed is why she is introduced into this game from some angle where the death of the man is always involved. Is there any need to say that the whole introduction of Anna O to the field of her hysteria does nothing other than turn around the death of her father? Is it necessary to recall the correlate, in the two dreams of Dora, of death in so far as it is implicated by the mother's jewel box. "I do not want, says the father, my children and me to perish in flames

because of this box" and in the second dream that it is a matter of the burial of the father. Hidden truths, neuroses suppose them known. They must be disentangled from this supposition so that they, the neurotics, stop representing this truth in the flesh.

It is in as far as the hysteric, as one might say, is already a psychoanalysand, namely, already on the path of a solution, of a solution she seeks starting from the fact that in what she refers herself to she implies the subject supposed to know, and that is why she encounters contradiction. The fact is, as long as the analyst does not practice the cut between the unconscious structure, namely, the models that I properly articulated here of the 1, 1, the empty set, as much at the level of the master as at the level of the woman, namely, from what has made the neurotic naturally a psychoanalysand because here and now constituting in herself, and before any analysis, the transference. The coalescence of the structure with the subject supposed to know, this is what is testified in the neurotic by the fact that she questions the truth of these structures and becomes herself in the flesh this questioning. And that if something can make drop the fact that she is herself symptom, namely, precisely by this operation of the analyst practicing the cut thanks to which this supposition of the subject supposed to know is detached, is separated from what is at stake. Namely, the structure that she correctly locates, except for the fact that neither the master, nor the woman can be supposed to know what they are doing.

The operation of analytic treatment turns around this cut which is a subjective cut, because undoubtedly everything that we say about an unconscious desire, always, of course, supposes that a subject ends up

by knowing what he wants. And what does that mean? Do we not here again still preserve, in stating such formulae, this something that means that there is knowledge and what one wants. Assuredly there is a locus where the two terms are distinguished. It is when it is a matter of saying yes or of saying no to what I called, what one wants. This is what is called the will. But to know what he wants, is for the master, as for the woman, desire itself, just as earlier I unified the three words of an additional one (un-en-plus), the knowing-what-he-wants that I mean here, is desire itself. What the hysteric supposes, is that the woman knows what she wants, in the sense that she is supposed to desire it, and this indeed is why the hysteric does not manage to (318) identify herself to the woman except at the price of an unsatisfied desire. In the same way, with respect to the master, whom he makes use of in the game of hide and seek to claim that death can only touch the slave, the obsessional is the one who, from the master, only identifies this thing which is the real, that his desire is impossible.

(319) Try not to lose the thread about what you are as effect of knowledge. You are split apart in the phantasy ($ ◊ o). You are, however strange this may appear, the cause of yourself. Only there is no self. Rather there is a divided self. Entering onto this path is where the only true political revolution may flow from. Knowledge serves the master. I am coming back today to underline that knowledge is born from the slave. If you remember the formulae that I aligned the last time, you will understand that, in parallel, I state: knowledge serves the woman, because it makes her the cause of desire. Here is what I indicated to you the last time, in a commentary on the schema that I am writing out again. I think I should take it up again, even for those who may be occupied elsewhere by concerns that appear more important to them.

Here is this schema. This schema emerges from the logical definition that I gave at our second last meeting of the Other as empty set and of its indispensable absorption of a unary trait, the one on the right, in order that the subject may be able to be represented there for this unary trait, under the species of a signifier. Where does this signifier that represents the subject for another signifier come from? From nowhere, because it only appears at that this place in virtue of the retro-efficacy of repetition. It is because the unary trait aims at the repetition of an enjoyment that another unary trait arises subsequently, nachträglich as Freud puts it. This term I was the first to extract from his text and to highlight as such. Whoever amuses himself in translating a certain "Vocabulaire", will be able to see that at this rubric of aprés-coup, which would not even exist without my discourse, I am not even mentioned. The unary trait arises in a deferred way, in the place therefore of S_1, of the signifier, in so far as it represents a subject for another signifier. On this I say: everything that is going to arise from this repetition that is repeated by the introduction of the in-form of o, here the sign of the empty set, is first of all this in-form itself, and this is the o-object.

At this people get alarmed: I am told: "So then, you are giving a purely formal definition of the o-object." No, because all of this is only produced from the fact that at the place of the 1 on the left, of S_1, there is what there is, namely, this enigmatic enjoyment attested to by the fact that we know nothing about it except the following, that I am going to reproduce at every stage where it is distinguished, nothing is (320) known about it except the fact that it wants another enjoyment. This is true everywhere. 4, 2, 3, the little fable to which is given the ridiculous answer that you know; at the answer, to have another one. In this Oedipus, the hysteric who has answered, answered in so far as the truth about the woman must indeed have been said for the Sphinx to have disappeared because of it. That is why, in conformity with the destiny of the hysteric, he subsequently played the man.

The hysteric, I will tell you...because there is going to be some little time before we meet again, the hysteric fills me with joy. She

reassures me more than she did Freud, who was not able to understand that the enjoyment of the woman was perfectly sufficient in itself. She erects this mythical woman called the Sphinx. She articulates that the original game is that she must have something else, namely, enjoy the man, who for her is only the erect penis by means of which she knows herself as other, namely as phallus, of which she is deprived, in other words as castrated. Here is the truth that allows some lures to be dissipated and remind you that this is the year that I posited the o as surplus enjoying, in other words the stake that constitutes the wager in order to gain the other enjoyment.

That is why the last time I wrote the dialectic of the master and the slave differently by clearly marking that the slave is the ideal of the master. That he is also the signifier to whom the master-subject is represented by another signifier since what is at stake is the third term of data representations other than formal. Here it is in the form of the stake which here is o. In this dialectic, as a philosopher named Hegel glimpsed, the stake is indeed what can hold up in a signifying in-form as 1, a life. It is true that you only have one. Equally, it is an idiotic formulation because you cannot formulate that you only have one on the principle that you might have others, which is manifestly outside the game. A life, this indeed is what Hegel said, but he was wrong about which one. The stake is not the life of the master, it is that of the slave. His other enjoyment is that of the life of the slave. Here is what this formula of the fight to death envelopes, so completely closed, what one finds in the box. The fight to the death is a signifier, that is what it is.

It is all the surer in that it is very probably nothing other than the signifier itself. Everyone knows that death is outside the game. We do not know what it is, but the verdict of death, is the master as subject, a signifying verdict; perhaps the only true one. What he lives from, is a life, but not his own, the life of the slave. That is why any time the wager on life is at stake, it is the master who speaks. Pascal is a master and, as everyone knows, a pioneer of capitalism. For reference: the calculating machine, and then the bus. You have heard tell of that in some corner or other, I am not going to give you a bibliography.

This has a dramatic air; up to a certain point it has become such. At (321) the beginning it was not so, for the reason that the first master knows nothing about what is doing. And the master-subject is the unconscious. In ancient comedy, whose value as an indicator could not be exaggerated for us, it is the slave that brings to the master or to the son of the master – it is better again than the Son of Man, that imbecile – who brings him news of what is being said in the town, for example, from which he has come post-haste. He also tells him what to say, the passwords. The slave of antiquity, read Plautus better again than Terence, is a jurist, he is also a PR man. The slave was not a latecomer in antiquity. Do I need to pinpoint in passing two or three little notes that will perhaps be heard by an ear or two here, namely, that of course there are masters who have tried out knowledge, but after all why should the whole knowledge of Plato not be an unconscious philosophy? It is perhaps for that reason that it is of such profit to us. With Aristotle we pass onto a different plane. He serves a master, Alexander, who for his part undoubtedly absolutely did not know what he was doing. All the same he did it very well. Since Aristotle was at his service, he produced after all the best natural history there has ever been, and he began logic, which must mean something.

Along what path then did the master come to know what he was doing? In accordance with the schema that I gave you earlier, along the hysterical path, by making of the slave the damned of the earth. He worked hard. He substituted for the slave surplus value, which was not something easy to find, but which is the awakening of the master to his own essence. Naturally, the master-subject could only articulate himself at the level of the signifier slave. Only this elevation of the master to knowledge permitted the realisation of more and more absolute masters than have ever been known from the beginnings of history.

To the slave, there remains class-consciousness. This means that he can just shut up. Everyone knows that I am telling the truth and that the problem of the relationships of class-consciousness to the Party are the relationships of the one to be educated to the educator. If something gives a sense to what is called Maoism, it is a taking up of these relationships between the slave and knowledge. But let us wait to see things more clearly. Up to now, the proletariat, like this philosophy of the master, the first one, had the gall to call it, had the right as you know, to abstention. You see that if people dare to say in these places of misinformation quite explicitly forged for this goal, that psychoanalysis only ignores class struggle it is not perhaps altogether certain, and it can perhaps restore its true sense to it.

You must not imagine that speaking out, as it is put, frees you in any way whatsoever, just because the master, for his part, speaks out and even a lot. But it is enough to take this phantasy at its place for the affair to be resolved; it is puerile. Do I need to say that this year I began my discourse on psychoanalysis by saying that psychoanalysis, (322) is a wordless discourse. Knowledge displaces things, not necessarily to the profit of the one for whom it claims to work. It claims moreover for, as I told you, knowledge is nothing like work. The only solution is to enter the defiles without losing the thread, it is to work at being the truth of knowledge.

If then, to take up at the two levels of the master and the slave what is involved in these three terms, I rewrite here S_1, S_2, o, sufficiently commented on I think, and I remind you, at the same time as I am completing it, of what I wrote the last time under another form, what concerns this relationship of the woman to her Other enjoyment, as I articulated it earlier. The woman who becomes cause of desire is the subject of whom it must be said – re-read the Bible a little bit – who would ever say (.....?....) about this story if he had not first been offered the apple, namely, the o-object. That is why, the signifier at the end, this Φ, the sign of what is assuredly lacking to the woman in the affair, and that is why he must furnish it.

It is amusing that after 70 years of psychoanalysis nothing yet has been formulated about what a man is. I am speaking about vir, the masculine sex. What is at stake here is not the human or other nonsense about anti-humanism and all this structuralist disorder, it is a matter of what a man is. He is active, Freud tells us. In effect, there is good reason for it. He even has to make an effort not to disappear into the hole. Anyway, thanks to analysis, he now knows that he is castrated; anyway he knows it at the end, that he always was so. Now he can learn it, a modification introduced by knowledge.

As you have seen, here there is something funny, it is this kind of non-adjustment; things have been detached from the 2, we have jumped from S_1 to o.

S_1	S_2	o

Why would this not be done 1 by 1, that first of all there would have been this S_2, o, then S_1. We ought to be able to find our bearings in what that means. I am going to say the word to you right away, especially since you should be prepared. Earlier, I showed you a passage from the master to the schoolmaster, then the S_2, wherever it is, is the mapping out of knowledge. So then it is perhaps this that is at stake in the middle line. The hysteric marks what has remained at the S_2 on top, in the first line. But in any case where the S_2 is in its place, namely knowledge, at a master's place, look, you should recognise the place of stating.

I spoke to you about the hommelle. Does not all of this converge towards her, the hommelle, the one who is at once the master and knowledge? She speaks, she utters. If you wanted to have an image of (323) her, you should go and see something, but go in at the right time, as I did. It is a detestable film called If, my word, God knows why. It is the English university displayed in its most seductive forms, the ones that conform to everything that, in effect, psychoanalysis was able to articulate about what is involved in a society of men, a society in the earlier sense, a society of homosexuals. There, as you will see, the hommelle is the rector's wife, she is a ravishing, really exemplary disgrace. But the lucky find, is the moment – I should say that it is the only stroke of genius that the author of this film had – of making her walk all alone and naked, and God knows if there are not some, among the pans of knowledge, in the kitchen, altogether sure that she is of being queen in her own house. While the whole little homosexual bordel is in the yard marching preparing for some military occasion. So then you are beginning perhaps to see what I mean. The hommelle, the alma mater, the university in other words, the place where because of having practised a certain number of intrigues around knowledge gives you a stable institution, under the crook of a spouse. There you have the true figure of the University. So then we could perhaps identify rather easily what represents the o here, the pupils, the little dears taken in charge, themselves the creation of the desires of their parents. So this is what they are asked to bring into play, the way in which they have escaped from the desires of their parents. And the bet is this S_1 that ought to be identified to this something that is happening round about called the student insurrection. It seems that it is very important for them to agree to enter into this game, by the way in which they argue about the subject of what is sold at the end, namely, a parchment, let us say, that may perhaps have some relationship with this S_1. If you do not play the game, you will have no diploma this year. There you have, my God, a little system that permits in any case an approximation of the sense of these things where people no longer find their bearings, concerning what is now happening in certain places. I am not claiming to contribute any historical key. What I am stating, is the following. It is that to refuse to, only makes sense if the question is centred around the relationships that are precisely those around to which psychoanalysis takes the question, namely, what is called the relationship of knowledge and the subject.

What are the subjecting or subjection effects of knowledge? Student have no vocation for revolution. You can believe it from someone who having entered for historical reasons into the field of the University, very precisely because with psychoanalysts there was no way of getting them to know anything whatsoever. So then a little hope that through the effect of reflection, the field of the University would make them reason differently. In short, a resonating drum for the drummer when he does not resonate himself, make no mistake. So then students, you understand, I have seen some throughout the years; to be a student is quite normally a servile position. And then you cannot (324) imagine that because you have spoken out in some little corner, the affair is settled. Students, in a word, continue to believe the professors about what should be thought in such and such a case about what they say. There is no doubt for students, there is an established opinion that in one or other case this is not worth much. But it is still the professor, namely, one expects from him all the same what is at the level of S_1, which is going to make of you a master on paper, a paper tiger! I have seen students who have come to me saying: "You know, So-and- So, it's scandalous, his book is copied from your seminar". That's students for you. Me, I am going to tell you, I did not even open this book, because I knew in advance that there was nothing in it but that! They came to tell me, me. But to write it, is a different affair. And that is because they were students.

Good, what in the world could have happened so that all of a sudden there was this movement of insurrection. What does a revolt mean, Sire? In order for this to become a revolution, what would be necessary? It would be necessary for the question to be attacked not at the level of tickling some professors but at the level of the relationships of the student as subject to knowledge. It is because psychoanalysis says, this point connected for a long time, every knowledge implies a subject, as a result of which there quite gently slides in as well substance, well then no, it cannot work like that. Even the upokeimenon can be disconnected from knowledge. A knowledge that the subject is unaware of, this is not a concept, as I had the sadness to read in a review of what, in a certain place, where psychoanalysis is put to the test. Naturally it is not for nothing. Psychoanalysis in such conditions would be better off not being charming and not to say that in short there is only a single Freudian concept, and to call it the unconscious, not even what I have just said, a knowledge the subject is unaware of. It is not a concept, at either of the two levels. It is a paradigm. It is starting from there that the concepts that, thank God, exist to mark out the Freudian field, and Freud produced others that, acceptable or not, are concepts, starting from this first phase of the experience, of this example which was the unconscious he discovered. The neurotic, is s(O). This means that he teaches us that the subject is always another, but that in addition, this other is not the right one. He is not the right one to know what is in question, of what causes him, the subject. So then people try as best they can to reunify this Ø in the measure of what is involved in every significant statement, namely, to rewrite it s(O), which is on the left and on the lower line of my graph. It should be stated, in other words, where one knows what one is saying. It is there that psychoanalysis stops, while what should be done, is to reconnect what is on the top left, the S, signifier of Ø.

(325) It is the same thing for the pervert who, for his part, is precisely the intact signifier of O, as I told you, and people try to reduce him to the s of the same O. Always the same thing, so that that means something. There you are. Do you believe that I am going to continue for long like that, huh? And under the pretext that today is my last class, to continue to tell you things so that at the end you will applaud, for once, because you know that after that, watch out, huh, I am off!

The discourse that I am speaking about has no need for these sort of glorious endings. It is not a classical oratio. And in effect, a discourse that is like a classical oration is not liked. A gentleman, who is here the administrative director of this establishment that is privileged with respect to the university, it seems that because of this the aforesaid establishment should have some control over what happens within it. It seems that there is no question of it, since it appears that in law, after having welcomed me at the request of one of the agencies of the school, like that, in a hospitable way, he has the right to tell me, that's it! I for my part agree, I completely agree. Because first of all it is true I am only here out of hospitality, and what is more, he has very good reasons that I have known about for a long time. It is that my teaching appears to him to be exactly what it is, namely anti-university in the sense that I have just defined it. He nevertheless took a very long time to say it to me. He only told me quite recently, on the occasion of a final little telephone call that I thought I should make to him, because there had been, I think, a type of misunderstanding that I absolutely wanted to dissipate before saying to him: "Of course, there is no question that...." etc. It is very curious that at that point he let it drop, in other words he told me that that was why. "Your teaching, he told me, your teaching is very with it (dans le vent)". You see that, the wind.... I would have believed that I was going against the wind here, but no matter!

Good, so then that he is within his rights, I have absolutely no reason to doubt, as regards myself. As regards you, it may be something else. But that is up to you. That for six years a certain number who have had the habit of coming precisely here are being evacuated, you see that does not count! This is even very explicitly what is at stake. In this respect, you understand I have some apologies to make to you, not because you are being evacuated, I have nothing to do with it; I could have warned you earlier. I have a little note here that I received, intentionally, since the 19th of March. The 19th of March. It is very funny, because on the 19th of March, I did not give a seminar. I tried by every means since, because I could not be bothered. And then, as you will understand, I am not moved by the fact of speaking before you for the last time, because every time I come here, as I told you, I tell myself that perhaps finally it is going to be the last time.

So then one day when I was questioning myself, when I was (326) questioning you about this flood of people that you make up, I cannot even say that it was when I was going home, the following morning I received this little note that I am going to read to you. I did not tell you about it because I said to myself, if by chance that disturbed them, what complications there would be! For my part you understand I was once in a similar state for two years. There were people who spent their time trying to liquidate me; I allowed them to continue their little work so that my seminar should continue, I mean that I should be heard at the level where I had certain things to say. It is the same thing this year, as a result of which then I received this on the 20th of March, and it is dated the18th of March. So then there is no relationship. I even kept the envelope. I had torn it up at first, I picked it up, and it is indeed stamped 18th. As you see, trust reigns!

Dr Lacan, 5, rue de Lille – as some of you know – Paris (7e).
"Doctor,
"At the request of the 6th section of the Ecole Pratique des Hautes Etudes, the Ecole Normale has put at your disposal a room to give a course for more than five years.

"The reorganisation of studies at the Ecole, which is a consequence of the general reform of the Universities... (laughter)....and of the recent law on the orientation of third level studies, as well as the development of teaching in several disciplines, is going to make it impossible for us to lend you the salle Dussane or any other room in the Ecole...(laughter)...for your course.

"I am giving you enough notice...(that's true!) ...so that you can envisage from now the transfer of your course to another establishment at the re-opening of the next academic year 1969-70".

Me, I really like that! I really like it; all of this is correct historically, it is quite true. It was in effect here at the request of the 6th section of the Ecole Practique des Hautes Etudes, like that, following a transmission of personal debt that there was.....anyway there was an eminent man called Lucien Fèbvre who had, one could not say the unfortunate idea, he is not to blame for it, of dying before giving me what he had promised me, namely a place in this Ecole. Others had availed of this personal debt. The university is very feudal. That is the way it happens in..... One is indeed, as you know in the university, something like that, a liegeman. The liegeman, the l'hommelle, all of that holds together!

So then it is under this title, it is at the request, as they say, that I was there. Good. So then I am delighted that it should be highlighted here. I am not against, you understand, the reform (laughter) being the reason that is put forward. You understand, I am not a complete baby, I know well that at half past twelve on Wednesday, who wants the salle Dussane? Some trouble was taken to make the acoustics in this (327) room work. By the way, there are people here, I am going to tell you all the same what you came to hear, I found that it was worth the trouble to make a number of photocopies that I hope is sufficient for my listeners today. The people to whom I gave these documents are going to distribute them to you; I would ask you to take only one each. What is more, this will be something or other. It is the S_1 you understand. You will all be bound together by something, you will know that you were here on the 25th of June 1969. And that there is even a chance that the fact that you were here on that day bears witness to the fact that you were here for the whole year. It is a diploma! (Applause)

You never know, that may help us to find one another because who knows, if I disappear into the wilds and one day I come back, it will be a sign of recognition, a symbol! (Laughter) I may very well say one day that any person can enter a particular room for a confidential paper on the subject of the function of psychoanalysis in the political register, because you cannot imagine the degree to which we are questioning ourselves about this! It is true that fundamentally there is here a veritable question about which one day, who knows, the psychoanalyst, even the University, may have some advantage in getting some idea of! I would be rather inclined to say that if ever I was the one who was asked to put forward something about it, I would give you a rendezvous in this room (laughter), so that you would have a final class for this year, the one that you are not getting, in short, because I stopped earlier. I stopped in order not to give a final class. This does not amuse me. So then you have this little object in hand. There are 300 all the same, 300 evacuees!

Since that is how we are now, after all I must leave you to leave you a little time among yourselves; it would not be a bad thing; because

when I am there, despite everything, nothing comes out. Who knows, you may well have things to say to one another. But in any case one would scarcely believe that....your habits of smoking, for example, you know well, you see that plays a role, all of that! And then there are the people from administration also, because you know, in an affair like that, no one is missing. The admin staff said that I was receiving a strange group of people here (laughter) as such! It even appears that they had to repair the seats. Something happened! Jean-Jacques Lebel, you were not the one who was here with a band-saw? From time to time I heard a little noise, you must have been sawing the arms of the chairs!

One learns something every day! You are going to be able to fan yourself with that thing when I say goodbye to you in a moment! The smell on it will be substituted for the smoke.

What would be good, you see, is that you should give to this the only fate that it should really have worthy of what it is, a kind of signifier. You are going to find a sense for this word, la Flacelière. I for my part put that in the feminine like that; I would not say that this is a penchant but anyway it sounds rather feminine, the cordelière, or the flatulencière! What if this got into common usage, "do you take me for a flacelière? (Laughter).

That may be of use to you given the way things are happening! Do not pull too hard on the flacelière! I will leave you to find that. Me for my part I always taught that it is the signifiers that created the signifieds. That makes me dream a little. I realised a lot of things, in particular the complete ignorance of a certain use of paper that obviously could only happen when people had paper. Before that this was not done with a parchment or with a papyrus! We do not know at what date, I telephone the mother houses as I might call them, nobody knows, when this use of paper began; in a flash, because it is a question that I had posed myself only in connection with chapter XIII of Gargantua. Someone could perhaps inform me about the subject. Anyway do not use it for that; I did not give you a package, I only gave you one each.

My dear friends, at this point I will leave you. I point out to you that these papers are signed, signed, actually I was not going to put my signature on the back of this paper, but I put the date. On 191 samples, this date is from my hand. On the 150 others, it is from the hand of my faithful secretary, Gloria, who was kind enough to substitute herself for me in that – you know it gives you a cramp. To write 25.6.69 151 times may well be very graphic, all the same I took the trouble.

On this, if you have some reflections to make to one another or some message to send to me, I will leave you in the hands of the faithful Gloria who is going to collect messages on this occasion. Anybody who would like to give an opinion in any way that seems opportune to him, has a good 20 minutes to do it.

As for me I will say adieu and thank you for your fidelity. (Lively applause).

THE SEMINAR OF JACQUES LACAN

BOOK XVII

Translator's Note

This is a translation of the seminar that Jacques Lacan delivered at the Law Faculty, Place du Panthéon, in 1969–70, in the unsettled aftermath of the eventful year of 1968. The original text is the version of the seminar edited by Jacques-Alain Miller and published by Éditions du Seuil.

Quite apart from the usual challenges facing any translator of Lacan into English, this seminar presents special difficulties of its own. Certain of them call for special comment.

Beginning with the title itself, l'envers, translated here as "the other side," also carries the meaning of "back," "verso," "lining," "underside," "flip-side," "underneath," "bad side"—connotations of the unseen, even the obscene, which "the other side" in English only barely suggests.

lathouse

What is striking about this made-up word, pronounced LA-TOOZE, is its suffix, -ouse, which can be used to turn ordinary words into slang and informal language. Thus, une bague, a ring, becomes une baguouse; la (prison) centrale becomes la centrouse; and so on. With "lathouse" Lacan is obviously having a bit of fun with his object a.

This neologism, translated as "astudied," attempts to work the "a" of "object a" into the term " student" or "studied" to convey something of the place the student occupies in the university discourse.

alèthosphère

This neologism, constructed as it is from the Greek words for "truth" and for "ball," "globe," or "sphere," is plain enough for the English reader. Lacan introduces it to refer to the means by which something can be recorded at a distance, whether in the form of light or sound waves. The alethosphere obviously extends beyond the limits of the earth's atmosphere.

In other cases where the translation is open to question, potentially misleading, or has struck me as inadequate to the original French, I have included the original term in brackets; the reader can at least judge the adequacy of this English reflection to its French original.

I would like to thank Kerry Murphy and Justin Clemens for working their way through drafts, while Bruce Fink's detailed comments have also improved the quality of the translation.

DISCOURSE WITHOUT SPEECH

LOGI PREINTERPRET

THE RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN KNOWLEDGE AND JOUISSANCE

THE SLAVE ROBBED OF HIS KNOWLEDGE

THE DESIRE TO KNOW

Allow me once again, my dear friends, to raise the question of this audience which has assisted me, most notably today, by following me in what for some of you is the third of my relocations.[1]

Before I do this, the least I can do is spell out how I have come to be here in order to thank those I owe thanks to. It is through an offer that the Faculté de droit has kindly made to several of my colleagues from the [École des] Hautes Études with whom they have kindly included me. I would like to thank, and I believe it is with your endorsement, the Faculté de droit, and in particular its senior Faculty, most notably the Dean.

As the notice may have informed you, I will only be speaking here—not that this place was not offered to me every Wednesday—the second and third Wednesdays of each month, thereby freeing me, no doubt, for other duties the other Wednesdays. And in particular, I believe I can announce that the first Wednesday of each month, at least for some of them, that is, every second month, and therefore the first Wednesday of December, February, April, and June, I will be going to Vincennes to give, not my seminar as was incorrectly announced, but what in contrast I have taken care to call, so as to stress that they are different, "Four Impromptus," to which I have given a humorous title that you can read in the [university] grounds where the poster has already been put up.

Since, as you can see, it pleases me to leave certain details up in the air, I shall take immediate advantage of this to air a scruple that has stayed with me following the welcome that I gave a certain person, because on reflec- 10

tion it was not very friendly—not that I wanted it that way, but in fact that was how it turned out.

One day somebody who is perhaps here, and will no doubt not make herself known, accosted me in the street just as I was getting into a taxi. She pulled over on her scooter and said to me, "Are you Dr. Lacan?"

"Yes, I am," I said to her. "Why?"

"Are you holding your seminar again?"

"Yes, of course, soon."

"Where?"

And then, no doubt I had my reasons for this, and I ask her to take my word for it, I answered, "You'll see."

She then took off on her little scooter with so much throttle that I was left both nonplussed and full of remorse. It's my remorse that I want to convey to her today by apologizing to her, if she is here, in the hope that she will forgive me.

In fact, this is surely an opportunity to point out that it's never, in any way whatever, by another person's excesses that one turns out, in appearance at least, to be overwhelmed. It is always because their excesses happen to coincide with your own. It was because I was already at this point, in a certain state that represented an excessive preoccupation, that I no doubt expressed myself as I did, in a way I very quickly found inappropriate.

With that, let's go into what my contribution for this year is going to be about.

I thought I should call this seminar "Psychoanalysis upside down" [La Psychanalyse à l'envers].

Don't get the idea that this title owes anything to the current situation that thinks it is in the process of turning a number of places upside down. Let me give just the following as proof of this. In a text published in 1966—one of those introductions that I wrote at the time of the collection of my Écrits, and which punctuate it—a text called "De nos antécédents," "On My Antecedents," on page 68, I describe my discourse as being about, I say,
11 a revival of the Freudian project upside down. It's thus written down well before the events—a revival from the other direction [reprise par l'envers].

What does that mean? Last year I managed, with much perseverance, to ascertain what discourse is about, as a necessary structure that goes well beyond speech, which is always more or less occasional. What I prefer, I said, and I even wrote it up on the board one day, is a discourse without speech.

The fact is that, in truth, discourse can clearly subsist without words. It subsists in certain fundamental relations which would literally not be able to be maintained without language. Through the instrument of language a number of stable relations are established, inside which something that is much larger and goes much further than actual utterances [énonciations] can, of course, be inscribed. There is no need of the latter for our conduct, possibly for our acts, to be inscribed within the framework of certain primordial statements. If this were not so, what would we make of what we keep rediscovering in our experience, and especially in our psychoanalytic experience—I mention analytic experience in this connection only because it gives this a precise designation—what would we make of what keeps appearing in the guise of the superego?

There are structures—we cannot describe them in any other way—for characterizing what can be extracted from this "in the form of," one particular usage of which I took the liberty of stressing last year—namely, what happens by virtue of a fundamental relation, the one I define as the relation of one signifier to another. And from this there results the emergence of what we call the subject—via the signifier which, as it happens, here functions as representing this subject with respect to another signifier.

How is this fundamental form to be situated? Without any further ado we are, if you will, going to write this form in a new way this year. Last year I wrote it as the exteriority of the signifier S_1—the one that is the point of departure for the definition of discourse that we will emphasize at this first step—with respect to a circle marked with the sign A, that is, the field of the big Other. But, simplifying, we will take S_1 and the battery of signifiers, which we will refer to as the sign S_2. I am talking about those signifiers that are already there, whereas at the point of origin at which we place ourselves in order to establish what discourse is about, discourse thought of as the status of the statement [l'énoncé], S_1 is the one to be seen as intervening. It intervenes in a signifying battery that we have no right, ever, to take as dispersed, 12 as not already forming a network of what is called knowledge [savoir].

Knowledge initially arises at the moment at which S_1 comes to represent something, through its intervention in the field defined, at the point we have come to, as an already structured field of knowledge. And the subject is its supposition, its hypokeimenon, insofar as the subject represents the specific trait of being distinguished from the living individual. The latter is certainly its locus, where the subject leaves its mark, but it isn't of the same order as what is brought in by the subject, by virtue of the status of knowledge.

$$\begin{array}{ccc} S_1 & \rightarrow & S_2 \\ $ & & a \end{array}$$

No doubt it's around this word "knowledge" that there is a point of ambiguity to which, we have to stress this today, I have already rendered your ears sensitive by means of several paths, tracks, moments of enlightenment, or flashes of light.

Shall I mention it for those of you who took note of it, for whom it is still fresh in your mind? Last year I had occasion to call the Other's jouissance "knowledge."

A strange business. To be honest, this formulation had never been proffered before. It's not new, since even last year I was able to make it sufficiently plausible for you, I could make the claim without raising any particular protests. This is something I announced I would return to this year.

Let me first of all finish what began with two legs, then had three. Let's give it its fourth.

The latter is something I have been emphasizing for quite a while, and last year especially, since for quite some time this was the purpose of the seminar—"D'un Autre à l'autre," "From an Other to the other," I called it. This other, this little other, with its famous "the," was what at this level, which is the level of algebra, of signifying structure, we designate as the object a.

At this level of signifying structure we have only to learn the way it operates. Thus we are at liberty to see what happens when we write the things out and give the entire system a quarter turn.

13 I have been speaking about this notorious quarter turn for long enough, and on different occasions—in particular, ever since the appearance of what I wrote under the title "Kant with Sade"—for people to think that perhaps one day it would be seen that this isn't limited to what the so-called Schema Z does, and that there are other reasons for this quarter turn than some pure accident of imaginary representation.

$$\frac{$}{a} \rightarrow \frac{S_1}{S_2}$$

Here you have an example. If it seems justified to say that the chain, the sequence of letters of this algebra, must not be disturbed, then by performing this operation of a quarter turn we will obtain four structures, and no more, the first of which in some way gives you the starting point.

It is a simple matter to quickly reproduce the remaining three on paper.

I am only saying this to specify an arrangement that has absolutely not been imposed in any way—as they say, from a certain point of view, nothing has been abstracted from any reality. On the contrary it's already inscribed in what functions as this reality I was speaking about before, the reality of a discourse that is already in the world and that underpins it, at least the one we are familiar with. Not only is it already inscribed in it, but it is one of its arches.

Of course, the form of letters in which we inscribe this symbolic chain is of no great importance, provided they are distinct—this is enough for some constant relations to become clear. As is the case with this formula.

What does it say? It locates a moment. What my discourse subsequently develops here will tell us what the appropriate meaning to give this moment is. It says that it is at the very instant at which S_1 intervenes in the already constituted field of the other signifiers, insofar as they are already articulated with one another as such, that, by intervening in another system, this $, which I have called the subject as divided, emerges. Its entire status, in the strongest sense of this term, is to be reconsidered this year.

Finally, we have always stressed that something defined as a loss emerges from this trajectory. This is what the letter to be read as object a designates.

We have not left undesignated the point from which we extract this function of the lost object. It's from Freud's discourse about the specific sense that repetition has in the speaking being. Indeed, repetition is not about just any old effect of memory in the biological sense. Repetition bears a certain relationship to what is the limit of this knowledge, and which we call jouissance. 14

This is why it's a logical articulation that is at stake in the formulation that knowledge is the Other's jouissance—the Other's, of course, insofar as—since there is no Other—the intervention of the signifier makes the Other emerge as a field.

You will tell me no doubt that here, in short, we are still going around in circles—the signifier, the Other, knowledge, the signifier, the Other, knowledge, and so on. But this is where the term jouissance enables us to show the apparatus's point of insertion. In doing so, we are no doubt leaving behind what knowledge authentically is, what is recognizable as knowledge, and referring to the limits, to the field of these limits as such, the field that Freud's words dare to confront.

What is the upshot of all that these words articulate? Not knowledge, but confusion. Well then, from this very confusion we have to draw some lessons, since it is a question of limits and of leaving the system. Leaving it by virtue of what?—by virtue of a thirst for meaning, as if the system needed it. The system doesn't need it. But we feeble beings, as we will keep on discovering for ourselves at every turning point over the course of this year, we need meaning. Alright then, here's one.

It's perhaps not the right one. But then, it is certain that we will find that there are many of these "It's perhaps not the right one"—the insistence of which is for us a good indication of the dimension of truth.

Notice the ambiguity that the word "Trieb" has taken on in psychoanalytic stupidity, instead of people striving to grasp how this category is to be unpacked. The category is not without ancestry, I mean the word is not without a usage already, one that goes back a long way, as far back as Kant, but what it is useful for in analytic discourse would merit our not rushing in and translating it as "instinct." But, after all, these slippages do not occur for no reason. And although for a long time I have been emphasizing the aberrant character of this translation, we are nevertheless within our rights to benefit from it. Not so as to enshrine the notion of instinct, to be sure, 15 and above all not in this respect, but to remind you what it is in Freud's discourse that renders it a habitable notion—and simply to try and make this discourse inhabit it in a different way.

Popularly, the idea of instinct is indeed the idea of knowledge—knowledge such that we are unable to say what it means, but it is supposed to result, and not without good reason, in the fact that life subsists. On the other hand, if we are to give any sense to what Freud says about the pleasure principle as essential to the functioning of life, being the principle whereby tension is maintained at its lowest level, aren't we already stating what, as his subsequent discourse shows, was forced upon him? Namely, the death drive.

What forced this notion upon him was the development of an experience, analytic experience, insofar as it has the structure of discourse. For don't forget that one does not invent the death drive by considering people's behavior.

We have the death drive here. We have it here, where something is taking place between you and what I am saying.

I said, "What I am saying." I am not talking about what I am. What would be the use, since, in short, one can see this, owing to your presence? It's not that your presence speaks in my favor. It does speak sometimes and, usually, in my place.

Be that as it may, what justifies me in saying something here is what I would call the essence of this manifestation that the diverse and successive audiences I have attracted according to the locations in which I have spoken have been.

I was particularly keen to tack the following remark on somewhere, because, as I am in a new location, today seemed to me to be the day. The location has always had an impact upon the style of what I am calling this manifestation, and I do not want to pass up the opportunity to say that it bears a relation to the usual meaning of the term "interpretation." What I said by, for, and in your presence is at each of these moments, if we define them by their geographical locations, always already interpreted.

This will have to take its place in the little rotating quadrupeds I have begun to put to use today, and I will come back to it. But so as not to leave 16 you completely in the dark, I will point something out to you straight away.

If I had to interpret what I said at Sainte-Anne Hospital between 1953 and 1963, I mean pin down its interpretation—interpretation in a sense contrary to analytic interpretation, which makes you feel how much analytic interpretation itself goes against the grain of the ordinary meaning of the term—I would say that what was the loudest chord, the chord that really resonated, was having fun.

The most exemplary character in this audience, which was a medical one obviously—but then, some of the participants were not doctors—was the person who punctuated my discourse with a sort of continuous stream of jokes. This is what I will take as most characteristic of what over a period of ten years was the essence of my manifestation. Further proof of this is that things only started to turn sour when I dedicated a term to the analysis of jokes.[2]

That's a big aside, and I can't go on in this direction for very long, but I must add what it was that characterized interpretation at the place where you left me last time, the École normale supérieure.

E. N. S.—it's quite magnificent in initials. It revolves around being [l'étant]. One must always know how to benefit from literal equivocations, above all when they are the first three letters of the word enseigner, "to teach." As it happens, it was in rue d'Ulm that it was noticed that what I was saying was a teaching.

Before that, it hadn't been at all obvious. It was not even permitted. The professors, and especially the doctors, were very worried. The fact that it wasn't at all medical left serious doubts whether it deserved to be called teaching, right to the day when they saw these young blokes from the Cahiers pour l'analyse come along, who were trained in this part of the world where—as I had said a long time before, precisely at the time of the jokes—one of the effects of training is that one knows nothing but teaches it beautifully. The fact that that was how they interpreted what I was saying—I am speaking today of a different interpretation from analytic interpretation—does indeed make sense.

Naturally, no one knows what will happen here. I don't know whether law students will come, but actually, it would be wonderful for interpreta- 17 tion. This will probably be by far the most important moment of the three, since this year we are tackling psychoanalysis from the other side, and perhaps, precisely, giving it its status, in what is called the juridical sense of the term. This, in any case, has surely always been concerned with the structure of discourse, and to the nth degree. If this isn't what law is, if we cannot grasp how discourse structures the real world here, then where can we? This is why we are no worse off here than anywhere else.

It is therefore not simply for reasons of convenience that I seized this opportunity. But it is also what causes you the least inconvenience in your travels, at least for those who were accustomed to the other side.[3] I am not so sure that, for parking, here is very convenient, but then, for that, you still have rue d'Ulm all the same.

Let's pick up the thread again.

We had got to the point of situating our instinct and our knowledge, in sum, on the basis of what Bichat defines as life. "Life," he says, and this is the most profound definition, it is not at all trite if you look at it closely, "is the totality of forces that resist death."[4]

Read what Freud says about life's resistance to the decline into Nirvana, as the death drive was otherwise described at the time he introduced it. No doubt, at the heart of analytic experience, which is an experience of discourse, he gives thought to this decline toward a return to the inanimate. Freud goes that far. But what, he says, makes for the subsistence of this bubble—really, this image forces itself upon you when you listen to these pages—is the fact that life only ever returns there via paths that are always the same, ones it has previously traced. What is this, if not the true sense given to what we find in the notion of instinct, which is that it implies knowledge?

This track, this pathway, is familiar to us. It's ancestral knowledge. And what is this knowledge, if we don't forget that Freud introduces what he himself calls "beyond the pleasure principle," the pleasure principle itself not being overturned thereby? Knowledge is what brings life to a halt at a certain limit on the path to jouissance. For the path toward death—this is 18 what is at issue, it's a discourse about masochism—the path toward death is nothing other than what is called jouissance.

[3] The École normale supérieure is located in the rue d'Ulm, which runs off the Place du Panthéon and is not far from the new location of Lacan's seminar at the Faculté de droit.

[4] Marie François Xavier Bichat (1771–1802), French doctor, anatomist, and physiologist. See his Physiological Researches on Life and Death (1827; reprint, New York: Arno Press, 1977).

The relationship between knowledge and jouissance is a primitive one, and it is where what emerges with the appearance of the apparatus of the signifier comes to be inserted. It is henceforth conceivable that we are binding up the function of this emergence of the signifier.

"That will do!" I hear you say. "Do we really need to explain everything? And, why not, the origins of language?" We all know that to structure knowledge correctly one needs to abandon the question of origins. What we are doing, in spelling this out, is superfluous with respect to what we have to develop this year, which is situated at the level of structures. It is a futile search for meaning. But, as I have already said, let's take note of what we are.

I will go on, then. At the intersection of a jouissance—and not just any jouissance, it must no doubt remain opaque—at the intersection of a jouissance that is privileged above all others—not because it is sexual jouissance, since what this jouissance designates by being at this intersection is the loss of sexual jouissance, castration—in relation to this meeting point with sexual jouissance there emerges, in the Freudian fable of repetition, the engendering of something radical that gives body to a schema that is, literally, articulated. S_1, having emerged at the first moment, is repeated with respect to S_2. The subject emerges from this entry into a relation, the subject that something, a certain loss, represents. And it is worth having made this effort in the direction of meaning in order to comprehend the ambiguity.

It was not for nothing that last year I called "surplus jouissance" this same object that I had moreover described as the one that the entire dialectic of frustration in analysis is organized around. This means that the loss of the object is also the gap, a hole opened up to something, and we don't know whether or not this something is the representation of the lack in jouissance, which is situated by means of the knowledge process, insofar as it appears in a completely different light as a result of being, from that point on, knowledge scanded by the signifier. Is it even the same?

The relationship to jouissance is suddenly made to appear in a different light by this still virtual function called the function of desire. Moreover this is why I'm describing what appears here as "surplus jouissance" and not forcing anything or committing any transgression.

I beg you to bite your tongue a bit over all this nonsense. What analysis shows, if it shows anything at all—I invoke here those whose soul is a little bit different from the one of which one could say, as Barrès says of the cadaver, that it talks nonsense—is very precisely the fact that we don't ever transgress.[5] Sneaking around is not transgressing. Seeing a door half-open is not the same as going through it. We shall have the occasion to come back to what I am introducing now—there is no transgression here, but rather an irruption, a falling into the field, of something not unlike jouissance—a surplus.

But perhaps even that has to be paid for. That is why I told you last year that in Marx the a, which is here, is recognized as functioning at the level that is articulated—on the basis of analytic discourse, not any of the others—as surplus jouissance. Here you have what Marx discovered as what actually happens at the level of surplus value.

Of course, it wasn't Marx who invented surplus value. It's just that prior to him nobody knew what its place was. It has the same ambiguous place as the one I have just mentioned, that of excess work, of surplus work. "What does it pay in?" he says. "It pays in jouissance, precisely, and this has to go somewhere."

What's disturbing is that if one pays in jouissance, then one has got it, and then, once one has got it it is very urgent that one squander it. If one does not squander it, there will be all sorts of consequences.

Let's leave the thing up in the air for the moment.

What am I up to? I am beginning to get you to acknowledge, simply through locating it, that this four-footed apparatus, with its four positions, can be used to define four radical discourses.

It's no accident that I presented this form to you as the first. There is no reason why I could not have begun with any of the others, with the second for instance. But it is a fact, determined by historical reasons, that this initial form—the one that we express by starting with this signifier that represents a subject with respect to another signifier—has a very special 20 importance, insofar as, in what I am going to state this year, it will be singled out as being, of the four, the one that articulates the master's discourse.

The master's discourse. I don't see any point in recounting its historical importance, given that you are, after all, on the whole recruited through this sieve called the university, and that, as a consequence, you are not unaware that it's all philosophy ever talks about. Even before it began talking about this alone, that is before it called it by its name—at least in Hegel it stands out, and is quite specially illustrated by him—it was already apparent that at the level of the master's discourse something appeared which is of interest to us concerning discourse, irrespective of its ambiguity, and which is called philosophy.

I do not know how far I will be able to go with what I want to point out to you today, since we mustn't delay if we want to go over the four discourses in question.

What are the others called? I will tell you straight away, why not?—even if only so as to whet your appetite.

That one, the second on the blackboard, is the hysteric's discourse. It's not obvious straightaway, but I will explain it to you.

And then, the other two. One is the analyst's discourse. The other. . . . No, definitely not, I won't tell you what it is. Saying it just like that today would create too many misunderstandings. You will see—it's a discourse that is highly relevant today.

Coming back to the first one, then, I must ground why it is that the present algebraic formula is described in this way, as the one that gives the structure of the master's discourse.

S_1 is, to say it briefly, the signifier, the signifier function, that the essence of the master relies upon. From a different angle you may perhaps recall what I emphasized several times last year—that the slave's own field is knowledge, S_2. Reading the testimonies we have about life in Antiquity, in any case discourse about this life—read Aristotle's Politics on this—what I am claiming about the slave as being characterized as the one who is the support of knowledge is not in doubt.

In Antiquity this was not simply a class, as with our modern slave, it was a function inscribed in the family. The slave Aristotle speaks of is just as much a part of the family as he is a part of the State, and even more a part of the family than a part of the State. This is because he is the one who has the know-how [savoir-faire]. Before we can know whether the knowledge is known, whether a subject can be founded on the perspective of a knowledge that is totally transparent in itself, it is important to know how to mop up the register of what, at its origins, know-how is. 21

Now, what is it that happens right before our very eyes, which gives meaning, an initial meaning—as you will see, there are other meanings—to philosophy? Fortunately we have traces of this thanks to Plato, and it is quite essential to remember this so as to put what is at issue in its place and, after all, if anything in what is bothering us has any sense, it can only come from putting things in their place. What does philosophy designate over its entire evolution? It's this—theft, abduction, stealing slavery of its knowledge, through the maneuvers of the master.

To see this it is enough to read Plato's dialogues from time to time, and, as only God knows, for the past sixteen years I have been making an effort to get those who listen to me to do it.

I will begin by distinguishing what on this occasion I will call the two aspects of knowledge, the articulated aspect and this know-how that is so akin to animal knowledge, but which in the slave is not totally devoid of the apparatus that transforms it into one of the most articulated networks of language. The point is that this, the second layer, the articulated apparatus, can be transmitted, which means it can be transmitted from the slave's pocket to the master's—assuming they had pockets in those days.

It is here that you have the entire effort to isolate what is called episteme. It's a funny word, I don't know whether you have ever given it much thought—"putting oneself in the right position," in short it is the same word as Verstehen. It is all about finding the position that makes it possible for knowledge to become the master's knowledge. The entire function of the episteme insofar as it is specified as transmissible knowledge—see Plato's dialogues—is always borrowed from the techniques of craftsmen, that is to say of serfs. It is a matter of extracting the essence of this knowledge in order for it to become the master's knowledge.

And then, naturally, this is augmented by a little backlash, which is absolutely what is called a lapsus, a return of the repressed. But so says someone or other, Karl Marx or someone.

22 Refer to the Meno, where it is a question of the square root of 2 and its incommensurable. There's someone who says, "Hey, look, get the slave to come over, that little fellow, can't you see, he knows." They ask him questions, master's questions, of course, and the slave naturally answers what the questions already dictate as their response. You find here a form of ridicule. It's a way of scoffing at the character who is being taken apart here. It is shown that the serious business, the aim, is to make it known that the slave knows, but by acknowledging it only in this derisory way, what is hidden is that it is only a matter of robbing the slave of his function at the level of knowledge.

To give what I have just said its sense one has to see, and we will take this step next time, how the slave's position is articulated with respect to jouissance. I already began to say this last year, in the form of a colorful hint. What people usually say is that jouissance is the privilege of the master. What is interesting on the contrary, as everyone knows, is what belies this within it.

In short, it's the master's status that is at stake here. By way of introduction today I only wanted to tell you how profoundly interesting this status is to us, the utterance of which is worth keeping for a future step. It is interesting to us when what is being unveiled and, at the same time, reduced to a corner of the landscape is the function of philosophy. Given the space, briefer this year than others, that I have allowed myself, I will no doubt be unable to develop it. It is of no importance, perhaps someone else will take up this theme and do what he will with it. Philosophy in its historical function is this extraction, I would almost say this betrayal, of the slave's knowledge, in order to obtain its transmutation into the master's knowledge.

Does this mean that what we have seen emerge as the science that dominates us is the fruit of this operation? Here again, rather than having to rush in, we can observe that on the contrary it's nothing of the kind. This wisdom, this episteme, created with every recourse to every dichotomy, led only to knowledge that can be designated by the term that Aristotle himself used to characterize the master's knowledge—theoretical knowledge. Not in the weak sense that we give this word, but in the emphatic sense that the word "theoria" has in Aristotle. A singular mistake. I will come back to this, since for my discourse this is the crucial point, the pivotal point—it was only when, by a movement of renunciation of this wrongly acquired knowledge, so to speak, someone, for the first time as such, extracted the function of the subject from the strict relationship between S_1 and S_2—I named Descartes, whose work I believe I am able to spell out, not without agreement with at least a significant number of those who have discussed it—that science was born. 23

It is well to distinguish between the time at which this turn emerged in the attempt to pass knowledge from the slave to the master, and the time it recommenced, which is motivated only by a certain way of raising, within the structure, all possible functions of the statement insofar as the articulation of the signifier alone supports it. There you already have one small example of the insight that the type of work I am proposing this year may bring you. Don't think it stops there.

What I have been proposing here presents, as soon as one shows it, at least this characteristic of uncovering the obvious—who can deny that philosophy has ever been anything other than a fascinating enterprise for the master's benefit? At the other extreme we have Hegel's discourse, with its outrageous absolute knowledge, as it's called. What can this absolute knowledge possibly mean, if we begin with the definition that I took the liberty of recalling as being a foundational one for our way of proceeding concerning knowledge?

This is perhaps where we will start next time. It will at least be one of our points of departure, for there is another, which is no less important, and which is quite particularly salubrious because of the overwhelmingly outrageous things one hears from psychoanalysts concerning the desire for knowledge.

If there is one thing that psychoanalysis should force us to maintain obstinately, it's that the desire for knowledge bears no relation to knowledge—unless, of course, we wheel out the lubricious word "transgression." A radical distinction, which has far-reaching consequences from the point of view of pedagogy—the desire to know is not what leads to knowledge. What leads to knowledge is—allow me to justify this in the more or less long term—the hysteric's discourse.

There is as a matter of fact a question to be asked. Does the master who brings about this operation of the displacing, the conveyancing, of the slave's knowledge want to know? Does he have the desire to know? A real 24 master, as in general we used to see until a recent era, and this is seen less and less, doesn't desire to know anything at all—he desires that things work. And why would he want to know? There are more amusing things than that. How did the philosopher manage to inspire the master with the desire to know? I will leave you on this note. It's a bit provocative. If there are any of you who work this out between now and next time, let me know.

Supplement

Following session: Agitation

The people who, for various reasons, love me warned me that agitation was in the air.

They are not sufficiently aware that for me, too, agitation is in the air. And I do so for a reason that is of supreme interest to me—for what it proves or disproves concerning this level at which I am situating the structure of a discourse.

I have just said "I."

It's obviously because I am viewing the discourse in question from somewhere else. I am viewing it from a place in which I am situated by another discourse, of which I am the effect—so that, in the present case, saying "This discourse situates me" is the same as saying "This discourse is situated."

At the level of this discourse it's not so as to be able to blow my own trumpet, to give a good course, as we say, which is everything. It doesn't count for nothing, to be sure, and no one can tell me that, up till now, there has been any lack of opportunity for taking notes.

25 To be honest, I cannot complain of ever having been disturbed.

But I do not think that agitating is about disturbing classes. It would be a pity if I had to teach this to the agitators themselves.

To be honest, as essential in fact as whether or not I speak without being disturbed is what my listeners are steeped in. In effect, what I am speaking about is a signal that this discourse that is not my own, but the one of which I am—to restrict myself to this provisional term—the effect, is swinging into action.

I went to Vincennes last week where people might have thought that what took place wasn't to my taste. Everyone agreed in fact that my going, solely by virtue of my being a prominent person, would be the occasion for obstruction. Does anyone believe that this would have made any sort of impression on me? Need I say that I was fully aware of what I was to encounter there? And what sort of great novelty, in the context, do people expect this incident to have constituted for me when such obstruction has nothing new about it?

If we go right back to the start, when I began my discourse at Sainte-Anne, what I am calling "what my listeners are steeped in" was at that time constituted by a little survey the frequency of which I couldn't say, but it may well have been monthly then quarterly. It was an anxious investigation they were carrying out on my listeners, in the very milieu where I was their guest, on the subject of knowing how well my teaching fulfilled the requirements of what constitutes medical teaching. It might have been the case—horror of horrors—that my teaching did not possess the characteristics of medical teaching.

On the subject that I chose to begin with, namely, good heavens, the critique of Freud, what could the characteristics of medical teaching have possibly been? Did it only have to consist in some act of reference—I didn't say "reverence"—to terms considered to be sacred because they are themselves located right in the center, at the heart, of medical teaching? Should I have indicated, in order for this teaching to be medical, that perhaps one day endocrinal causes will be found for neurosis? Or just simply recalled that there is one of these little elements that we cannot fail to take account of, and that we call the constitutional factor? That would have been medical.

In short, as I did not bother to waste time on these genuflections the investigations stopped and they were convinced that I had placed them in the unfortunate position of being subjected, at the heart of a place that is 26 essentially medical, to a teaching that wasn't.

It was then that I was made aware, by people through whom, since they were in analysis with me, one was, unfortunately, only too sure that the message regarding what one thought of my public would necessarily get to me.

I mention this because in the audience that you are today I can discern a bit better than last time the seams, the components, I can situate the faces better. There are many familiar faces here, but I am delighted by this, as I am also delighted with the relative decrease in numbers I can observe last time, it was a bit like a crowded Metro in here.

A fair few of you were already part of that very old audience before following me to that place from which I had to emigrate, as it turned out, and I can say that my audience at Sainte-Anne really did consist then of those who are currently the pillars of the École freudienne—I do not mean by that that these are not people you can count on. Well then, good heavens, one had the impression, it seems, merely on the basis of watching them wander about before they went in to listen to me at half-past twelve, as usual, that they showed all sorts of signs of drug addiction and homosexuality. It was palpable. It was, obviously, what the style, the general form, and the bearing of these itinerants reflected.

This is so that you know that it's no recent thing that, because of its composition, my audience gives rise to—what? this is precisely what I am wondering about—a certain discomfort. We experienced this in a place that organized a venue for us, and, to be sure, I am grateful to those who mentioned the fact that it lasted as long as it did. Nevertheless, don't imagine that characterizing my audience as troublemakers began at these incidental places.

It was students at the École normale, the Normalian elements, these little princes of the university who know quite well that you don't have to know something in order to teach it, who discovered that very curious things were happening at my seminar. It so happened over there that when you smoked—in fact, for this reason I made myself the echo, every now and 27 then, of the fact that you might refrain from doing so—something happened that I have never seen anywhere, which is that the smoke went through the ceiling of the room, so that the elegant Normalians who were apparently in the library space above could no longer breathe.

These are extraordinary things that can obviously only occur because of the audience that you are. It is the importance of this that I am showing you.

[Arrival of a building supervisor.]

I was calling this agitation at Vincennes into question, you really see it, perfectly. This dear man is very touching.

All this takes place in a zone that nevertheless does not lose its meaning.

[The supervisor turns off the lights and retracts the blackboard.]

However amusing these jokes about higher offices, I declare the session over.

AXES OF THE ANALYTIC SUBVERSION

31

The master and the hysteric

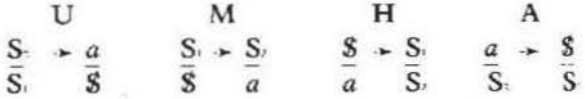
KNOWLEDGE THAT IS NOT KNOWN

THE HYSTERIZATION OF DISCOURSE

KNOWLEDGE AND TRUTH

THE HALF-SAID

ENIGMA, CITATION, INTERPRETATION



These four formulas are useful to have here as a reference.

Those of you present at my first seminar heard my reminder of the formula that the signifier, as distinct from the sign, is what represents a subject for another signifier. Since there is no suggestion that the other signifier knows anything about the matter, it is clear that it is not a question of a representation but of a representative.

As a consequence, on that same occasion, I thought I would use it to illustrate what I have called the master's discourse.

If the master's discourse can be seen as reduced to a single signifier, this implies that it represents something. Calling it "something" is already saying too much. It represents x, which is precisely what is there to be clarified in the matter.

In effect, there is no indication of how the master might impose his will. That consent is necessary is not in doubt, and the fact that in this instance Hegel can do no more than refer to death as the signifier of the absolute 32 master, is, on this occasion, a sign—a sign that nothing is resolved by this pseudo-origin. In fact, for it to continue it would only be demonstrated that the master is the master if he were to be resuscitated, that is, if he had actually been put to the test. As for the slave, it's the same thing—he has, precisely, declined to confront it.

The enigma of the master's function does not therefore reveal itself immediately. I will point out, because it is already on our path—a path that we do not have to pretend we have discovered, and which is not that of the theory of the unconscious—that it is not at all self-evident that all knowledge, by virtue of being knowledge, is known as knowledge.[1]

What we discover in even the slightest bit of psychoanalytic experience is, indeed, of the order of knowledge [savoir], S_1, and not of acquaintance [connaissance] or representation. It is very precisely a question of something that links one signifier, S_1, to another signifier, S_2, in a relationship of reason.

These are fairly pulverizing terms, I would say, if in using this metaphor I can get you to see the connotation that should be placed, on this occasion, on the term "knowledge."

Nevertheless, the foundation of what is known, of what is quietly articulated as the little master, as the ego, as he who knows a bit about it, resides in such a relation as this and, precisely, insofar as it is not known.

All the same I do notice from time to time that this breaks down. Here we have the eruption of the entire phase of lapses and stumblings in which the unconscious is revealed. But it is much better and goes much further than in the light of analytic experience.

We allow ourselves to read a biography when we have the means to do so, when we have enough documents for it to be attested what a life believes, what it believed it was as destiny, step by step, indeed in certain circumstances even how it believed it has concluded this destiny.

Nevertheless, in light of this notion that it is not certain that knowledge is known, it does not seem impossible that we might be able to read at what level of unconscious knowledge the work has been carried out that delivers what is effectively the truth of everything that has been believed to be.

33 Operating on the schema of the discourse of the big M, let us say it is, invisibly, the slave's labor, the labor that constitutes a non-revealed unconscious, that reveals whether that life is worth speaking about—that which, out of truths, out of true truths, has brought forth so many detours, fictions, and errors.

Knowledge, then, is placed in the center, in the dock, by psychoanalytic experience. This fact alone imposes on us a duty to question, which has no reason to limit its field. In short, the idea that knowledge can, in any way or at any time, even as a hope for the future, form a closed whole—now there's something that didn't have to wait for psychoanalysis for it to appear questionable.

Perhaps this doubting was approached from a bit low down where the skeptics were concerned. I am speaking of those who adopted this name at the time this doubting formed a school, something that we no longer have anything but a very feeble idea of. But, after all, would that be worth it, what do we know about it? What do we know about this on the basis of what has remained for us from the skeptics? Perhaps it's better for us not to pass judgment. Concerning their own knowledge perhaps we only have what others were able to gather from them, others who did not know where their skeptical formulas that radically questioned all knowledge, and a fortiori the totalization of knowledge, were starting from.

What is well designed to show how little impact the schools carry is the fact that the idea that knowledge can make a whole is, if I may say so, immanent to the political as such. This has been known for a long time. The imaginary idea of the whole that is given by the body, as drawing on the good form of satisfaction, on what, ultimately, forms a sphere, has always been used in politics by the party of political preaching. What is more beautiful, but also what is less open? What better resembles closure of satisfaction?

We have to struggle against the collusion of this image with the idea of satisfaction whenever we encounter anything that forms a knot in the work in question, which is the work of bringing things to light via the paths of the unconscious. It is the obstacle, the limit, or rather it's the hard road on which we lose our bearings, and where we find ourselves blocked.

It is odd to observe that a doctrine such as Marx's whose articulation onto the function of struggle, the class struggle, which he instituted has not prevented it from giving birth to what for the moment is, indeed, the same problem that confronts us all, namely the persistence of a master's discourse.

To be sure, the present one does not have the structure of the old, in the sense in which the old is installed in the place indicated under this big M. 34
The present one is installed in the place on the left, the one capped by the U. I will tell you why. What occupies the place there, which we will provisionally call dominant, is this S_2, which is specified as being, not knowledge of everything [savoir de tout]—we've not got to that point yet—but all-knowing [tout-savoir]. Understand this as what is affirmed as being nothing other than knowledge, which in ordinary language is called the bureaucracy. It cannot be said that there are no problems created there.

In my opening remarks three weeks ago we began with the fact that in the initial status of the master's discourse knowledge is on the side of the slave. And I thought I could indicate, without being in a position to develop it last time owing to a minor inconvenience I regret, that what happens between the classical master's discourse and that of the modern master, whom we call capitalist, is a modification in the place of knowledge. I even thought it possible to go so far as to say that the philosophical tradition has some responsibility for this transmutation.

Consequently, because the proletarian has been dispossessed of something—this is before communal property, of course—he finds himself characterizable by this term "dispossessed," which justifies both the attempt at and the success of revolution.

Is it not evident that what is restituted to him is not necessarily his own share? Capitalist exploitation effectively frustrates him of his knowledge by rendering it useless. What, in a type of subversion, gets returned to him is something different—master's knowledge. And this is why all he has done is change masters.

What remains, in effect, is the essence of the master, namely, that he does not know what he wants.

There you have what constitutes the true structure of the master's discourse. The slave knows many things, but what he knows even better still is what the master wants, even if the master does not know it himself, which is the usual case, for otherwise he would not be a master. The slave knows what it is, and that's what his function as slave is. This is also why it works, since, indeed, it has worked for quite a while.

The fact that all-knowing has moved into the place of the master is something that does not throw light on it, but rather makes a little bit more obscure what is at issue, namely, truth. How does it come about that there is a master's signifier in this place? For this is well and truly the S_2 of the 35 master, revealing as it does the bare bones of how things stand under the new tyranny of knowledge. This is what makes it impossible that in this place, over the course of the movement of history, as we were perhaps hoping, the nature of truth might appear.

Now the sign of truth is somewhere else. It is to be produced by what has come to be substituted for the ancient slave, that is, by those who are themselves products, as we say, consumables every bit as much as the others. "Consumer society," we say. "Human material," as it was called at one stage—to the applause of some who thought there was something tender in this.

It was worth highlighting this, since what equally concerns us now is to question what is at issue in the psychoanalytic act.

I won't be taking this up at the level at which I had hoped to bring things to completion two years ago, which was left interrupted, concerning the act by which the psychoanalyst grounds himself, is instituted as such.[2] I will be taking it up at the level of the analyst's interventions, once [analytic] experience has been instituted within its precise limits.

If there is knowledge that is not known, as I have already said, it is instituted at the level of S_2, which is the one I call the other signifier. This other signifier is not alone. The stomach of the Other, the big Other, is full of them. This stomach is like some monstrous Trojan horse that provides the foundations for the fantasy of a totality-knowledge [savoir-totalité]. It is, however, clear that its function entails that something comes and strikes it from without, otherwise nothing will ever emerge from it. And Troy will never be taken.

What does the analyst institute?

I hear a lot said about the discourse of psychoanalysis, as if this actually meant something. If we characterize a discourse by focusing on what is dominant in it, then the analyst's discourse exists, and this is not to be confused with the psychoanalyzing discourse, with the discourse effectively engaged in in the analytic experience. What the analyst establishes as analytic experience can be put simply—it's the hysterization of discourse. In other words, it is the structural introduction, under artificial conditions, of 36 the hysteric's discourse, the one that is indicated here by a capital H.

I tried to point this out last year by saying that this discourse exists, and that it would exist whatever the circumstances, whether there was psychoanalysis or not. I expressed it in a figurative way, giving it its most common support, the one from which the major experience has issued for us, namely the detour, the zigzag lines, on which this misunderstanding that sexual relations [rapports] constitute in the human species rests.

Since we have signifiers, we must understand one another, and this is precisely why we don't understand one another. Signifiers are not made for sexual relations. Once the human being is speaking, it's stuffed, it's the end of this perfection, this harmony, in copulation—which in any case is impossible to find anywhere in nature. Nature presents an infinite number of species of it, which, moreover, for the majority do not include any copulation. This shows how little it is part of nature's intentions that this form a whole, a sphere.

In any case, one thing is certain—if for man it works out more or less okay, it's due to a trick that makes it possible, by first of all making it insoluble.

This is what the hysteric's discourse means, industrious as she is. In saying "she," we are making the hysteric a woman, but this is not her privilege alone. Many men get themselves analyzed who, by this fact alone, are obliged to pass through the hysteric's discourse, since this is the law, the rule of the game. It is a matter of knowing what one deduces from this concerning the relations between men and women.

We therefore see the hysteric fabricate a man as best she can—a man who would be animated by the desire to know.

I raised this issue in my last seminar. We can observe that historically the master has slowly defrauded the slave of his knowledge and turned it into the master's knowledge. But what remains a mystery is how the desire to do this could have arisen for him. Desire, if you take my word on this, he can easily do without, since the slave satisfies him even before he himself knows what he might desire.

This is the point my reflections might have got to last time if this charming thing had not emerged from the real—I am informed that it is the real of decolonization. He was apparently a patient from a hospital, a supporter 37 of ours from the former Algeria and billeted here. As you can see, a charming romp, owing to which I won't know, at least not for sometime, for I have to move on, what kinship I place between the philosophical discourse and the hysteric's discourse, since it seems that it is the philosophical discourse that has inspired the master with the desire to know. What can the hysteria in question here be? There is a domain here that must not be spoiled. If there is anyone whose thinking loves to run on ahead of the speaker, they will find an opportunity here to exercise their talent. I assure them that to me it seems to be a promising path.

Be that as it may, so as to provide a formula that is more extensive than one that limits it to relations between man and woman, let's say that if we just read what I have inscribed here concerning the hysteric's discourse, we still don't know yet what this $ is. But if it concerns her discourse, and if it's this discourse that brings it about that there is a man motivated [animé] by the desire to know, it is because it is a matter of knowing . . . what? Of knowing at what price she herself is this person who speaks. For, qua object a, she is the fall, the fallen object, fallen as an effect of discourse, which in turn is always broken at some point.

What hysterics ultimately want one to know is that language runs off the rails concerning the magnitude of what she as woman is capable of revealing concerning jouissance. But this is not what matters to the hysteric. What matters to her is that that other called a man know what a precious object she becomes in this context of discourse.

Isn't this, after all, the very basis of analytic experience? If I say that it gives the other as subject the dominant place in the hysteric's discourse, it hystericizes his discourse, it turns him into this subject who is asked to abandon every other reference than to the four walls that surround him and to produce signifiers that constitute this free association that is, in a word, master of the field.

How could saying no-matter-what lead anywhere, unless it was determined that there is nothing in the random production of signifiers that, simply because it involves signifiers, does not bear upon this knowledge that is not known, and which is really what is doing the work?

The only thing is that there is no reason why he should not come to know a bit more about it. If the analyst doesn't speak, what might become of this swarming production of S_1s? Many things, surely.

The analyst who listens is able to record many things. With what your 38 average person today can state, if he pays no attention to anything, one can compile the equivalent of a small encyclopedia. This would generate an enormous number of keys, were it to be recorded. Afterward one could even construct a little electronic machine, get one made. And this is moreover the idea that some people can have—they construct an electronic machine so that the analyst only has to pull out a ticket that will give them their answer.

Let's see what is at work here in the analyst's discourse. It is he, the analyst, who is the master. In what form? This is what I shall have to reserve for our subsequent meetings. Why in the form of object a?

It's on his side that there is S_2, that there is knowledge—whether he acquires this knowledge through listening to his analysand, or whether it is already acquired, locatable knowledge, which at a certain level can be limited to analytic know-how.

The only thing is that what has to be understood about this schema—as was already indicated when in the master's discourse S_2 was put in the slave's place, and when in the modernized master's discourse it was then put in the master's place—is that the knowledge is not the same.

There in the last discourse on the right, what place is it in? It is in the place that in the master's discourse Hegel, the most sublime of hysterics, designates for us as being that of truth.

We cannot say, in effect, that The Phenomenology of Spirit consists of starting from the so-called Selbstbewusstsein grasped at the most immediate level of sensation, thus implying that all knowledge is known from the outset. What would be the point of all this phenomenology if it were not a question of something else?

It's just that what I am calling the hysteria of this discourse stems precisely from the fact that the discourse eludes the distinction that would enable one to perceive the fact that if this historical machine, which is in fact only the progress of the schools and nothing more, ever did culminate in absolute knowledge, it would only be to mark the annulment, the failure, the disappearance at the conclusion of the only thing that motivates the function of knowledge—its dialectic with jouissance. Absolute knowledge is supposed to be the abolition of this conclusion, purely and simply.

What does the position of S_2 in the place of truth offer us now?

What is truth as knowledge? It can be put like this: How can we know without knowing?

It's an enigma. This is one response—it's an enigma—among other examples. And I will give you a second one.

The two have the same characteristic, which is a property of truth—truth can only ever be said by halves. Our dear truth, from the imagery of Epinal, emerging from a well is only ever a body.[3]

In Italy, at one of the lectures I had been asked to give, I don't know why, and which I went about in a mediocre way, I know, I mentioned the Chimera, in which precisely the original characteristic of the hysteric's discourse is incarnated. And the Chimera put an enigma to Oedipus the man who perhaps already had a complex, but certainly not the one he gave his name to. He replied in a particular way, and that was how he became Oedipus.

There could have been many other replies to what the Chimera asked him. For example, he might have said, "Two feet, three feet, four feet—that's Lacan's schema." That would have produced quite a different result. He could also have said, "It's a man, a man as a baby. As a baby he starts out on four feet. He walks on two, he acquires a third, and instantly he flies as straight as an arrow into his mother's stomach." That's in effect what one calls, rightly, the Oedipus complex.

I think you can see what the function of the enigma means—it's a half-said [mi-dire], just as the Chimera appears as a half body, with the risk of disappearing altogether once the solution has been found.

Knowledge as truth—this defines what the structure of what we call an interpretation must be.

If I insisted at length on the difference in level between the utterance [énonciation] and the statement [énoncé], it was so that the function of the enigma would make sense. An enigma is most likely that, an utterance. I charge you with the task of making it into a statement. Sort that out as best you can—as Oedipus did—and you will bear the consequences. That is what is at issue in an enigma.

But there is something else, rarely thought of, that I have touched upon, 40 that I have raised from time to time, but frankly, it concerned me so much that it was not easy for me to speak freely about it. It's what we call a citation.

What does a citation consist in? In the course of a text where you are making more or less good progress, if you happen to be in the right places of the class struggle, all of a sudden you will cite Marx, and you will add, "Marx said." If you are an analyst you will cite Freud and you will add, "Freud said." This is fundamental.

An enigma is an utterance—you do what you can about the statement. A citation is like this. I make a statement, and for the remainder, there is the solid support you will find in the author's name for which I hand responsibility back to you. This is how it is, and it has nothing to do with the more or less shaky status of the author's function.

When one cites Marx or Freud—I haven't chosen these names by chance—one does so as a function of the part the supposed reader takes in a discourse. The citation is in its own way also a half-said. It is a statement about which someone is indicating to you that it is admissible only insofar as you already participate in a certain structured discourse at the level of the fundamental structures that are there on the blackboard. This is the one point—could I have explained it before now?—that makes it the case that the citation, the fact that one cites an author or not, can have second-order importance. I am going to get you to understand this and I hope that you will not take this the wrong way, because it's a familiar example.

Suppose that at a second moment someone cites a sentence indicating where it comes from—the author's name, Mr. Ricoeur, for instance.[4] Suppose that someone cites the same sentence, and that they put it in my name. This can definitely not have the same sense in the two cases. I hope I have made you feel how things are with what I am calling a citation.

Well then, it is these two registers that, insofar as they partake of the half-said, give the medium—and, if I can put it like this, the heading—under which interpretation intervenes.

Interpretation—those who make use of it are aware of this—is often established through an enigma. It is an enigma that is gathered as far as possible from the threads of the psychoanalysand's discourse, which you, the interpreter, can in no way complete on your own, and cannot consider 41 to be an avowal without lying. It is a citation that is sometimes taken from the very same text, on the other hand, from a given statement—such as the one that can pass for an avowal, provided only that you connect it to the whole context. But you are thereby appealing to whoever is its author.

What is striking, in effect, in this institution of the analytic discourse, which is the mainspring of the transference, is not, as some have thought they have heard me say, that the analyst is the one who is given the function of the subject supposed to know. If speech is so freely given to the psychoanalysand—this is precisely how he receives this freedom—it's because we recognize that he may speak as a master, that is, as a birdbrain, but that this will not give results that are as good as in the case of a real master, since it's supposed to lead to knowledge. This is knowledge of which he who is prepared, in advance, to be the product of the psychoanalysand's cogitations, that is, the psychoanalyst, makes himself the underwriter [gage], the hostage—insofar as, as this product, he is in the end destined to become a loss, to be eliminated from the process.

What does it mean to say that he may assume this place which at the level of the master's discourse is that of the master? Already in the simple functioning of the relations between master and slave, it is clear that the master's desire is the Other's desire, since it's this desire that the slave anticipates.

It's another question to ask what the analyst is taking the place of when he unleashes the movement that invests the subject supposed to know—a subject who, by being recognized as such, is, with regard to the analyst, ready in advance for what is called the transference.

To be sure, it is only too easy to detect here a shadow of satisfaction at being recognized. This is not what is essential, if one supposes that he, the subject, knows what he is doing any better than hysterics do, for whom it is the truth of their conduct, but not at all their very being.

The analyst makes himself the cause of the analysand's desire. What does this strange notion mean? Do we have to regard it as an accident, as a historical emergence, that has appeared in the world for the first time?

Anticipating the continuation of a path that will perhaps take us down a long detour, I will just indicate that this function has already appeared, and that it is not for nothing that Freud had a liking for resorting to so many Presocratics, Empedocles among others.

42 Since I am aware that this amphitheater is occupied at two o'clock, from now on I shall finish at a quarter-to. Let's meet again the second Wednesday of January.

I have been given red chalk, very red chalk. Red on black—it is not obvious that it is going to be legible.

These are not new formulas, since I already wrote them up on the blackboard last time.

They are useful to have present there because—as simple as they are, so simple to deduce one from one another since it's just a matter of their circular permutation with the terms remaining in the same order—it just so happens that our powers of mental representation are not able to compensate for whether they are written on the blackboard or not.

We shall therefore continue what I am doing here, where "here" is always at the same time, whether here or somewhere else, Wednesday at half-past twelve for the last seventeen years.

It's worth mentioning this again at a time when everybody is rejoicing at entering a new decade. I would instead turn it into an opportunity for looking back over what the previous one has given me.

Ten years ago two of my students presented something that came out of Lacanian theses under the title "l'Inconscient, étude psychanalytique."[1] 44

[1] The article, by Jean Laplanche and Serge Leclaire, appeared in Henri Ey, ed., L'Inconscient (Paris: Desclée de Brouwer, 1966) and appeared in English as "The Unconscious: A Psychoanalytic Study," Yale French Studies 48 (1972): 118–75.

This was brought about by what one can call the efforts of a prince. A prince is the only person capable of a liberal act, if one understands a liberal act to mean an arbitrary act, allowing also that "arbitrary" means not governed by any necessity. There was no necessity urging the prince, my friend Henri Ey, in one direction or another on this point. He placed the unconscious on the agenda at a certain conference, that of Bonneval, and entrusted the composition of it, at least in part, to two of my students.

In some ways this work is considered definitive. And, to be truthful, not without reason. It is indeed definitive in the way in which these two, my students, thought they might explain some of what I was putting forward on an interesting topic, since it was about nothing less than the unconscious, that is, that from which at the outset my teaching took wing, and explain it to a certain group.

This group was characterized by having been given orders of some sort concerning what I was saying. The interest they took in it was manifested in effect by something that I translated recently in a small preface as "forbidden to anyone under fifty." It was 1960, don't forget, and we were a long way away—are we any closer? that's the question—from challenging authority—challenging, among other things, the authority of knowledge. The upshot was that this prohibition, proffered in strange characters—one of them rendered it comparable to a sort of monopoly, a monopoly on knowledge—this prohibition was observed, purely and simply.

This is to tell you what the task was that was proposed to the people who had been kind enough to take it on—it was the task of having to explain to the ears in question something that was strictly speaking unprecedented.

How did they go about it? It is not too late for me to take stock of this now, especially since there was no question of my doing so at the time, for the reason that it was already quite a lot to see this brought into play for ears that were totally uninformed, that had picked up not even the slightest of what I had been able to develop over a period of seven years. It was obviously not the moment, with respect to the very people who had dedicated themselves to this work of deciphering, to contribute anything at all that might have given the impression that there was anything there to be restated. Moreover, there were many excellent elements in it.

This point arises, then, apropos of a thesis, a recent thesis, which, good God, was produced at the frontier of the French-speaking region, there where they struggle valiantly to maintain their rights. In Louvain someone has written a thesis on what they have called, perhaps improperly, my work.[2]

Let's not forget that this thesis is an academic thesis, and, at the very least, what emerges is that my work lends itself poorly to that. Indeed this is why it is not unfavorable, at the head of any such proposition by a university thesis, to situate the extent of the contribution that what was already academic makes to serving as the vehicle of the said work, still in inverted commas. This is also why one of the authors of this Bonneval report is singled out there, and in a way that made me unable to observe in my preface that a division has to be made between what is possibly a translation of what I state and what I have strictly speaking said.

In this little preface I did for this thesis that is going to appear in Brussels, and it is obvious that a preface by me will lighten its wings, I am obliged to note—this is its one useful purpose—that it is not the same thing to say that the unconscious is the condition of language as it is to say that language is the condition of the unconscious.

Language is the condition of the unconscious—that's what I say. The way in which one translates it stems from reasons which, to be sure, could, in their detail, be altogether activated by a strictly academic motive—and this would certainly go a long way, and will perhaps take you far enough for this year. From a strictly academic motive, I say, flows the fact that the person who has translated me, by virtue of having a background in the style, in the form of imposition of the university discourse, cannot do anything other, whether he believes he is commenting on me or not, than reverse my formula, that is, give it a significance that, it has to be said, is strictly contrary to the truth, without even any homology at all with what I claim.

Surely, the difficulty endemic to translating me into academic language will also blight anyone who, for whatever reason, tries their hand at it, and in truth the author of the thesis I am speaking about was motivated by the 46 best of qualifications, that of an immense good will. This thesis, then, that is going to be published in Brussels retains its value nonetheless, its value as an example in itself, its value also as an example because of what it promotes to the level of distortion, in some way an obligatory one, of a translation into the university discourse of something that has its own laws.

I have to unravel these laws. They are the ones that claim to give at least the conditions of a properly psychoanalytic discourse. Of course, this remains subject to the fact that, as I stressed last year, because I am stating this from high up here on a podium there is in effect a risk of error, an element of refraction, which means that in some respects it will fall under the influence of the university discourse. There is something here that stems from something fundamentally off balance.

To be sure, in no way am I identifying with a certain position. I assure you that whenever I come here to speak it is certainly not to speak about just anything, nor is it a question of "What am I going to tell them this time?" I have no role to play in this respect, in the sense in which the function of anyone who teaches has to do with a role, with a place to occupy, which is, undeniably, a place that has a certain prestige. It is not this that I am asking of you, but rather something that is a kind of putting into order imposed on me by the fact that I have to submit this unraveling to this trial. I, like anyone else, would escape this putting into order if, before this sea of ears among which there is perhaps the odd critical pair, I didn't have to give some account, with this fearful possibility, of the path my actions are following with respect to the fact that there exists a psychoanalyst [qu'il y a du psychanalyste].

That is my situation. The status of this situation as such has so far not been settled in any appropriate way, unless by imitation, unless at the incitement, the semblance, of various other established situations. In the present case this results in timid selection practices, in a certain identification with a figure, in a form of conduct, indeed, in a human type whose form nothing seems to render obligatory, or again in a ritual, indeed in some other measure that, at a better time, a former time, I compared to that of a driving school, without moreover provoking any protest from anyone.[3] There was even someone among my students, very close at the time, who 47 remarked to me that this was, in reality, what was desired by everyone who was starting an analytic career—to receive one's driving license, as in a driving school, according to paths that were mapped out well in advance and that included the same type of examination.

It is certainly notable—I mean, worth noting—that after ten years I have arrived all the same at spelling out a way that is the one I call the discourse of this position of psychoanalyst. Let's say its hypothetical discourse, since this is also what is being put to you this year for your examination. Namely—what is the structure of this discourse?

I have managed to state the psychoanalyst's position in the following terms. I have said that it is substantially made from the object a.

In the way I characterize the structure of discourse, insofar as it interests us and, let's say, insofar as it is taken at the radical level it has attained for the psychoanalytic discourse, this position is, substantially, that of the object a, insofar as this object a designates precisely what presents itself as the most opaque in the effects of discourse, as having been misrecognized for a long time, and yet is essential. It is question of an effect of discourse that produces a reject. I shall shortly try to indicate its place and its function.

That, then, is how it is, substantially, with the psychoanalyst's position. But this object stands out for another reason, which is that it occupies the place from which the discourse is ordered, from which, if I can put it in these terms, the dominant is issued.

You are well aware of the reservation with which this is used. Saying "the dominant" means exactly that by which I ultimately designate each of the structures of these discourses so as to distinguish them from one another, naming them differently, the university, the master's, the hysteric's and the analyst's, according to the various positions of the radical terms. Let's say that because I am unable to give a different value to this term for the moment I will call "dominant" what I use to name these discourses.

This word "dominant" does not imply dominance, in the sense in which this dominance is supposed to be, and this is not certain, specific to the master's discourse. Let's say that one can give, for example, different sub- 48 stances to this dominant according to the discourse.

Take the dominant in the master's discourse, whose place is occupied by S_1. If we called it "the law" we would be doing something that has great subjective value and that would not fail to open the door to a number of interesting observations. It is certain, for example, that the law—I mean the law as articulated, that very law within whose walls we are finding shelter, this law [cette loi] that constitutes the law [le droit]—must certainly not be taken as a homonym for what may be spoken of elsewhere under the heading of justice. On the contrary, the ambiguity and the trappings that this law adopts by virtue of the fact that it derives its authority from justice is very precisely a point on which our discourse can perhaps give a better sense of where its real resources are, I mean those that make the ambiguity possible and bring it about that the law remains something that is, first and foremost, inscribed in the structure. There are not thirty-six ways to make laws, whether motivated by good intentions, justice, or not, for there are perhaps laws of structure that make it the case that the law will always be the law located in this place that I am calling dominant in the master's discourse.

At the level of the hysteric's discourse it is clear that we see this dominant appear in the form of a symptom. It is around the symptom that the hysteric's discourse is situated and ordered.

This is an opportunity for us to make an observation. If this place remains the same, and if in a particular discourse this place is that of the symptom, this will lead us to wonder whether the same place is that of the symptom when it is in use in another discourse. This is, in fact, what we can see in our own time—the law is being called into question as a symptom.

And saying that this appears to us in the light of our own time is not sufficient to explain it.

I said before how it is that this same dominant place can be occupied when it is a question of the analyst. The analyst himself here has to represent, in some way, the discourse's reject-producing effect [effet de rejet], that is, the object a.

Is this to say that where the university discourse is concerned it will also be easy for us to characterize the said dominant place? What other name can we give it, one that would enter into this sort of equivalence that, as I have just been suggesting, exists at least at the level of a question, between 49 the law, the symptom, and even the reject insofar as it is the place the analyst is destined for in the psychoanalytic act.

The difficulty we face in giving a reply to what constitutes the essence, the dominant, in the university discourse has to make us aware of something in what is our research—for what I am outlining in your presence are the very paths over which, when I deliberate, my thoughts drift and wander before finding any points of certainty. It is here, then, that the idea might occur to us to look for what would appear altogether certain, as certain as the symptom where hysteria is concerned, in each of these discourses, so as to designate at least one of its places.

I have already shown you that in the master's discourse the a is precisely identifiable with what the thought of a worker, Marx's, produced, namely what was, symbolically and really, the function of surplus value. We would therefore already be faced with two terms and, thereby, we would only need to modify them slightly, give them a freer translation, in order to transpose them into other registers. The following suggestion presents itself here—since there are four places to characterize, perhaps each of the four permutations could, from within itself, yield the place that is the most prominent, making a step forward in an order of discovery that is nothing other than what is called structure.

In whatever way you put such an idea to the test, it will consequently lead you to put your finger on the following, which will perhaps not occur to you at first sight.

Independently of this place that, I am suggesting, may be the one that interests us, try, in each of these figures of discourse, as we'll call them, to get yourself simply to choose a different place, defined as a function of the terms "above," "below," "right," "left." You will not be able to get any of the places occupied by a different letter, no matter how you go about it.

Try, in the opposite direction, making it a condition of the game to choose a different letter in each of these four formulas. You won't be able to get any of the letters to occupy a different place.

Have a go. It is very easy to do it on a piece of paper, as it is if you use this little grid that is called a matrix. With such a limited number of combinations, the specimen drawing is immediately sufficient to illustrate the thing in a perfectly obvious way. 50

There is here a certain signifying connection, which one can suppose is altogether radical. This simple fact presents us with an opportunity to illustrate what structure is. In supposing the formalization of discourse and in granting oneself some rules within this formalization that are destined to put it to the test, we encounter an element of impossibility. This is what is at the base, the root, of an effect of structure.

And this is what interests us, in the structure, at the level of analytic experience. And this is not at all because we would here be at what, at least in its pretentions, is an already higher degree of elaboration, but from the outset.

Why are we caught up in these manipulations of the signifier and its possible articulations? It is because it is in the material of psychoanalysis.

I mean that it is in what occurred to a mind as little accustomed to this sort of development as a Freud could be, given the training we know he received, in the paraphysical sciences and in a physiology armed with the first steps in physics and with thermodynamics in particular.

What Freud, in following the vein, the thread of his experience, was led to formulate at a second stage in his declarations is of even greater importance since after all nothing seems to have made it necessary at the first stage, which was that of articulating the unconscious.

The unconscious makes it possible to situate desire. That is the meaning of the first, already quite complete, step Freud took, which was not merely implied but in fact fully articulated and developed in the Traumdeutung. This is already acquired knowledge when, at a second stage that opens with Beyond the Pleasure Principle, he states that we must take into account this function called what?—repetition.

What is repetition? Read Freud's text and see what he says.

What necessitates repetition is jouissance, a term specifically referred to. 51
It is because there is a search for jouissance as repetition that the following is produced, which is in play at this stage of the Freudian breakthrough—what interests us qua repetition, and which is registered with a dialectic of jouissance, is properly speaking what goes against life. It is at the level of repetition that Freud sees himself constrained, in some way, by virtue of the very structure of discourse, to spell out the death instinct.

This is hyperbole, and a fabulous and, in fact, scandalous extrapolation for anyone who takes the identification of the unconscious with instinct literally. It means that repetition is not only a function of the cycles that life consists of, cycles of need and satisfaction, but of something else as well. It is a function of a cycle that embraces the disappearance of this life as such, which is the return to the inanimate.

The inanimate. A point on the horizon, an ideal point, a point that's off the map, but one whose meaning reveals itself to a structural analysis. It is revealed perfectly by the fact of jouissance.

One only has to begin with the pleasure principle, which is nothing other than the principle of least tension, of the minimum tension that needs to be maintained for life to subsist. This demonstrates that in itself jouissance overruns it, and that what the pleasure principle maintains is a limit with respect to jouissance.

As everything in the facts, in clinical experience, indicates to us, repetition is based on the return of jouissance. And what, in this connection, is well spelled out by Freud himself is that, in this very repetition, something is produced that is a defect, a failure.

At the time, here, I pointed out the kinship with remarks by Kierkegaard.[4] By virtue of being expressed and as such repeated, of being marked by repetition, what is repeated cannot be anything other, in relation to what it repeats, than a loss. A loss of whatever you like, a loss of momentum—there is something that is a loss. Right from the outset, right from the elaboration that I am summarizing here, Freud insists on this loss—in repetition itself there is a reduction in jouissance.

This is where the function of the lost object originates in Freudian discourse. And there is really no need to remind you that it is explicitly around 52 masochism, conceived only in the dimension of the search for this ruinous jouissance, that Freud's entire text revolves.

Now, what Lacan contributes follows. It concerns this repetition, this identification of jouissance. Here I will borrow something from Freud's text and give it a sense that is not highlighted there, namely, the function of the unary trait, which is the function of the simplest form of mark, which properly speaking is the origin of the signifier. And I propose—this cannot be seen in Freud's text, but it can in no way be brushed aside, avoided, rejected, by the psychoanalyst—that everything that interests us analysts as knowledge originates in the unary trait.

Psychoanalysis in effect takes as its point of departure a turning point, one at which knowledge is purified, if I may put it like this, of everything that may create ambiguity over natural knowledge, that may be taken for an unknown something that would be able to guide us in the world around us with the help of unknown sensors which, in us, would know how to orientate us in the world from birth.

Not, to be sure, that there is nothing like this. When a learned psychologist writes in our time—I mean not so long ago, forty or fifty years—something called Sensation, guide de vie, he is not saying anything absurd, of course not.[5] But if he is able to declare it in this way, it is precisely because the entire evolution of a science makes us see that there is no co-naturality between this sensation and what, by its means, can be born out of the apprehension of a supposed world. If a properly scientific construction, the examination of the senses of sight, even of hearing, demonstrate anything to us at all, it is something that we should accept as it is, with, exactly, the coefficient of fabrication [facticité] with which it presents itself. In the light spectrum there is an ultraviolet that we have no perception of—and why wouldn't we have any? At the other, infrared end it's the same. The same goes for the ear—there are sounds that we stop hearing, and no one can tell very well why it stops there rather than further on.

As a matter of fact, through being illuminated in this way, nothing else is graspable than the fact that there are filters, and that we are able to manage with these filters. The function, they say, creates the organ. On the contrary, one makes use of the organ as best one can.

This is something about which, concerning the mechanisms of thought, an entire philosophical tradition has sought to reason—a tradition that has tried, by paths you are familiar with, by means of an account of what hap- 53 pens at the level of abstraction, of generalization, to construct this thing, on the basis of a sort of reduction, filtering, on the nature of sensation regarded as foundational—Nihil fuerit in intellectu quod, etc.—this subject is deducible in the name of the subject of knowledge [connaissance].[6] This subject is constructible in a manner that now strikes us as so artificial, on the basis of vital systems, organs which it is not clear, in effect, how we could do without. Is this what is at issue in this signifying articulation in which these initial terms, which we are starting to spell out and tender here, can begin to play a role? These are the most elementary of the terms that, as I've already said, knot one signifier to another signifier, and which already have an effect in that this signifier is only manipulable in its definition insofar as the following makes sense—that it represents a subject, and nothing but a subject,

[5] Henri Piéron, The Sensations: Their Functions, Processes, and Mechanisms (New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1952).

[6] "Nihil est in intellectu quod non prius fuerit in sensu," or "Nothing is in the understanding that was not previously in the senses." The quotation comes from John Locke.

for another signifier. No, there is nothing in common between the subject of knowledge [connaissance] and the subject of the signifier.

There is no way of escaping this extraordinarily reduced formula that there is something underneath. But precisely, there is no term that we can designate this something by. It cannot be an etwas, it is simply an underneath, a subject, a hypokeimenon. Even for a thought so invested with the contemplation of the exigencies—primary and not at all constructed exigencies—of the idea of knowledge [connaissance], I mean Aristotle's thought, the logical approach alone, the fact alone that he introduced it into the circuit of knowledge, requires him to rigorously distinguish hypokeimenon from all ousia in itself, from anything that is essence.

The signifier becomes articulated, therefore, by representing a subject for another signifier. This is our starting point for giving meaning to this inaugural repetition that is repetition directed at jouissance.

At a certain level knowledge is dominated, articulated by purely formal necessities, the necessities of writing, and in our day this leads to a certain type of logic. Now, this type of knowledge to which we can give the support of an experience, the experience of modern logic, which is, in itself and above all, the manipulation of writing, is the same knowledge that is at work when it is a question of measuring the effect of repetition in the analytic clinic. In other words, knowledge that seems to us to be the most purified, 54 even though it is quite clear that we could in no way extract it from empiricism through purification, is this same knowledge that one finds has been introduced from the outset.

This knowledge here reveals its roots in the fact that in repetition, and in the form of the unary trait to begin with, it is found to be the means of jouissance—precisely insofar as jouissance goes beyond the limits imposed, under the term of pleasure, on the usual tensions of life.

What becomes evident from this formalism, to keep following Lacan, is, as we were saying just before, that there is a loss of jouissance. And it is in the place of this loss introduced by repetition that we see the function of the lost object emerge, of what I am calling the a. What does this impose on us? If not this formula that at the most elementary level, that of the imposition of the unary trait, knowledge at work produces, let's say, an entropy.

That's spelled e, n, t. You could write it a, n, t, h, this would be a nice play on words.[7]

This shouldn't astonish us. Are you unaware that, whatever the ingenuous hearts of engineers believe, energetics is nothing other than the network of signifiers overlaying the world?

I defy you to prove in any way that descending 500 meters with a weight of 80 kilos on your back and, once you have descended, going back up the 500 meters with it is zero, no work. Try it, have a go yourself, and you will find that you have proof of the contrary. But if you overlay signifiers, that is, if you enter the path of energetics, it is absolutely certain that there has been no work.

When the signifier is introduced as an apparatus of jouissance, we should thus not be surprised to see something related to entropy appear, since entropy is defined precisely once one has started to lay this apparatus of signifiers over the physical world.

Don't think I'm joking. Whenever you construct a factory somewhere, naturally you draw energy, you can even accumulate it. Well then, the apparatuses that have been installed so that these sorts of turbines function to the point where you can put energy in a bottle are built according to this same logic I am speaking about, namely the function of the signifier. Today, a machine has nothing to do with a tool. There is no genealogy between a 55 bucket and a turbine. The proof is that you can quite legitimately call a little drawing you've done on a piece of paper a machine. It takes hardly anything. It is simply enough that you have conductible ink for it to be a very effective machine. And why shouldn't it be conductible, since the mark in itself already conducts pleasure [volupté]?

If there is anything that analytic experience teaches us it is what concerns the world of fantasy. In fact, if it does not seem to have been explored prior to analysis, it's because no one knew how to extricate themselves from it except through recourse to the bizarre, to the anomaly, which serves as the basis for these terms, these names that pin down masochism this, sadism that. When we give these -isms we are at the level of zoology. But there is nevertheless something altogether radical, which is the association, in what is at the base, at the very root of fantasy, with this glory of the mark, if I can put it like this.

I am speaking of the mark on the skin, which, in this fantasy, inspires nothing other than a subject identifying itself as the object of jouissance. In the erotic practice I am alluding to, which, to give it its name in case anyone is hard of hearing, is flagellation, the enjoying [le jouir] adopts the very ambiguity by means of which it is at its level and no other that the equivalence between the gesture of making a mark and the body, object of jouissance, can be reached.

Whose jouissance? Is it the jouissance of whosoever carries what I am calling the glory of the mark? Is it certain that this means the Other's jouissance? Certainly, this is one of the ways in which the Other enters one's world, and assuredly, it is an irrefutable one. But the mark's affinity with jouissance of the body itself is precisely where it is indicated that it is only through jouissance, and jouissance alone, that the division distinguishing narcissism from the relation with the object is established.

There's no ambiguity here. It's at the level of Beyond the Pleasure Principle that Freud strongly indicates that what in the end gives the specular image of the apparatus of the ego its real support, its consistency, is that it is sustained within by this lost object, which it merely dresses up, by which jouissance is introduced into the dimension of the subject's being.

56 In effect, if jouissance is forbidden, then it is clear that it only comes into play by chance, an initial contingency, an accident. The living being that ticks over normally purrs along with pleasure. If jouissance is unusual, and if it is ratified by having the sanction of the unary trait and repetition, which henceforth institutes it as a mark—if this happens, it can only originate in a very minor variation in the sense of jouissance. These variations, after all, will never be extreme, not even in the practices I raised before.

We are not dealing with a transgression, an irruption into some forbidden field through the wearing away of vital regulatory apparatuses. In fact, it is only through this effect of entropy, through this wasting, that jouissance acquires a status and shows itself. This is why I initially introduced it by the term "Mehrlust," surplus jouissance. It is precisely through being perceived in the dimension of loss—something necessitates compensation, if I can put it like this, for what is initially a negative number—that this something that has come and struck, resonated on the walls of the bell, has created jouissance, jouissance that is to be repeated. Only the dimension of entropy gives body to the fact that there is surplus jouissance there to be recovered.

And this is the dimension in which work, knowledge at work, becomes necessary, insofar as, whether it knows it or not, it initially stems from the unary trait and, in its wake, from everything that can possibly be articulated as signifier. This is the basis on which this dimension of jouissance is instituted, which is so ambiguous in the speaking being who can also theorize and make a religion of living in apathy, and apathy is hedonism. He can indeed turn it into a religion, and yet we all know that as a group—Massenpsychologie is the title of one of Freud's writings, from the same period—what animates him, what preoccupies him, what makes of him an order of knowledge different from these harmonizing knowledges that link the Umwelt to the Innenwelt is the function of surplus jouissance as such.

This is the hollow, the gap that no doubt a number of objects initially come and fill—objects that, in some way, are adapted in advance, designed to be used as stoppers. This is no doubt where a classical analytic practice stops, with its emphasis upon these various terms, oral, anal, scopic, not to mention vocal. These are various names by which we can designate, as an 57 object, the a—but the a, as such, is strictly speaking what follows from the fact that, at its origin, knowledge is reduced to an articulation of signifiers.

This knowledge is a means of jouissance. And, I repeat, when it is at work, what it produces is entropy. This entropy, this point of loss, is the sole point, the sole regular point at which we have access to the nature of jouissance. This is what the effect the signifier has upon the fate of the speaking being translates into, culminates in, and is motivated by.

This has little to do with his speaking. It has to do with structure, which gets fitted out. The subject, who is called human, no doubt because he is only the humus of language, has only to speechify himself to its fittings.[8]

With something as simple as my four little signs, I was able before to get you to sense that we only have to place this unary trait in the company of another trait, S_2 after S_1, in order to situate, equally with licit signifiers, what its sense is and, on the other hand, the nature of its insertion into the Other's jouissance—this Other by virtue of which it is a means of jouissance.

This is where work begins. It is with knowledge as a means of jouissance that work that has a meaning, an obscure meaning, is produced. This obscure meaning is the meaning of truth.

No doubt, if I had not already been exploring these terms in various ways that enlighten us, I would certainly not have dared introduce them as I've done. But some work, a considerable amount of work, has already been accomplished.

When I speak of knowledge as having its initial locus in the master's discourse at the level of the slave, who apart from Hegel has shown that what the slave's work will yield is the master's truth? And, no doubt, the truth that refutes him. But, in truth, we are perhaps in a position to develop other forms of the schema for this discourse, and to perceive where the Hegelian construction gapes, remains gaping, and has been closed up in a forced way.

If there is one thing that our entire approach delimits, and that has surely been renewed by analytic experience, it is that the only way in which to evoke the truth is by indicating that it is only accessible through a half- 58 saying [mi-dire], that it cannot be said completely, for the reason that beyond this half there is nothing to say. That is all that can be said. Here, consequently, discourse is abolished. One isn't speaking of the unsayable, whatever the pleasure that this seems to give certain people.

It remains no less true that I illustrated this knot of the half-saying last time through indicating how one has to emphasize what is properly speaking the nature of interpretation, what I expressed as an utterance without a statement, as a statement with the utterance in reserve. I indicated that these were the axis points, the points of balance, the axes of gravity, specific to interpretation, from which our developments must profoundly renew the question of truth.

What is the love of truth? It's something that mocks the lack in being [manque à être] of truth. We could call this lack in being something else—the lack of forgetting, which reminds us of its existence in formations of the unconscious. This is nothing of the order of being, of a being that is in any way full. What is this indestructible desire Freud speaks of at the end of his Traumdeutung? What is this desire that nothing can change or deflect when everything changes? The lack of forgetting is the same thing as the lack in being, since being is nothing other than forgetting. The love of truth is the love of this weakness whose veil we have lifted, it's the love of what truth hides, which is called castration.

I should not need these reminders, which are in some way so bookish. It seems that it is among analysts, particularly among them, that in the name of these few taboo words with which their discourse is soiled one is never made aware of what truth is, what knowledge is, what impotence is.

It is upon this that everything that has to do with truth is constructed. That there is a love of weakness is no doubt the essence of love. As I have said, love is giving what one doesn't have, namely what might make good [réparer] this original weakness.

And this role—I don't know whether I should call it mystical or mystifying—which since the birth of time, in a certain vein, has been given to love is immediately conceivable, half open. This love that they call universal, brandished on a piece of paper so as to calm us, is precisely what we make into a veil, a veil of obstruction, over what is the truth.

59 What is asked of the psychoanalyst, and this was already in my discourse last time, is certainly not what emerges from this subject supposed to know on which, by hearing it a little bit askew, as one usually does, it has been thought possible to found the transference. I have often insisted on the fact that we are not supposed to know very much at all. What analysis establishes is this, which is quite the opposite. The analyst says to whoever is about to begin—"Away you go, say whatever, it will be marvelous." He is the one that the analyst institutes as subject supposed to know.

This is after all not in such bad faith, because in the present case the analyst cannot put his trust in any other person. And the transference is founded on the fact that there is this character who tells me—me, the poor bastard—to act as if I knew what it was all about. I can say anything whatever, it will always produce something. This doesn't happen to you every day. There is a lot there to cause the transference.

What defines an analyst? I have said it. I have always said right from the start, it's just that no one has ever understood anything, which moreover is natural, it's not my fault, that an analysis is what one expects from an analyst. But this "what one expects from an analyst"—we would obviously have to try to understand what it means.

It is very much there, just like that, within hand's reach—I nevertheless get the feeling, even now, that I am merely restating this—the work is mine, and the surplus pleasure is yours. What one expects from a psychoanalyst is, as I was saying last time, to get his knowledge to function in terms of truth. This is why he limits himself to a half-saying.

I said this last time, and I will have occasion to return to it, because it has consequences.

It is to the analyst and to him alone that this formula I have so often commented on, this "Wo es war, soll Ich werden," is addressed. If the analyst tries to occupy this place which determines his discourse at the top left, he is absolutely not there for himself. It is there where the surplus jouissance, the other's jouissance, was that I, as proffering the psychoanalytic act, must come.

At the level of structure we are trying to develop this year, the analytic discourse completes the three others, respectively named—I am recalling this for those of you who come here sporadically—the master's discourse, that of the hysteric, which today I've placed in the middle, and finally the discourse that interests us here to a high degree, since it is a question of the discourse situated as being that of the university.

But the fact that the analytic discourse completes the 90° displacement by which the three others are structured does not mean that it resolves them and enables one to pass to the other side. It doesn't resolve anything.

The inside does not explain the outside.[1] We are dealing with a relationship of weaving, of text—of fabric, if you like. It remains no less true that this material has a texture, that it captures something—not everything, to be sure, since language shows the limit of this word which only exists through language. It shows that even in the world of discourse nothing is everything, as I say—or better, that "everything" as such is self-refuting, founds itself, even, on having to be reduced in its employment.

This is by way of introduction to what will today form the object of an essential approach, with the aim of demonstrating what the other side, l'envers, is. Envers is assonant with vérité, "truth."

[1] "L'envers n'explique nul endroit." L'envers can mean "the lining," as in the lining of a jacket, and endroit "the outside." Thus, "The lining doesn't explain the outside."

In truth, something worth being supported right from the start is that "truth" is not a word to be handled outside propositional logic, where it is made into a value, reduced to the inscription, to the handling of a symbol, usually a capital T, its initial. This usage, as we shall see, is most particularly bereft of hope. This is what is salubrious about it.

Nevertheless, everywhere else, and notably for analysts—I do have to say this, and with reason—for women analysts, it provokes a curious shiver, of the same order as the one that has, for some time now, been pushing them to confuse analytic truth with revolution.

I have already spoken of the ambiguity of this term "revolution," which, in the use made of it in the mechanics of heavenly bodies, can mean return to the start. So much so that in certain respects what the analytic discourse, as I said initially, can accomplish with respect to the three other orders is situated in three other structures.

It is no accident that women are less enclosed than their partners in this cycle of discourses. Man, the male, the virile, such as we know him, is a creation of discourse—at least none of what is analyzable in him can be defined in any other way. The same cannot be said of woman. Nevertheless, no dialogue is possible unless it is situated at the level of discourse.

This is why, before she starts to shake, the woman animated by the revolutionary properties of analysis could tell herself that she will benefit much more than the man does from what we shall call a certain culture of discourse.

It is not that she has no gift for it, on the contrary. And once she becomes animated by it she becomes an eminent guide in this cycle. This is what defines the hysteric and this is why on the blackboard, breaking with the order of what I have been writing up there, I have placed her at the center.

It is, however, clearly not by chance that the word "truth" provokes this particular emotion in her.

Except that truth is not, in our context, easily accessible. Like certain birds that I used to be told about when I was little, you can only trap it by putting salt on its tail. This is not easy. My first reading book had as its first 63 text a story that was called The Story of Half a Chicken. It is true, that was what it was about. It is not a bird that is any easier to catch than others when the requirement is to put salt on its tail.

What I have been teaching, ever since I have been developing something about psychoanalysis, could well be called The Story of Half a Subject.

Where is the truth in this relationship between the story of half a chicken and the story of half a subject? It can be taken from two angles. One might say that the story in my first reading determined the development of my thought, as an academic thesis might put it. Or, from the point of view of the structure, the story of half a chicken could have represented, for the author who had written it, something in which there is some kind of presentiment, not of "sychanalisse" as it is said in Paris Peasant, but of the nature of the subject.[2]

What is clear is that there was also an image. The image of half a chicken was in profile, from its good side. You didn't see the other side, the cut one, the one where the truth probably was, since on the right-hand-side page you saw the half without the heart, but not without liver no doubt, in the two senses of the word.[3] What does that mean? It means that truth is hidden, but perhaps it is only absent.

This would settle everything if it were so. One would only have to know all that there is to know. After all, why not? When one says something there is no need to add that it is true.

An entire problematic of judgment turns on this. You know that Mr. Frege raises the question in the form of a horizontal stroke, and distinguishes it from how things are when one affirms that it is true, by putting a vertical stroke on the far left. Then it becomes an affirmation.[4]

However, what is it that is true? My God, it is what was said. What is it that was said? A sentence. But the only way of having a sentence supported is by signifiers, insofar as they do not involve objects. Unless, like a logician whose extremist views I will come to shortly, you claim that there are no objects, only pseudo-objects. As for us, we hold that signifiers are not concerned with objects but with sense.

64 The only subject of the sentence is the sense—thus this dialectic we started with, which we call the pas-de-sens, the no sense, with all the ambiguity of the word "pas."[5]

This begins with the non-sense forged by Husserl, "The green is one for." However, this may very well have a sense, if for instance it is about voting with green balls and red balls.

However, what leads us down the path where the nature of being derives from sense is that which has the most being. It is down this path, in any case, that the step-of-sense [pas-de-sens] has been taken of thinking that what has the most being cannot fail to exist.

Sense, if I may say so, is responsible for being. It does not even have any other sense. The only thing is that it was observed some time ago that this is insufficient for carrying the weight—the weight, precisely, of existence.

[3] The two senses are foie, "liver," and foi, "faith."

[4] See Begriffschrift, in Jean Van Heijenoort, ed., Frege and Gödel: Two Fundamental Texts in Mathematical Logic (Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1970).

[5] Pas-de-sens means both "no sense" and "the step of sense."

A curious thing that non-sense carries the weight. It grabs you by the stomach. And the discovery that Freud made is to have shown that this is what is exemplary about a witticism (mot d'esprit), a word with neither tip nor tail.

This doesn't make putting salt on its tail any easier. Precisely, the truth flies off. The truth flies off the very moment you no longer wanted to grab it.

Moreover, since it didn't have a tail, how could you have? Stupefaction and light.

As you will recall, a little story, a fairly dull one moreover, about responses over the Golden Calf (veau d'or) may suffice to wake up this calf that sleeps (veau qui dort) standing up. You can see then that it is, if I may say so, of hard gold (d'or dur).[6]

Enter Eluard's hard desire to endure (dur désir de durer) and the desire to sleep, which is indeed the greatest enigma, which no one seems to be aware of, that Freud proposes in the dream mechanism. Let's not forget it—"Wunsch zu schlafen," he says. He didn't say, "schlafen Bedürfnis," need to sleep, this is not what it's about. It's the Wunsch zu schlafen that determines the dream's operation.

It is curious that he complements this indication with the further one that a dream wakes you up just when it might let the truth drop, so that the only reason one wakes up is so as to continue dreaming—dreaming in the real or, to be more exact, in reality.

That is all very striking. It's striking because of a certain lack of sense, where truth, like nature, comes galloping back.[7] And even at such a gallop that it has scarcely crossed our field before it has already departed on the other side.

The absence I mentioned before has produced a curious contamination 65 in French. If we take the sans, "without," supposedly derived from the Latin sine, which is highly unlikely since its initial form was something like senz, we can see that the absentia, in the ablative, used in legal documents and which this term sans with neither head nor tail comes from—we have already produced this little word right from the start of what we have been stating today.

And so what? Senz and then sans—aren't we dealing with a puissance, a "power"? One quite different from this en puissance, "potentiality," of an imaginary virtuality, which is a power only through being deceptive. It is rather what of being there is in sense, which is to be taken otherwise than being full sense, which is rather what escapes being, as happens in so-called witticisms.[8]

[7] "Changez le naturel, il revient au galop." French proverb.

Just as, as we know, this always occurs in acts. In an act, of whatever kind, it is what escapes it that is important. And this is also the step that analysis has gone beyond, by introducing the bungled act, the parapraxis, as such, which is after all the only one that we know, with certainty, is always successful.

Around all this there is a play of litotes whose weight and emphasis I've tried to show you in what I am calling the "not-without." Anxiety is not without an object. We are not without a relationship with truth.

But is it certain that we should find it intus, within? Why not to one side? Heimlich, unheimlich—each of us, from our reading of Freud, has been able to recall what shelters in the ambiguity of this word which, through not being within and yet evokes it, accentuates precisely everything that is strange.

On this point languages themselves vary strangely. Have you noticed that "homeliness" in English means sans façon, without standing on ceremony? It is, however, just the same word as Heimlichkeit, but that doesn't have the same tone at all.

This is why sinnlos translates into English as "meaningless," that is, the same word which, in translating Unsinn, "nonsense," will give us non-sensé.

We all know that the ambiguity of the roots in English lend themselves to unusual avoidances. On the other hand, and in a way that is almost unique, English will call "without" the sans-avec étant dehors.[9]

66 Truth does in effect seem to be foreign to us, I mean our own truth. It is no doubt with us, but without concerning us to the point that one really wants to speak it.

All that can be said, and this is what I was saying before, is that we are not without it. A litotes, in short, of the fact that when we are within its reach we would happily do without it.

We go from "without" to "not-without," and from there to "without-past."[10]

[8] " . . . comme il arrive dans le mot justement dit d'esprit." Mot d'esprit, literally "word with mind or spirit," translates the German Witz, and is closer to the English "witticism" than "joke," by which it is translated in The Standard Edition of the Complete Psychological Works of Sigmund Freud (London: Hogarth Press, 1953–74), hereafter cited as SE.

[9] Lacan is referring to the fact that "without" (sans in French) is composed of "with" (avec) and "out" (dehors).

[10] sans, pas-sans, sans-passé. One can also hear s'en passer, "to do without."

Here I will make a little leap and move to the author who has given the most forceful formulation to what results from the enterprise of proposing that the only truth there is is inscribed in a proposition, and from articulating that which, in knowledge as such—knowledge being constituted on the basis of propositions—can in all strictness function as truth. That is to say, what results from articulating what, concerning whatever is proposed, can be said to be true and upheld as true.

I have in mind someone by the name of Wittgenstein who is, may I say, easy to read. Surely. Try him.

It requires that you know how to be content to move around in a world that is, strictly speaking, a world of cogitation without seeking any fruit in it, which is your bad habit. You are very keen on picking apples from an apple tree, even on gathering them from the ground. For you, anything is better than not gathering apples.

Dwelling for a time under this apple tree whose branches, I assure you, may suffice to capture your closest attention, provided you make an effort, will nevertheless have the characteristic that you will not be able to draw anything from it except the affirmation that nothing can be said to be true other than the agreement with a structure which I will not even situate, if I can place myself outside the shade of this apple tree for an instant, as logical, but, and the author puts this well, as grammatical.

For this author grammatical structure constitutes what he identifies with the world. Grammatical structure is the world. And all that is true is, in 67 short, a composite proposition comprising the totality of facts that constitute the world.

If we choose to introduce, into the set, the element of negation that enables it to be articulated, we will have an entire set of rules which constitute a logic to disengage, but the set is, he says, tautological, that is to say, as stupid as the following—whatever you state is either true or false. Stating what is either true or false is necessarily true, but also it annuls sense.

Everything I have said, he concludes at propositions 6.51, 2, 3, 4, since he numbers them, everything I have just stated is strictly speaking Unsinn, that is, it annuls sense.

One cannot say anything that is not a tautology. What is at stake is that once the reader has passed through the long circuit of statements, and please believe me, all of them are extremely attractive, he will have risen above everything that has just been said and concluded that nothing else is sayable—but that everything that can be said is only nonsense.

I have perhaps been a bit swift in summing up Wittgenstein's Tractatus Logico-Philosophicus.[11] Let us add just this remark, that nothing can be said, that nothing is true, except on the condition that one starts from the idea, on Wittgenstein's approach, that a fact is an attribute of an elementary proposition.[12]

What I am calling an elementary proposition will elsewhere be placed in quotation marks, in Quine for instance, who distinguishes between a statement and an utterance. This is an operation which, because I have constructed my graph precisely on its foundation, I have no hesitation in calling arbitrary. It is in effect clear that it is defensible to say, and this is Wittgenstein's position, that no sign of affirmation needs to be added to what is assertion pure and simple. An assertion declares itself to be the truth.

How then can one avoid Wittgenstein's conclusions, other than by following him exactly where he is led, namely toward the elementary proposition, whose notation as true or as false is what must, in every case, whether it be true or false, assure the truth of the composite proposition?

Whatever the facts in the world might be, I would go further, whatever we might say about them, the tautology of the totality of discourse is what makes the world.

68 Take the simplest proposition, I mean grammatically. It is not for nothing that the Stoics had already used it, introducing it into the simplest form of implication. I won't go that far, I will only take the first part of it, since, as you know, implication is a relation between two propositions. "It is day." That is the bare minimum. "It," in the impersonal. "It is," "that is"—in certain circumstances these have the same sense.

Thus, for Wittgenstein the world is supported only by facts. No things unless supported by a web of facts. No things, moreover, but that are inaccessible. Facts alone are articulable. This fact, that it is day, is only a fact by virtue of that, its being said.

The true depends only—this is where I have to reintroduce the dimension I am arbitrarily separating from it—on my utterance, namely on whether I state it appropriately. The true is not internal to the proposition, where only the fact, the factitious nature, of language is declared.

It is true that it is a fact, a fact constituted by my saying it, on those occasions when it's true. But that it is true is not a fact, unless I explicitly add that, moreover, it's true. It is just that, as Wittgenstein puts it very well, it's quite superfluous for me to add it.

Well, except that what I have to say in the place of this superfluity is that [11] Ludwig Wittgenstein, Tractatus Logico-Philosophicus (London: Routledge & Kegan Paul, 1974).

[12] Proposition 4.21.

I have to have a reason for really saying it, and this will be explained by what follows.

But then, I don't say that I have a reason, I continue with the rest, namely my deduction, and I integrate "It is day," perhaps fallaciously—even if it's true—into my exhortation, which may be to take advantage of it so as to get someone to believe that he can clearly see what my intentions are.

The stupid thing, if I may say so, is to isolate the factitiousness of "It is day." It is a prodigiously rich piece of stupidity, for it gives rise to a leverage point, very precisely the following one, from which it results that what I have used as a leverage point myself, namely that there is no metalanguage, is pushed to its ultimate consequences.

There is no other metalanguage than all the forms of knavery, if we thereby designate these curious operations derivable from the fact that man's desire is the Other's desire. All acts of bastardry are based on the fact of wishing to be someone's Other, I mean someone's big Other, in which the figures by which his desire will be captivated are drawn.

Thus this Wittgensteinian operation is nothing but an extraordinary 69 parade, the detection of philosophical skulduggery.

The only sense is the sense of desire. This is what one can say after having read Wittgenstein. The only truth is the truth of what the said desire for its lack hides, so as to make light of what he does find.

There is no more certain light under which what results from what logicians have always articulated appears, if only to dazzle us with the air of paradox contained in what has been called material implication.

You know what this is. It's simply implication. It has only recently been called material implication, because, all of a sudden, they have rubbed their eyes and begun to understand what a scandal implication is, I am speaking of the one that a certain Stoic upheld. That is to say, that the three following implications are legitimate, that, to be sure, the false implies the false, the true implies the true, but that it is not at all to be rejected that the false imply the true, since in total it is a matter of what is implied and that if what is implied is true the entire implication is also true.

However, this means something, why couldn't we, by slightly altering the word "implies," observe what is relevant in this—that it was well known in the Middle Ages, ex falso sequitur quodlibet—that the false sometimes also entails the true means that the true can be about anything.

But that if, on the other hand, we reject that the true entail the false, that it can have a false consequent—for this is what we are rejecting, in the absence of which there would be no possible articulation of propositional logic—we end up with this curious fact that the true has a genealogy, that it always goes back to an initial true, from which it is no longer able to fall.

This is such a strange indication, one that is so challenged by our entire life, I mean our life as a subject, that this alone would be sufficient to question whether truth could in any way be isolated as an attribute—as an attribute of anything capable of articulating with knowledge.

As for the analytic operation, it is distinguished by advancing into this field in a way that is distinct from what is, I would say, found embodied in 70 Wittgenstein's discourse, that is, a psychotic ferocity, in comparison with which Ockham's well-known razor, which states that we must admit only notions that are necessary, is nothing.

Truth—we begin again from first principles—is certainly inseparable from the effects of language taken as such.

No truth can be localized except in the field in which it is stated—in which it is stated as best it can. Therefore, it is true that there is no true without the false, at least not in principle. This is true.

But that there is no false without the true, that is false.

I mean that the true can only be found outside all propositions. To say that the true is inseparable from the effects of language, considered as such, is to include the unconscious within them.

The claim, on the contrary, as I was saying last time, that the unconscious is the condition of language gets its sense here, by virtue of wishing that an absolute sense corresponds to language.

One of the authors of the discourse on "The Unconscious," subtitled, "A Psychoanalytic Study," once wrote it out by superimposing an S over itself, by placing it below and above a bar, arbitrarily treated moreover with respect to what I had done with it. The signifier thereby designated, the sense of which is supposedly absolute, is very easy to recognize, for there is only one capable of answering to this place—it is the I.

This is the I insofar as it is transcendental, but, equally, insofar as it is illusory. This is the ultimate root operation, the one that what I am describing as an elaboration of the university discourse guarantees for itself—and this is what shows that finding it here is no accident.

The transcendental I is what anyone who has stated knowledge in a certain way harbors as truth, the S_1, the I of the master.

It is, very precisely, out of the I identical to itself that the S_1 of the pure imperative is constituted.

It is, very precisely, in imperatives that the I is displayed, for they are always in the second person.

The myth of the ideal I, of the I that masters, of the I whereby at least 71 something is identical to itself, namely the speaker, is very precisely what the university discourse is unable to eliminate from the place in which its truth is found. From every academic statement by any philosophy whatsoever, even by a philosophy that strictly speaking could be pointed to as being the most opposed to philosophy, namely, if it were philosophy, Lacan's discourse—the I-cracy emerges, irreducibly.

Of course, no philosophy is ever reducible to this. For philosophers the question has been a lot more supple and pathetic. Remember what is in question, everyone acknowledges it more or less, and some of them, the most lucid, do so clearly—they want to save truth.

This has taken one of them, good heavens, a long way—to the point where, like Wittgenstein, by making it the rule and the foundation of knowledge, there is nothing left to say, at least nothing that concerns truth as such, so as to refuse, to avoid, this rock. Surely the author has something close to the analyst's position, namely, that he eliminates himself completely from his own discourse.

I mentioned psychosis before. Here, in effect, one of the most assured discourses and something or other that is strikingly suggestive of psychosis concur so much that I am saying this on the sole basis of feeling its effect. How remarkable it is that a university like the English university made a place for him. A place apart, it's appropriate to say, a place of isolation with which the author went along with perfectly well himself, so much so that he withdrew from time to time to a little house in the country and then returned to pursue this implacable discourse, of which, one can even say, the discourse of Russell's Principia Mathematica turns out to be a fabrication.

Wittgenstein wasn't interested in saving the truth. Nothing can be said about truth, as he said. This isn't certain, since we are dealing with it every day. But how, then, does Freud define the psychotic position in a letter I have quoted many times? Precisely by what he calls, strangely, unglauben, not wanting to know anything about the spot where truth is in question.

For the academic it is such a pathetic thing that one can say that Politzer's discourse entitled "Foundations of Concrete Psychology," which was instigated by his approaching psychoanalysis, is a fascinating example of it.[13]

Everything in this attempt at leaving behind this university discourse that has shaped him from head to toe is to be commended. He is well aware that there is some ramp there he could take to escape from it.

You must read this small work, republished in paperback without any 72

[13] This work had just been republished as vol. 2 of Politzer's Ecrits (Paris: Éditions sociales, 1969), edited by Jacques Debouzy. Politzer was executed by the Gestapo in 1942. evidence, to my knowledge, that the author has himself authorized this new edition, whereas everyone knows how much of a trial he found the accolades with which what was initially presented as a cry of revolt was covered.

These scathing pages on psychology, particularly academic psychology, are, curiously, followed by steps which in some way lead him right back again. But what enabled him to grasp where there might be hope for him to escape from this psychology was his emphasizing the fact—which nobody had done in his day—that what in Freud's method was essential for exploring formations of the unconscious was to trust the narrative [récit]. He emphasized this fact of language, from which everything, really, might have followed.

At the time there was no question—this is a piece of trivia—of anyone, not even at the École normale, having the slightest idea of what linguistics is, but it is extremely unusual that he should have thus come across the fact that this is the mainspring that gives some hope for what he curiously calls concrete psychology.

You must read this little book, and if I had it here I would read it with you. Perhaps one day I will make it the substance of our exchanges here, but I already have enough things to say for me not to have to dwell on something whose significant oddness each one of you can see for yourself—that in seeking to escape from the university discourse one implacably reenters it. One can follow this step by step.

What objections does he make to the statements, I mean to the terminology, concerning the mechanisms Freud proposes in his theoretical development? He declares, concerning facts isolable by formal abstraction, as he confusingly puts it, that what escapes Freud is for him essential to what is required in matters of psychology, namely that all scientific facts are utterable only if one preserves what he calls the act and, even better, the continuity of the I. This is what he writes—the continuity of the I.

This term is no doubt what made it possible for the editor I mentioned before to shine at Politzer's expense, to whom he makes a little reference—an episode, as it were, for enticing his audience such as it then was. An academic who in another connection has shown himself to be a hero—73 what a fitting occasion to evoke him. It is always good to have one from time to time, but that is not sufficient, if you benefit from it without managing to show what in the university discourse is irreducible in relation to analysis. This book testifies to a unique battle, however, for Politzer cannot fail to sense how close analytic practice is in fact to what he ideally sketched out as being completely outside the field of anything that had previously been done as psychology. But he cannot avoid falling back upon requiring the I.

Not, to be sure, that I see there anything that is irreducible. The editor in question lets himself off too lightly when he states that the unconscious does not express itself in the first person, and arms himself for this with one of my remarks about the fact that the subject receives his message from the other in inverted form.

That is clearly not a sufficient reason. Elsewhere I have in fact said that truth speaks I. "I, truth, am speaking."[14] It's just that what doesn't occur either to the author in question or to Politzer is that the "I" in question is perhaps innumerable, that the I does not need to be continuous for it to multiply its acts.

In the face of this use of propositions are we not, before we part, going to present the following? "A child is being beaten." This entire fantasy really is made up of a proposition. Are we able to attribute to it anything whatsoever that the terms "true" or "false" designate?

This case, exemplary in that there is no definition of a proposition that it cannot be eliminated from, makes us grasp the fact that if this proposition has the effect of being sustained by a subject, it's undoubtedly a subject, as Freud immediately analyzes, divided by jouissance. Divided, I mean that also he who states it, this child who, becomes virtue, turns green (wird, vertu, verdit, verdoie) through being beaten, geschlagen – let's play on this a bit longer—this child who becomes green [with fear], beaten, he jests—vertu, virtue, these are the misfortunes of the vers-tu, toward-you, that is, the one who is striking him, and who is unnamed, no matter how the sentence is stated.

The "You are beating me" is this half of the subject whose formula con- 74 stitutes his liaison with jouissance. He receives, to be sure, his own message in inverted form—here this means his own jouissance in the form of the Other's jouissance. This is what is involved when the fantasy happens to join the father's image to what is initially another child. The fact is that the father gets jouissance from beating him, which here places the emphasis of the meaning, and also the emphasis of this truth that is a half-truth—for equally he who is identified with the other half, with the subject as child, was not this child, unless, as Freud says, one reconstitutes the intermediate stage—never, in any way, substantiated by memory—where it is him, in effect. It is he who makes this sentence the support of his fantasy, the beaten child.

Here we are led back to this fact that a body can be formless [sans figure]. The father or the other, whoever this may be, who here plays the role of jouissance, assures its function, gives it its place, is not named at all. A formless god—this is truly what it is. He nevertheless cannot be grasped except as a body.

What has a body and does not exist? Answer—the big Other. If we believe in this big Other, then it has a body, ineliminable from the substance of the one who has said "I am what I am," which is another form of tautology altogether.

It is in this that, before leaving you, I will allow myself to advance this, which is so striking in history that, quite frankly, it is astonishing that it has not been emphasized enough or even not emphasized at all—materialists are the only authentic believers.

Experience has proved it—I am speaking of the time of the most recent historical eruption of materialism in the eighteenth century. Matter was their god. And indeed, why not? That stands up better than any other way of founding him.

It's just that this is not enough for the rest of us. Precisely because we have logical needs, if you will allow me this term. Because we are beings born of surplus jouissance, as a result of the use of language.

When I say, "the use of language," I do not mean that we use it. It is language that uses us. Language employs us, and that is how it enjoys. This is 75 why the only chance for the existence of God is that He—with a capital H—enjoys, that He is jouissance.

This is why it was clear to the most intelligent of the materialists, namely de Sade, that the aim of death is not at all the inanimate.

Read the propositions of Saint-Fond near the middle of Juliette and you will see what it's all about. When he says that death consists of nothing other than the invisible collaboration with the operation of nature, it is of course because for him, after death, everything remains animate—animated by the desire for jouissance. He can just as well call this jouissance nature, but it is obvious in the total context that it is jouissance that's at stake. Jouissance by what? By a unique being who has merely to say "I am what I am."

Why is this so? How does de Sade sense this so well?

This is where the fact that in appearance he is sadistic is played out. It's because he refuses to be what he is, to be what he says he is. When he makes this furious appeal to give to nature in its murderous operation, from which forms are always being reborn, what is he doing, if not displaying his impotence to be anything other than the instrument of divine jouissance?

That's de Sade the theoretician. Why is he a theoretician? I perhaps have the time, at the last moment as I usually do it, to tell you why.

The practitioner is different. As you know from a number of stories, about which we have his testimony in his own hand moreover, the practitioner is simply a masochist.

This is the only astute and practical position where jouissance is concerned, for exhausting oneself at being the instrument of God is backbreaking work. The masochist is a fine humorist. He has no need of God, his lackey will do. He gets his kicks by enjoying within limits that are moreover discreet, naturally, and like any good masochist, as you can see, you just have to read him, he finds it funny. He is a humorous master. Why in the devil, then, is de Sade a theoretician? Why this exhausting wish, for it is completely out of his reach, this wish that is written, designated in this way? This wish that these particles, in which—following the most extraordinary imagined acts—fragments of broken, shredded, dismembered lives result, be struck down by a second death. Within whose reach is this?

Of course, it is within our reach. I stated this a long time ago on the subject of Antigone. It's just that, being a psychoanalyst, I can see that the second death is prior to the first, and not after, as de Sade dreams. 76

De Sade was a theoretician. And why? Because he loved truth.

It is not that he wants to save it—he loves it. The proof that he loves it is that he refuses it, that he does not appear to notice that by decreeing this God dead he exalts Him, he bears witness to Him, witness to the fact that he, de Sade, only achieves jouissance through the small means I mentioned before.

What can it mean to say that by loving truth one thus falls into a system that is so obviously symptomatic? Here one thing is becoming clear—by proposing itself as the residue of the effect of language, as what makes it that the effect of language only extracts, from enjoying, what last time I was saying about the entropy of a surplus jouissance—this is what one does not see—truth as external to discourse—but what—is the sister of that forbidden jouissance.

I say, "It's the sister," because they are only related by this. If the most radical logical structures effectively attach themselves to this stem that is uprooted from jouissance, the inverse question arises of what corresponds to the enjoying of these conquests in logic that in our day are being made. There is this, for example, that a logical system is consistent, however "weak" it is, as they say, only by designating its force of effect of incompleteness, where its limit is marked. To what jouissance does this way in which the logical foundation itself proves to be opening up correspond? In other words, what is truth here?

It is not in vain, nor by chance, that I describe as sisterly the position of truth with respect to jouissance, apart from the fact that I am stating it in the hysteric's discourse.

Oddly enough, quite recently, someone gave a lecture to the Americans on something that everybody knows. Freud was having, with his sister-in-law, what is coyly called an affair. So what? We have known Minna Bernays' place in Freud's preoccupations for a very long time. Adding some Jungian gossip to it doesn't change a thing.

But I will hold onto this position of the sister-in-law. Isn't it because of his sister-in-law that de Sade, whom, as we all know, Oedipal prohibition 77 had separated from his wife—as the theoreticians of courtly love have always said, there is no love in marriage—loved truth so much?

I will leave you with that question.

FREUD MASKS HIS DISCOURSE

THE HAPPINESS OF THE PHALLUS

MEANS OF JOUISSANCE

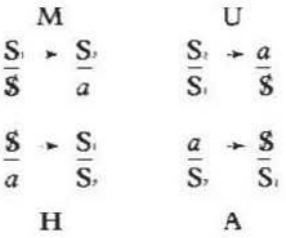
HEGEL, MARX, AND THERMODYNAMICS

WEALTH, PROPERTY OF THE WEALTHY



We are going to push on, and perhaps so as to avoid one misunderstanding, among others, I would like to give you this rule of first approximation—the reference of a discourse is what it acknowledges it wants to master. That is sufficient to classify it in the kinship of the master's discourse.

This is the difficulty faced by anyone whom I try to bring as close as I am able to the analyst's discourse—and who has to be located at the opposite of any wish, at least any declared wish, for mastery. I say, "at least declared," not because one has to dissimulate the wish, but because it is easy after all to spin off into the discourse of mastery.

As a matter of fact, this is the starting point for teaching the discourse of consciousness, which has recommenced, recommences every day, indefinitely. One of my best friends, who is very close to me, in psychiatry of course, described it best—it is a discourse of synthesis, a discourse of the consciousness that masters.[1]

He was the one I was replying to in certain views that I put forward some time ago on psychical causality, and which are there to testify that well 80 before I took the analytic discourse in hand I already had some orientation, in particular when I said to him, more or less, how could one grasp all that psychical activity other than as a dream, when thousands upon thousands of times over the course of the day one hears "this bastard chain of fate and inertia, of throws of the dice and astonishment, of false success and missed encounters, which make up the usual script of a human life"?[1]

Don't expect anything more subversive in my discourse than that I do not claim to have a solution.

Nevertheless, it is clear that there is no more burning question than what, in discourse, refers to jouissance.

Discourse is constantly touching on it, by virtue of the fact that this is where it originates. And discourse arouses it again whenever it attempts to return to this origin. It is in this respect that it challenges all appeasement.

Freud has an odd discourse, it has to be said, one that is most contrary to the coherence, to the consistency, of a discourse. The subject of discourse does not know himself as the subject holding the discourse. That he does not know what he is saying doesn't matter too much, one has always found a substitute [suppléance] for this. But what Freud says is that the subject does not know who it is that is saying it.

Knowledge—I think I have insisted upon this sufficiently to get it into your head—is something spoken, something that is said. Well then, knowledge that speaks all by itself—that's the unconscious.

This is the point at which it should have been attacked by what is more or less diffusely called phenomenology. It was not enough, to contradict Freud, to remind us that knowledge is known ineffably. The attack had to bear upon this, which is that Freud stresses what everyone is able to know—knowledge comes in bits, knowledge is enumerable, it comes in parcels, and—this is what isn't self-evident—what is said, the litany, is not said by anyone, it unfolds of its own accord.

With your permission, I wanted to start with an aphorism. You will see why 81 I hesitated. I have hesitated, as I usually do, but fortunately I am doing it before twelve thirty-one and thus have not delayed the end of our seminar this time. If I started in the way I always feel like starting, I would start abruptly. It's because I feel like doing it that I don't do it, I am sparing you, I am avoiding shocks for you. I wanted to begin with an aphorism which, I hope, will strike you by its obviousness, because it's the reason that Freud has carried the day despite the protestations that greeted his entry into the world of commerce of ideas. What carried the day is this—Freud doesn't bullshit [déconne].

This is what gives him this sort of priority he has in our day. It's probably also what makes it the case that there is another who, as we know, survives fairly well despite everything. What is characteristic of the two of them, Freud and Marx, is that they don't bullshit.

We can see it in the fact that in contradicting them there is always a risk of sliding, one slides very easily, into bullshitting. They throw into confusion the discourse of those who want to trip them up and very often freeze it into a sort of irreducibly conformist, retarded, academic recursion.

I am perfectly happy for these contradictors, if I may be so bold, to bullshit. They would be unpacking the consequences of Freud, they would be continuing a certain order, the order of what is at issue. After all, one does ask oneself why from time to time they say So-and-so is an idiot [con]. Is this so devaluing? Haven't you noticed that when one says that So-and-so is an idiot it actually means he is not so stupid? What depresses one is that one does not very well know in what way he deals with jouissance. And that's why he is called an idiot.

This is also what gives Freud's discourse its value. He is worthy of it. He is worthy of a discourse that maintains itself as close as possible to what refers to jouissance—as close as it was possible up till Freud. It is not very comfortable. It is not very comfortable to be situated at this point where discourse emerges, or even, when it returns there, when it falters, in the environs of jouissance.

Obviously, with respect to this Freud sometimes shies away, abandons us. He abandons the question of feminine jouissance. At the latest report Mr. Gillespie, an eminent character who has distinguished himself by all sorts of operations of horse-trading between the different currents that have 82 permeated analysis these last fifty years, marks some kind of jubilation, an unusual liveliness, in the latest issue of the International Journal of Psycho-Analysis over the fact that, owing to a number of experiments on vaginal orgasm that have apparently been carried out at the University of Washington, much light has apparently been thrown on what was a matter of debate, namely the primacy or not, in woman's development, of a jouissance initially reduced to the equivalent of male jouissance.[2]

These studies by a certain Masters and Johnson are not, frankly, lacking in interest. Nevertheless, when, without having been able to refer directly to the text, but on the basis of certain quotations, I see it appear there that the greater orgasm, which is apparently the woman's orgasm, emanates from the total personality, I do wonder how a movie camera that takes images in color, placed inside an appendage representing the penis, recording from the inside what takes place on the lining of what, on its being inserted, surrounds it, is capable of grasping the said total personality.

This is perhaps very interesting, as an accompaniment in the margin of what Freud's discourse enables us to propose. But it is what gives meaning to the word déconner, "to bullshit," like one says déchanter, to change one's tune. You know perhaps what le déchant, the descant, is—it's something that is written alongside plain chant, it can also be sung, it can be an accompaniment, but ultimately it is not at all what one expects from plain chant.

It is because there is so much descant here that one has to remind oneself of what emerges, in brutal outline, from what I could call the attempt at economic reduction that Freud gives his discourse on jouissance.

It is not without reason that he masks it in this way. You will see what effect this has when stated directly. But it is what I thought I should do today in a form that, I hope, you will find striking, even though it will teach you nothing but the right tone for Freud's discoveries.

We are not going to speak about jouissance in that way.

I have already said enough to you for you to know that jouissance is the jar of the Danaides, and that once you have started, you never know where it will end.[3] It begins with a tickle and ends in a blaze of petrol. That's always what jouissance is.

I will take these things up via another factor which cannot be said to be absent from analytic discourse.

If you read the veritable anniversary corpus that is this issue of the International Journal of Psycho-Analysis you will see the authors congratulating themselves on the solidity displayed over these past fifty years. I ask you to carry out this test—take any issue from these past fifty years, you will never be able to tell when it dates from. They all say the same thing. They are always equally insipid, and because analysis preserves, they are always the same authors. It's simply that, as fatigue sets in, they reduce their contributions from time to time. One of them expresses himself in a single page.

[3] The Danaides were daughters of Danaus, a mythical king regarded by the ancient Greeks as one of their progenitors. Forced to marry their cousins, the sons of Aegyptus, the Danaides, with one exception, stabbed their husbands to death on the wedding night, with daggers their father had provided; the murderers were punished in the Underworld by having to fill leaky jars with water.

They congratulate themselves on the fact that, in sum, these fifty years have indeed confirmed these fundamental truths, that the mainspring of analysis is goodness, and that what has fortunately become obvious over the course of these years, with the progressive effacing of Freud's discourse, is particularly the solidity and glory of a discovery that is called the autonomous ego, namely, the ego free of conflict.

This is the result of fifty years of experience, by virtue of the insertion of three psychoanalysts, who had blossomed in Berlin, into American society where this discourse of a solidly autonomous ego undoubtedly promised attractive results.[4] For a return to the master's discourse, in effect, one could do no better.

This gives us an idea of the consequences, retrogressive if you like, that rebound from any form of attempt at transgression, which, all the same, analysis was at one time.

Now, we are going to put things in a certain way, and concerning a word that you will easily find in turning to this issue [of the journal], since it's also one of the current themes of analytic propaganda—in English it's called "happiness," in French we call it le bonheur.

Unless we define happiness in a rather sad way, namely that it is to be 84 like everyone else, which is what the autonomous ego could be resolved into—nobody, it has to be said, knows what it is. If we are to believe Saint-Just who said this himself, then since that time, his own day, happiness has become a political factor.

Let's try to give body to this notion by another abrupt statement which, I ask you to note, is central to Freudian theory—the only happiness is the happiness of the phallus.

Freud writes this in all sorts of ways, and even writes it in a naïve manner which consists in saying that nothing can come closer to the most perfect jouissance than that of the male orgasm.

However, where Freudian theory places the emphasis is on the fact that it is only the phallus that is happy—not the bearer of said. Even when, not out of oblativity, but out of desperation, he places it, the above said phallus, inside the womb of a partner, supposedly disappointed at not bearing one herself.

There you have what psychoanalytic experience teaches us positively. The bearer of the said phallus, as I put it, strives to get his partner to accept this privation, in the name of which all his efforts at love, his detailed caring and tender services, are in vain, since he reawakens the said wound of privation. There is no compensation for this wound in the satisfaction that its bearer purportedly derives from alleviating it. On the contrary, it is reawakened by its very presence, by the presence of that thing the regret for which causes this wound.

This is exactly what was revealed to us by what Freud was able to extract from the hysteric's discourse. It is the basis on which we can understand how the hysteric symbolizes the initial non-satisfaction. I have highlighted her promotion of unsatisfied desire supported by the minimal example that I have commented on in the article [écrit] that goes under the title of "The Direction of the Treatment and the Principles of Its Power," namely, the dream of the butcher's beautiful wife.[5]

You will recall that there is the beautiful wife and her husband, who loves a fuck, who is a perfect idiot, because of which she has to show him that she does not value what he wants to satisfy her to excess with, which means that nothing is settled as to what is essential, even though she has what is essen-
85 tial. There you have it. What she does not see, because she too has limits to her own little horizon, is that by leaving what is essential to her husband to another woman, she would obtain surplus jouissance, for this is what is at stake in the dream. She doesn't see it in the dream, that's all one can say.

There are others that do see it. For example, Dora does. Through the adoration of the object of desire that woman has become on her horizon—the woman she envelops herself in and who in the case study is called Frau K., the woman she is going to contemplate in the figure of the Dresden Madonna—through this adoration, she plugs her penile claims [revendications]. And this is what makes it possible for me to say that the butcher's beautiful wife does not see that, like Dora, she would ultimately be happy to leave this object to another woman.

There are other solutions. If I take this one it's because it is the most scandalous.

There are many other refinements in the ways of finding a substitute for this jouissance, whose framework, which is that of the social, and which leads to the Oedipus complex, brings it about that by virtue of being the only jouissance that would bring happiness, precisely because of that, this jouissance is excluded. This is, strictly, the meaning of the Oedipus complex. And this is why it is interesting in analytic investigation to know how it is that by being substituted for the prohibition of phallic jouissance something is introduced whose origin we have defined by a thing that is quite different from phallic jouissance, one that is situated by, and as it were mapped out [quadrillé] by, the function of surplus jouissance.

I am only recalling here some outstanding features of Freudian discourse that I have highlighted many times before and that I want to insert into their relationship of configuration—which is not central but it is related—with the situation I am trying to give of this discourse's relationships to jouissance. This is the respect in which I am recalling them and want to place renewed emphasis on them, with the intention of modifying any aura that the idea that the Freudian discourse is centered on the biological facts of sexuality may hold for you.

I will see how I measure up here, which is something that I must confess to you I did not discover very long ago. It is always the things that are most visible, the ones that display themselves, that one sees least. I suddenly asked myself, "But how does one say 'sex' in Greek?"

The worst of it is that I did not have a French-Greek dictionary, and anyway there aren't any—well, only small, ugly ones. I had found genos, which of course has nothing to do with sex, since it means a bunch of other things, race, lineage, engenderment, reproduction. Then another word appeared on the horizon, but its connotations are quite different—phusis, "nature." 86

This division of living beings, of one part of them, into two classes, with what one realizes that this entails, namely, most likely, the irruption of death, since the others, those that are not sexed, do not give the appearance of dying all that much—this is not what we are saying at all, it doesn't have this ring about it at all when we say "sex." The stress, of course, is not at all on this biological reference. This is clearly what shows that one has to be very, very careful before assuming that it is a reminder not just about organicism but even about a reference to biology that foregrounds the function of sex in Freudian discourse.

It is here that one notices that "sex," with the significance it has for us and its level of use, its meaningful diffusion, is sexus. In relation to Greek one would have to conduct the enquiry into other languages, but in Latin it is, very clearly, attached to secare. In Latin sexus is implicated in what I initially made evident, namely that the entire game revolves around the phallus.

Of course, it is not only the phallus that is present in sexual relations. However, what this organ has that is privileged is that in some way it is quite possible to isolate its jouissance. It is thinkable as excluded. To use violent words—I am not going to drown this in symbolism for you—it has, precisely, a property that, within the entire field of what constitutes sexual equipment, we may consider to be very local, very exceptional. There is not, in effect, a very large number of animals for whom the decisive organ for copulation is something as isolatable in its functions of tumescence and detumescence, determining a perfectly definable curve, called orgasmic—once it's over, it's over. Post coitum animal triste, as has already been said. This is no exaggeration, moreover. But it does clearly indicate that he feels himself to be frustrated. There is something there that does not concern him. He can take things differently, he can find it very cheerful, but ulti-

87 mately Horace found it to be rather sad—and this is proof that he had still retained illusions about the relationships with the Greek phusis, with this bud that he thinks sexual desire constitutes.

That is putting things in their place, when one sees that this is, nevertheless, how Freud presents things. If there is something in biology that might echo, have a vague resemblance with but in no way be rooted in this position whose roots in discourse we are now going to indicate, if there is something which, so that we can say good-bye to the domain of biology, would give us an approximate idea of what it means to say that everything is played out around this stake, which one of them doesn't have and the other doesn't know what to do with, it would be more or less what takes place in certain animal species.

Just recently I saw—and this is why I mention it to you—some fish that were very pretty and monstrous, as a species has to be in which the female is about this size and the male is like this, tiny. He comes and latches onto her stomach, and he latches on so well that his own tissues are indiscernible—it is not possible, even under a microscope, to see where the tissues of one end and the tissues of the other begin. There he is, hooked on by his mouth, and there he fulfils, if it can be put like this, his male functions. It is not unthinkable that this greatly simplifies the problem of sexual relations, when in the end the weary male resorbs his heart, his liver, and none of it is left at all, there he is, suspended from the good place, reduced to what after a certain time remains in this little animal pocket, namely, principally the testicles.

The question is to elaborate the nature of this phallic exclusion in the great human game of our tradition, which is that of desire.

Desire has no immediately proximate relationship with this field. Our tradition states it for what it is, Eros, the making present of a lack.

And this is where one can ask how it is possible to desire anything. What is lacking? There was someone who one day said, "But don't wear yourself out, nothing is lacking, look at the lilies in the field, they do not weave nor do they spin, it is they who are in their place in the Kingdom of heaven."[6]

It is obvious that to make these claims of genuine defiance, one really would have had to be the very one who was identifying with the negation
88 of this harmony. This at least is how he was understood, interpreted, when he was characterised as the Word. He had to be the Word itself if he was to negate the obvious to this extent. At least, this is the idea that formed around him. He didn't say as much. He said, if one of his disciples is to be believed, "I am the Way, the Truth, the Life."[7] But the fact that they made this into the Word indicates where people nevertheless knew more or less what they were saying when they thought that only the Word was capable of repudiating itself to this extent.

It is true that we can well imagine the lily in the fields as a body entirely given over to jouissance—each stage of its growth identical to a formless sensation. The plant's jouissance. Nothing in any case makes it possible to escape it. It is perhaps infinitely painful to be a plant. Well, nobody amuses themselves by thinking about this, except me.

It is not the same for animals, who have what we interpret as an economy—the possibility of movement in order to obtain, above all, the minimum of jouissance. This is what is known as the pleasure principle. Let's not stay there where one enjoys, because God only knows where it might end, as I was already saying earlier.

Now, there is this thing, which is that we nevertheless know the means to jouissance. I was speaking to you just before about tickling and grilling. There, we know how to go about it. That's even what knowledge is. In principle nobody wants to overuse it, and yet it's tempting to.

This is actually what Freud discovered in fact around 1920, and here, in a way, is the point at which his discovery backtracks.

His discovery was to have spelled out the unconscious, and I defy anyone to say that this can be anything other than the remark that there is a perfectly articulated knowledge for which strictly speaking no subject is responsible. When a subject happens to encounter it all of a sudden, to come upon this knowledge he was not expecting, good God, he—he who speaks—finds himself very confused indeed.

This was the first discovery. Freud said to subjects, "Speak, speak then, do what the hysterics do, let's see what knowledge it is that you encounter, and the manner in which you have aspired to it or, on the other hand, in which you reject it, let's see what happens." And that necessarily led him to this discovery, which he called beyond the pleasure principle. And it was 89 this, that the essential thing in determining what one is concerned with when exploring the unconscious is repetition.

Repetition. This does not mean that one redoes what one has finished, like digestion or some other physiological function. Repetition is the precise denotation of a trait that I have uncovered for you in Freud's text as being identical with the unary trait, with the little stick, with the element of writing, the element of a trait insofar as it is the commemoration of an irruption of jouissance.

This is why it is conceivable that the rule and the principle of pleasure are violated, why it succumbs to displeasure. There is nothing else to say—not to pain obviously, but to displeasure, which can only mean jouissance.

This is where inserting the generation, the genital, the genitive [génésique], into desire shows itself to be entirely distinct from sexual maturity.

There is no doubt that speaking of premature sexualization has its point. Certainly, what is called the early manifestation of sexuality in man is very obviously what it is said to be, namely, premature. But apart from the fact that this can imply, in effect, the presence of jouissance, it nevertheless remains the case that it is not merely organic autoerotism that introduces the division between libido and nature. There are other animals than men who are capable of stroking themselves, and that hasn't led them, monkeys, to a highly advanced elaboration of desire. On the contrary, we find favor here in the function of discourse.

It is not just a matter of talking about prohibitions, but simply about a dominance of the woman as mother, and as a mother who says, a mother of whom one makes demands, a mother who gives orders, and who thereby establishes the child's dependence.

Woman lends herself to jouissance by daring the mask of repetition. She presents herself here as what she is, as the institution of masquerade. She teaches her little one to parade. She tends towards surplus jouissance, because she, the woman, plunges her roots, like a flower, down into jouissance itself. The means of jouissance are open on the principle that he has renounced this closed, foreign jouissance, renounced the mother.

It is here that a vast social connivance will come and insert itself, inverting what we can call the differences between the sexes in nature into the 90 sexualization of organic difference. This overturning implies as common denominator the exclusion of the specifically male organ. Henceforth the male is and is not what he is with respect to jouissance. And thereby, also, woman is produced as an object, precisely through not being what he is, sexual difference, on the one hand, and on the other through being what he renounces by way of jouissance.

These reminders are absolutely essential to make at a time when, in talking of the other side of psychoanalysis, the question arises of the place of psychoanalysis in politics.

The intrusion into the political can only be made by recognizing that the only discourse there is, and not just analytic discourse, is the discourse of jouissance, at least when one is hoping for the work of truth from it.

Characterizing the master's discourse as comprising a hidden truth does not mean that this discourse is hidden, that it is lying low. The word caché, hidden, in French has its etymological virtues. It comes from coactus, from the verb coactare, coactitare, coacticare. This means that there is something that is compressed, that is like a superimposition, something that needs to be unfolded in order to be legible.

It is clear that his truth is hidden from him, and a certain Hegel stated that it is delivered to him by the work of the slave. There you have it, however, it is a master's discourse, this discourse of Hegel's, which relies on substituting the State for the master via the long pathway of culture, culminating in absolute knowledge. It does seem to have been definitively refuted by discoveries made by Marx. I am not here to comment on this, and I won't add an appendix here, but I will simply show the extent to which, from the perspective of our psychoanalytic belvedere, we are comfortable about casting doubt on whether work engenders absolute knowledge, or even any knowledge at all, on the horizon.

I have already developed this point for you, and I can go back over it again here. But it is one of the axes in which I beg you to locate yourselves so as to grasp what the analytic subversion is.

Whereas knowledge is a means of jouissance, work is something else. Even if work is accomplished by those who have knowledge, what it pro- 91 duces can certainly be truth, it is never knowledge—no work has ever produced knowledge. Something objects to this, which is given by a closer observation of the nature, in our culture, of the relations between the master's discourse and something that has emerged, something which has reestablished the examination of what, from Hegel's point of view, was wrapped around this discourse. This something is the avoidance of absolute jouissance, insofar as it is determined by the fact that in attaching the child to the mother social connivance makes her the privileged site of prohibitions.

Moreover, doesn't the formalization of a knowledge that renders all truth problematic suggest to us that, rather than progress having been made through the work of the slave—as if there has been the slightest progress in his condition, quite the contrary—it is a matter of the transference, plundering, spoliation of what, at the beginning of knowledge, was inscribed, hidden, in the slave's world? In this connection it was the master's discourse that had to impose itself. But also, by virtue of this fact, reentering into the mechanism of its repeated assertion, he had to apprehend the loss of his own entry into discourse and, in a word, see this object a emerge, which we have nailed down as surplus jouissance.

In short, this and nothing more than this is what the master had to make the slave, the sole possessor of the means of jouissance, pay for.

The master was satisfied with this little tithe, this surplus jouissance, such that, after all, there is no indication that in himself the slave was unhappy to be giving it. The case is quite different with respect to what is found, on the horizon of the rise of the master subject, in a truth which asserts itself on the basis of his equality with himself, on the basis of this I-cracy I once spoke of, and which is, it seems, the essence of every affirmation in culture that has seen this master's discourse flourish over all others.

If we look at it more closely, what subtracts the slave's knowledge from him is the entire history whose stages Hegel follows step by step—something unusual, without having seen where it was leading, and for good reason. He was still in the field of Newton's discoveries, he hadn't seen the birth of thermodynamics. If he had been able to take on board formulas which, for the first time, unified this field that was designated as thermodynamics, perhaps he would have been able to recognize in it this reign of the signifier, of the signifier repeated at two levels, S_1, S_1 again.

92 S_1 is the dam. The second S_1, down below, is the pond that receives it and turns the turbine. There is no other meaning to the conservation of energy than this mark of an instrumentation that signifies the power of the master.

What is collected in the fall has to be conserved. This is the first of the laws. There is unfortunately something that disappears in the interval, or more exactly does not lend itself to a return to, to restoring, the starting point. This is the so-called Carnot-Clausius principle, although a certain Mayer contributed to it substantially.

Doesn't this discourse which, essentially, gives primacy to everything at the beginning and at the end and neglects everything in between, which may be of the order of something arising from knowledge, placing these pure numerical truths, that which is countable, on the horizon of a new world signify, all by itself, something completely different from the increasing role of absolute knowledge? Isn't this very ideal of a formalization in which henceforth everything is merely to be counted—where energy itself is nothing other than what is counted, than what, if you manipulate the formulas in a certain way, always turns out to add up to the same total—the rotation, the quarter turn, here? Doesn't this make it the case that in the place of the master an articulation of completely new knowledge, completely reducible formally, is established, and that in the slave's place there emerges, not something that might be inserted in no particular way into this order of knowledge, but something which is its product instead?

Marx denounces this process as spoliation. It's just that he does it without realizing that its secret lies in knowledge itself, just as the secret of the worker himself is to be reduced to being no longer anything but a value. Once a higher level has been passed, surplus jouissance is no longer surplus jouissance but is inscribed simply as a value to be inscribed in or deducted from the

of an essentially transformed nature. The worker is merely a unit of value—an indication for those for whom this term produces an echo.*

What Marx denounces in surplus value is the spoliation of jouissance. And yet, this surplus value is a memorial to surplus jouissance, its equivalent of surplus jouissance. "Consumer society" derives its meaning from the fact that what makes it the "element," in inverted commas, described as human is made the homogeneous equivalent of whatever surplus jouissance is produced by our industry—an imitation surplus jouissance, in a word.

Moreover, that can catch on. One can do a semblance of surplus jouissance—it draws quite a crowd.

If I wanted to give you matter for your dreams about where this process, of which our science is the status, begins I would tell you, since I reread it recently, to amuse yourselves with the Satiricon.

I didn't find what Fellini did with it bad. What he will never be forgiven for is having made a mistake in writing "Satyricon," whereas there is no "y," but apart from that, it's not bad. It's not as good as the text, because in the text you are serious, you don't stop at the images and you see what it's all about. In a word, it's a good example for drawing the distinction between what the master is and what the rich are.

What is marvelous in the discourses, whichever discourse it may be, even the most revolutionary, is that they never say things directly, as I have just been trying to—a bit. I do what I can.

From time to time I stick my nose into a stack of authors who are economists. And we can see the extent to which this is of interest for us analysts, because if there is something that remains to be done in analysis, it is to institute this other field of energetics, which would demand other structures than those of physics, and which is the field of jouissance.

You can unify the thermodynamic and the electromagnetic fields as much as you want, if you are a Maxwell. You nevertheless run into a difficulty with the field of gravitation, and it's fairly curious because it's with gravitation that everybody started—but, in the end, that doesn't matter. As for what comes from the field of jouissance—which, sadly, will never be called the Lacanian field, for I will surely not have the time even to sketch out the bases, but I have wanted to—there are some remarks to be made.

* In France the number of courses or subjects that one takes for a degree are calculated in terms of unités de valeur.

94 One opens the book by a certain Smith, The Wealth of Nations, and he is not alone, they are all there, Malthus, Ricardo, and others, racking their brains—what is the wealth of nations? There they are, trying to define use value, that must count, exchange value—it's not Marx who invented all that. Now, it is extraordinary that ever since there have been economists nobody, up till now, has—not even for an instant, I am not saying this in order to stop here—ever made this remark that wealth is the property of the wealthy. Just like psychoanalysis which, as I said one day, is done by psychoanalysts, this is its principal characteristic, you have to begin with the psychoanalyst. Why not, concerning wealth, begin with the wealthy?

I have to stop in two minutes time, but all the same I am going to make a remark to you that stems from an experience that is not particularly that of an analyst, but is one that anybody could have.

The wealthy have property. They buy, they buy everything, in short—well, they buy a lot. But I would like you to meditate on this fact, which is that they do not pay for it.

One imagines that they pay, for reasons of accounting that stem from the transformation of surplus jouissance into surplus value. But first, everyone knows that they very regularly add on surplus value. There is no circulation of surplus value. And, very much in particular, there is one thing that they never pay for, and that is knowledge.

In effect, not only is there the dimension of entropy in what takes place on the side of surplus jouissance. There is something else as well, as someone has noticed, which is that knowledge implies an equivalence between this entropy and information. Of course, it's not the same, it's not so simple, as M. Brillouin says.[8]

The wealthy are masters—and this is what I ask you to go and look for in the Satiricon—only because they have redeemed themselves. The masters in question on the horizon of ancient Greece are not businessmen. See how Aristotle speaks of them—they disgust him.

On the other hand, when a slave has redeemed [racheté] himself he is a master only in that he has begun to risk everything. Indeed this is how a character, who is none other than Trimalchio himself, puts it in the Satiricon. Why is it that once he has become rich he can buy everything without 95 paying for it? Because he will have nothing to do with jouissance. That is not what he repeats. He repeats his purchase. He buys everything again or, rather, whatever turns up, he buys. He is cut out to be a Christian. He is, by destiny, the redeemed.

And why does one let oneself be bought by the wealthy? Because what they give you stems from their essence of wealth. Buy from the wealthy, from a developed nation, you believe—and this is what the meaning of the wealth of nations is—that you are simply going to share in the level of a rich nation. However, in the process, what you lose is your knowledge, which gave you your status. The wealthy acquire this knowledge on top of everything else. It's simply that, precisely, they don't pay for it.

We have arrived at the limit today of what I am able to say before we vacate the auditorium. I will merely raise, and I will end with this, the question of what can happen with the promotion, the vocal reprise, of the nature of surplus jouissance, of a, at the level at which the function of the wealthy operates, the one for which knowledge is only a tool of exploitation. This is, in some way, what the analyst's function gives something like the dawn of.

I will try to explain to you next time what its essence is. It is certainly not to refashion this element into an element of mastery.

In effect, as I will explain to you, everything hinges on failure.

BEYOND THE OEDIPUS COMPLEX

The castrated master

THE MASTER SIGNIFIER DETERMINES CASTRATION

SCIENCE, MYTH, THE UNCONSCIOUS

DORA AND HER FATHER

UNUSABLE OEDIPUS

It must be beginning to dawn on you that the other side of psychoanalysis is the very thing that I am putting forward this year under the title of master's discourse.

I am not doing this in an arbitrary way, this master's discourse already has its letters of credit in the philosophical tradition. Nevertheless, in the way I am trying to uncover it, it takes on, here, a new light by virtue of the fact that in our day it so happens that it can be uncovered in a sort of purity—and this, through something that we experience directly, and at the level of politics.

What I mean by this is that it embraces everything, even what thinks of itself as revolutionary, or more exactly as what is romantically called Revolution with a capital R. The master's discourse accomplishes its own revolution in the other sense of doing a complete circle.

This evaluation is a bit aphoristic, I agree, but it is made, as is the destiny of aphorisms, so as to illuminate in a simple flash. On its horizon there is the fact, which interests us, by which I mean you and me, that this master's discourse has only one counterpoint, the analytic discourse, which is still so inappropriate.

I call it counterpoint because its symmetry, if one exists—and one does—is not around a line, nor around a plane, but around a point. In other words, it is obtained by completing the circle of this master's discourse I was referring to a moment ago.

The layout of these four terms, the two numbered Ss, $, and a, as I rewrote them last time, and whose transcription I hope that you more or 100 less all still have in your notes, sufficiently displays this symmetry in relation to a point, which makes it the case that the psychoanalytic discourse is quite precisely located at the opposite pole from the master's discourse.

In psychoanalytic discourse it sometimes happens that we see certain terms that serve as a filum in an explanation, that of the father for instance. And it sometimes happens that we see someone try to draw the major elements together—a painstaking task when carried out from within what, at the point we have come to, one expects from a psychoanalytic utterance [énoncé] and statement [énonciation], that is to say, from within a genetic reference.

Concerning the father one thinks one is obliged to begin with childhood, with identifications, and then it's something that can tend toward extraordinary nonsense, a strange contradiction. One will speak about primary identification as what binds the child to the mother, and indeed this seems self-evident. However, if we refer to Freud, to his work of 1921 called Group Psychology and the Analysis of the Ego, it is quite precisely the identification with the father that is given as primary.[1] This is certainly very odd. Freud indicates there that, completely primordially, the father happens to be the one who presides over the very first identification, precisely in that in a privileged way he is the one who deserves to be loved.

This is very odd, to be sure, and is to be placed in contradiction with everything that the development of analytic experience is found to have established concerning the primacy of the child's relationship with the mother. There is an odd discordance between Freudian discourse and the discourse of psychoanalysts.

Perhaps these discordances are the result of confusion, and the order I am trying to introduce by referring to configurations of discourse that are in some way primordial is there to remind us that it is strictly unthinkable to state anything that is at all ordered in analytic discourse unless one bears the following in mind. Our effort is, as we know perfectly well, a reconstructive collaboration with whoever is in the position of the analysand whom we are, in some way, enabling to embark upon his career. To be effec-101 tive this effort, which we make to extract, in the form of imputed thought, what has in effect been lived by him who, on this occasion, well deserves the title of patient, must not make us forget that by virtue of the signifier connection the subjective configuration has a perfectly mappable objectivity which founds the very possibility of the assistance we bring in the form of interpretation.

There, at a given point of the link, namely the altogether initial one between S_1 and S_2, it is possible for this fault we call the subject to open.

[1] See Sigmund Freud, SE 18 (1921):100.

There, the effects of the link, which as it happens is a signifier link, operate. Whether this lived experience [vécu] that is more or less correctly called thought is or is not produced somewhere, something is produced there that derives from a chain, exactly as though it were thought. Freud is never saying anything else when he speaks of the unconscious. This objectivity not only induces but determines this position, which is that of the subject, as the focus of what is called the defenses.

What I am advancing, what I am going to announce that is new today, is that in expressing itself toward those means of jouissance that are what is called knowledge, the master signifier not only induces but determines castration.

I shall return to what one should understand by "master signifier," starting from what we have put forward on this topic.

At the outset, surely, there aren't any. All signifiers are in some sense equivalent, if we just play on the difference of each from all the others, through not being the other signifiers. But it's for the same reason that each is able to come to the position of master signifier, precisely because its potential function is to represent the subject for another signifier. This is how I have always defined it. However, the subject it represents is not univocal. It is represented, undoubtedly, but also it is not represented. At this level something remains hidden in relation to this very same signifier.

The game of the psychoanalytic discovery is played out around this. Like any other, it has been prepared for. It has been prepared for by this hesitation—which is more than a hesitation—this ambiguity, maintained under the name of dialectic by Hegel, when it was found to have been posited at the outset that the subject asserts himself as knowing himself.

Hegel has the courage to set out, in effect, from Selbstbewusstsein in its most naïve formulation [énonciation], namely that all consciousness knows that it is consciousness. And yet he interweaves this departure point with a 102 series of crises—Aufhebung, as he puts it—from which it results that this very Selbstbewusstsein, the inaugural figure of the master, finds its truth in the work of the other par excellence, in the other who only knows himself through having lost this body, this very body he supports himself with, because he wanted to retain it for its access to jouissance—in other words, the slave.

How can one not try to break this Hegelian ambiguity? How can one not attempt to take a different path, starting out from what is given to us in analytic experience, which it is always a matter of returning to in order to grasp it better?

More simply, it concerns the fact that there is a use of the signifier that we can define by starting out from the master signifier's split from this body we have just mentioned, the body lost by the slave, which becomes nothing other than the body in which all the other signifiers are inscribed.

It is in this sort of way that we might illustrate the knowledge that Freud defines by placing it between the enigmatic parentheses of the Urverdrängt—which means precisely what has not had to be repressed because it has been repressed from the start. This headless knowledge, if I can put it like that, is indeed a politically definable fact, structurally definable. Consequently, everything that is produced through work—I mean this in the strict, full sense of the word "produced"—everything that is produced concerning the truth of the master, namely what he as subject hides, is going to join company with this knowledge insofar as it is split off, urverdrängt, insofar as it is split off and nobody understands a thing about it.

There you have what, I hope, rings true for you—without your knowing whether it's ringing on the left or on the right. This is initially structured in what has been called the mythical support of certain societies. We can analyze them as ethnographic, that is to say, as escaping the master's discourse, to the extent that the latter begins with the predominance of the subject as, in fact, tending to be supported only by this ultrareduced myth of being identical with his own signifier.

This is where I indicated to you last time what in mathematics has an affinity with this discourse, where A represents itself, without any need for a mythical discourse to give it its relations. This is how mathematics represents the master's knowledge insofar as it is constituted on the basis of other laws than those of mythical knowledge.

103 In short, the master's knowledge is produced as knowledge that is entirely autonomous with respect to mythical knowledge, and this is what we call science.

Last time I sketched this out for you by briefly mentioning thermodynamics and, later, the total unification of the field of physics. This unification rests on the preservation of a unit that is nothing other than a constant that is always rediscovered in the calculation—I will not even say in the quantification—by an operation on figures, that is, one defined in such a way as to make this constant appear in the calculation every time. There you have what alone supports what is called, at the foundation of physical science, energy.

This support stems from the fact that mathematics is constructible only on the basis of the fact that the signifier is capable of signifying itself. The A that you have written down on one occasion can be signified by its repetition as A. Now, this position is strictly untenable, it constitutes a violation of the rules with respect to the function of the signifier, which can signify anything except, surely, itself. It is this initial postulate that one must throw off in order for the discourse of mathematics to get started.

Between the two, the original violation and the construction of the discourse of energetics, the discourse of science only sustains itself, in logic, by making truth a play of values, by radically avoiding its entire dynamic power. In effect, the discourse of propositional logic is, as has been stressed, fundamentally tautological. It consists in ordering propositions composed in such a way that they are always true, whatever the value, true or false, of the elementary propositions. Isn't this to rid oneself of what I have just been calling the dynamism of the work of truth?

Well then, the analytic discourse is specified, is distinguished by the fact that it raises the question of what the use is of this form of knowledge which rejects and excludes the dynamics of truth.

A first approximation—its use is to repress what inhabits mythical knowledge. But, excluding the latter at the same time, it knows [connaît] nothing more about it except in the form of what we rediscover under the species of the unconscious, that is, as the debris of this knowledge [savoir] in the form of disjointed knowledge. What is reconstructed out of this disjointed knowledge will in no way make its way back into the discourse of science, nor into its structural laws.

That is to say that here I am distancing myself from what Freud has said on this. This disconnected knowledge, such as we find it in the uncon- 104 scious, is foreign to the discourse of science. And, precisely in this respect, it is striking that the discourse of the unconscious imposes itself. It imposes itself precisely by virtue of the fact I articulated the other day in this form—and you have to believe that, if I employed it, I didn't find anything better—that it doesn't bullshit. As stupid as this discourse of the unconscious is, it is responding to something that stems from the institution of the discourse of the master himself. This is what is called the unconscious. It imposes itself upon science as a fact [fait].

This fabricated [faite], that is to say artificial [factice], science is unable to misrecognize what appears to it as an artifact, this is true. It's just that it is prohibited, precisely because it is the master's science, from raising the question of the artisan, and this will make the fact all that much more of a fact.

Very shortly after the last war—I had already been born quite some time before—I took into analysis three people from the high country of Togo, who had spent their childhood there.[2] Now, I was unable, in their analysis, to find any trace of their tribal customs and beliefs, which they had not forgotten, which they knew, but from the point of view of ethnography. It has to be said that everything was done to separate them from this, given what they were, these courageous little doctors who were trying to insert themselves into the medical hierarchy of the metropolis—these were still colonial days. What they knew about this, then, at the level of the ethnographer was more or less that of journalism, but their unconscious functioned according to the good old rules of Oedipus. This was the unconscious that had been sold to them along with the laws of colonization, this exotic, regressive form of the master's discourse, in the face of the capitalism called imperialism. Their unconscious was not that of their childhood memories—you could sense it—but their childhood was retroactively lived out in our famil-ial categories—spell the word how I showed you to last year. I defy any analyst whatever, even one who has been out into the field, to contradict me.

It is not psychoanalysis that can be used to conduct an ethnographic inquiry. That said, the said inquiry has no chance of coinciding with autochthonous knowledge, unless it be through reference to the discourse of science. And unfortunately, the said inquiry has not the slightest idea about this reference, since it would be obliged to relativize it. When I say that one cannot understand an ethnographical inquiry through psycho-105 analysis, I certainly have the agreement of all ethnographers. I will have their agreement less if I say that, in order to have a bit of an idea about the relativization of the discourse of science, that is to say, in order to have perhaps a slight chance of conducting a correct ethnographical inquiry, one must, I repeat, not proceed by way of psychoanalysis, but perhaps, if there is such a thing, be a psychoanalyst.

Here, at this crossroads, we state that what psychoanalysis enables us to conceptualize is nothing other than this, which is in line with what Marxism has opened up, namely that discourse is bound up with the interests of the subject. This is what, from time to time, Marx calls the economy, because these interests are, in capitalist society, entirely commercial. It's just that since the market is linked to the master signifier, nothing is resolved by denouncing it in this way. For the market is no less linked to this signifier after the socialist revolution.

I am now going to spell out the essential [propres] functions of discourse, according to my way of stating them.

$$\frac{\text{master signifier}}{\text{subject}} \qquad \frac{\text{knowledge}}{\textit{jouissance}}$$

This putting into operation of discourse is defined by a split, precisely by differentiating out the master signifier with respect to knowledge.

In societies that are called primitive, insofar as I describe them as not being dominated by the master's discourse—I am saying this for the benefit of anyone who would like to know a bit more about it—it is quite likely that the master signifier can be located by means of a more complex economy. Indeed, the best sociological research in the field of these societies verges on doing this. We should be delighted, particularly as it is no accident that the master signifier functions more simply in the master's discourse.

It can be completely manipulated by means of this relation between S_1 and S_2 that you see written there. In this discourse the subject finds himself, along with all the illusions that this comprises, bound to the master signifier, whereas knowledge brings about his insertion into jouissance. 106

Well then, this year I will make this contribution—these functions that are specific to discourse are able to find different sites. This is what their rotation around these four places defines, which as you see are in no way designated by letters here, but only by what, whenever necessary, I call "top," "left-hand side," "bottom," and "right-hand side."

I will add, a bit late in the piece, in order to enlighten those who will have designated them through the effect of a bit of nous, that here for instance we have desire, and on the other side the site of the Other. This represents what I spoke about, in an ancient register, at a time when I used to be happy with this sort of approximation, when I said that man's desire is the Other's desire.

The place underneath desire represents the place of truth. Under the Other it is the place where loss is produced, the loss of jouissance from which we extract the function of surplus jouissance.

$$\frac{\text{desire}}{\text{truth}} \qquad \frac{\text{Other}}{\text{loss}}$$

This is where the hysteric's discourse gets its price from. It has the merit of maintaining in the discursive institution the question of what the sexual relation is, namely how a subject is able to maintain it or, to express it better, is unable to maintain it.

As a matter of fact, the answer to the question of how he is able to maintain it is the following—leave speech to the Other, and precisely as locus of repressed knowledge.

What is interesting is the truth that what is in sexual knowledge is entirely yielded up as foreign to the subject. This is what in Freudian discourse was originally called the repressed.

But this is not what matters. Taken in its pure form this has no other effect, if one can say this, than a justification of obscurantism—truths that are important to us, and more than slightly, are condemned to obscurity.

This is not the case at all. I mean that the hysteric's discourse does not testify to the fact that what is inferior is down below. On the contrary, as a battery of functions it is indistinguishable from those assigned to the master's discourse. And this is what enables the same letters that are in the 107 service of the latter to appear there—$, S_1, S_2, and a.

$$\begin{array}{ll} $ & \rightarrow \quad S_1 \\ a & \quad\ S_2 \end{array}$$

It's simply that the hysteric's discourse reveals the master's discourse's relation to jouissance, in the sense that in it knowledge occupies the place of jouissance. The subject himself, the hysteric, is alienated from the master signifier as he whom this signifier divides—"he," in the masculine, represents the subject—he who refuses to make himself its body. People speak about somatic compliance with respect to hysterics. Although the term is Freud's, can't we see that it is very odd, and that it's more a question of the body's refusal? In following the effect of the master signifier, the hysteric is not a slave.

Let's give him the gender under which this subject is most often embodied. She, in her own way, goes on a kind of strike. She doesn't give up her knowledge. She unmasks, however, the master's function, with which she remains united, by emphasizing what there is of the master in what is the One with a capital "O," which she evades in her capacity as object of his desire. This is his true function which a long time ago we located, at least in the field of my school, under the title of idealized father.

I won't beat about the bush. I'll mention Dora—one has to—which I presume everyone who has come here to listen to me is familiar with.[3]

You must read Dora and throughout all the convoluted interpretations—I use the very term Freud gives for the economy of her maneuvers—not lose sight of something that I would go so far as to say Freud covers with his prejudices.

I am making a little detour. Whether you have the text in your head or not, consult it, and you will see these sentences that for Freud seem to be self-evident—for instance, that a girl can sort out these little difficulties all on her own or, even, when a man throws himself at her, she still mustn't create a scene over it, when one is a nice girl, of course. And why? Because this is how Freud thinks. Or again, and this goes even further, that a nor-108 mal girl should not be disgusted when someone puts the hard word on her. That seems to be self-evident. You have to recognize the operation of what

I am calling a prejudice in a certain way of approaching what is revealed here by our Dora.

If this text has nevertheless retained some of the reference points I am trying to induct you into, you will see that it will not seem illegitimate to you yourselves to pronounce this word "convoluted" that I uttered just before. Perhaps the extraordinary subtlety, the astuteness, of these reversals, the multiple planes of which, as Freud explains, refract Dora's maneuvers, as I call them, in matters of love across three or four successive defenses, so as to echo what Freud himself designated in his text Die Traumdeutung, will make apparent to you that there these convolutions depend on a particular approach.

Along the lines of what I announced at the start of my discourse today on the father, that the subjective conjuncture of its signifying articulation receives a certain kind of objectivity, why not begin with the fact that Dora's father, the pivotal point of the entire adventure, or misadventure, is strictly a castrated man, I mean as concerns his sexual potency? It is obvious that he has had it, that he is quite unwell.

In every case, from Studien über Hysterie onward, the father is himself made out of symbolic appreciation. After all, even an ill person or a dying person is what he is. To consider him as deficient in relation to a function in which he is not occupied is to give him, properly speaking, a symbolic affectation. It is implicitly to proffer that the father is not merely what he is, that it is a title like "ex-soldier"—he is an "ex-sire." He is a father, like the ex-soldier, until the end of his life. This implies that in the word "father" there is something that is always in fact potentially creating. And it is in relation to this fact that, in this symbolic field, it must be observed that it is the father, insofar as he plays this pivotal, major role, this master role in the hysteric's discourse, that, from this angle of the power of creation, sustains his position in relation to the woman, even as he is out of action. This is what is specific to the function from which the hysteric's relation to the father stems, and it is very precisely this that we designate as the idealized father.

I told you I wouldn't beat about the bush. I am taking Dora and I am 109 asking you to reread the case after me in order to see whether what I am saying is true. Well then, how does what is organized within Herr K., whom I shall curiously call here the third man, suit Dora?

I have been saying it for a long time, but why don't we take it up again, cleaving to the structural definition such as we can give it with the help of the master's discourse? What suits Dora is the idea that he has the organ.

Freud sees this and he indicates very precisely that it's what plays the decisive role at the outset, in Dora's initial run-in, if I can put it like this, with Herr K. when she was fourteen, and when the other corners her in a window recess.[4] In no way does this affect relations between the two families. Moreover, nobody thinks of being astonished by it. As Freud says, a girl works this sort of thing out on her own. What is curious is that, as it happens, she does not work it out on her own, she puts everyone else on the spot—though later.

Well, why "the third man"? To be sure, it's the organ which gives him his price, not so that Dora can find happiness in it, if I can put it thus, but so that another woman should deprive him of it.

What Dora is interested in is not the jewel, even indiscreet. Recall this observation that lasts for three months, and which is entirely meant for serving as a cupule for two dreams. The first dream, the one called the dream of the jewel box, bears this out—it isn't the jewel, it's the box, the envelope of the precious organ, there you have the only thing she gets jouissance out of.

She knows very well how to get jouissance from it herself, as is borne out for us by the decisive importance of infantile masturbation, whose mode moreover is in no way indicated in the observation, unless it's that it is probable that it had some relationship with what I will call the fluid, flowing rhythm, the model of which is enuresis. In her history her enuresis is given to us as belatedly induced by her brother's, who, a year and a half older than her, had got to eight years of age affected by enuresis so that she, in a way, belatedly takes up the running.

This enuresis is completely characteristic and is like a stigma, as it were, of the imaginary substitution of the child for the father, specifically as 110 impotent. Here I invoke everyone who, from their own experience with children, can gather such episodes, for which it is quite frequent to seek the intervention of an analyst.

Add to this the theoretical contemplation of Frau K., if I can put it this way, such as it unfolds in Dora's resting, openmouthed, before the Dresden Madonna. It is Frau K. who knows how to sustain the idealized father's desire, but also how to contain the respondent, if I can put it like this, and at the same time how to deprive Dora of it, who thus finds herself doubly removed from his grasp. Well then, by virtue of this, this complex is the mark of the identification with a jouissance qua the master's jouissance.

A little aside. It is not nothing to recall the analogy that has been made between enuresis and ambition. But let us confirm the condition imposed upon Herr K.'s presents—they have to be a box. He never gives her anything else, a jewel box. For she is the jewel. His jewel, his indiscreet jewel as I was saying before, if only it would go and lodge itself elsewhere, and that this be known. Whence the rupture whose meaning I marked a long time ago, when Herr K. says to her, "My wife means nothing to me." It is quite true that at this moment the Other's jouissance is offered her, and she doesn't want to have anything to do with it because what she wants is knowledge as the means of jouissance, but in order to place this knowledge in the service of truth, the truth of the master that she embodies as Dora.

And this truth, to say it at last, is that the master is castrated.

In effect, if the sole jouissance to represent happiness, which last time I defined as perfectly closed, the jouissance of the phallus, were to dominate this master—you see the term I am using, the master is only able to dominate by excluding her—then how would the master establish this relationship with knowledge—the knowledge held by the slave—the benefit of which is the buildup of surplus jouissance? The master can only dominate him through excluding this jouissance.

Moreover, the second dream indicates that the symbolic father is indeed the dead father, that one accedes to him only through an empty place that is without communication. Recall the structure of this dream, the manner in which she receives the announcement by her mother, "Come if you like," the mother says, as if echoing the fact that Frau K. invited her, the other time, to come to the place where all the scenes that we have mentioned must have taken place with her husband. "Come if you like, your father is dead, and he is being buried"—and the manner in which she takes herself there, without it being possible to know in the dream by what means she manages to get to a place about which she has to wonder whether this is 111 really the place where her father dwells, as if she didn't know the answer.[5]

Well then, in this empty box of an apartment deserted by those who, having invited her, have for their part left to go to the cemetery, Dora easily finds her substitute for this father in a big book, the dictionary, the one where one learns about sex.[6] She indicates clearly there that what matters to her, even should this be beyond the death of her father, is that he produce knowledge. And not just any knowledge knowledge about the truth.

This will be sufficient for her, in the psychoanalytic experience. She will get enough satisfaction from getting everybody to acknowledge this truth to which Freud carefully helps her—and this is what attaches her to him. The true state of affairs concerning her father's relations with Frau K., and concerning her own relations with Frau K., everything that the others wanted to bury concerning episodes that were nevertheless perfectly authentic, and were episodes of which she makes herself the representative—all of that is necessary, which is sufficient for her to conclude, with dignity, what has gone on in the analysis, even if Freud does not appear at all satisfied with its outcome concerning her destiny as a woman.

There would be a few minor remarks to make in passing, which won't be in vain.

For instance, concerning the jewelery dream, where Dora is leaving because of the threat of fire, Freud, pausing in the analysis, tells us that one must not forget that a dream stands on two feet, and that it is not sufficient that it represent a decision, a lively desire, by the subject as to the present. There must be something that gives it support in a desire from childhood. And here, he takes as his reference—this is usually taken as a display of elegance- -the entrepreneur, the entrepreneur of decisions, in his relationship to the capitalist whose accumulated resources, the capital of libido, will enable this decision to pass into action.

These are things that look like they are a metaphor. Isn't it amusing to see how this takes on a different value after what I have been telling you concerning the relationship between capitalism and the function of the master—concerning the altogether distinct nature of what can be done with 112 the process of accumulation in the presence of surplus jouissance—in the very presence of this surplus jouissance, to the exclusion of the big fat jouissance, plain jouissance, jouissance that is realized in copulation in the raw? Isn't this precisely where infantile desire gets its force from, its force of accumulation with respect to this object that constitutes the cause of desire, namely that which is accumulated as libido capital by virtue, precisely, of infantile non-maturity, the exclusion of jouissance that others will call normal? There you have what suddenly gives Freud's metaphor its proper connotation when he refers to the capitalist.

But on the other hand, if through his lucid courage Freud happened to carry a degree of success with Dora to term, nevertheless, I would say, his clumsiness as regards retaining his patient is no less clearly in evidence.

Read these few lines in which, in some way despite himself, Freud indicates the extraordinary lengths which are, good heavens, staggering, pathetic, he goes on to tell himself that perhaps, by showing more interest in her—and God knows he shows her plenty of it, the entire case demonstrates it- -he would no doubt have succeeded in getting her to take further this exploration into which- it cannot be said on his own admission—he did not manage to lead her without making mistakes.

Thank heavens Freud didn't do this. Fortunately, in giving Dora these satisfactions of being interested in what he felt as her demand, her demand for love, he didn't take, as is customary, the mother's place. For one thing is certain. Isn't it to this experience, however much it could have altered his attitude subsequently, that we owe the fact that Freud observed—and he drops his head, he is discouraged by it—that everything he was ever able to do for hysterics ends in nothing other than what he pins down as Penisneid? Which means, explicitly, when it is spelled out, that where this ends is in the girl's reproaching her mother for not having created her a boy, that is, in carrying forward onto the mother, in the form of frustration, what, in its meaningful essence, and in such a way that it gives the hysteric's discourse its place and its living function with respect to the master's discourse, is divided into, on the one hand, the castration of the idealized father, who yields the master's secret, and, on the other hand, privation, the assumption, by the subject, whether feminine or not, of the jouissance of being deprived.

And why did Freud fall into error at this point, whereas, if my analysis of today is to be believed, he only had literally to chew over what was being hand-fed to him? Why did he substitute this myth, the Oedipus complex, for the knowledge that he gathered from all these mouths of gold, Anna, 113
Emma, Dora?

The Oedipus complex plays the role of knowledge with a claim to truth, that is to say knowledge that is located in the figure of the analyst's discourse in the site of what just before I was calling the site of truth.

$$\begin{array}{ccc} a & \rightarrow & $ \\ \overline{S_2} & & \overline{S_1} \end{array}$$

If all analytic interpretation has taken the path of gratification or non-gratification, of a response or not to demand, in short, the path toward an ever-increasing eluding, in favor of demand, of what is the dialectic of desire, metonymic sliding when it is a question of assuring the constant object, it is probably a function of the strictly unusable character of the Oedipus complex. It is odd that this did not become clearer more quickly.

And in effect, who uses, what place is held by this reference to this famous Oedipus complex? I ask all those here who are analysts to reply. Those who are from the Institute never use it, to be sure. Those from my school make some small effort. Of course, this doesn't yield anything, it comes down to the same thing as for the others. It is strictly unusable, except as this coarse reminder of the mother's value as an obstacle to all investment in any object as the cause of desire.

Whence the extraordinary ruminations that analysts come to concerning the "combined parent," as they say. That means only one thing—constructing an A as receiver of jouissance, one generally called God, with whom it is worth the effort of playing double or quits with surplus value, that is, this functioning called the superego.

I am spoiling you today. I hadn't produced this word before. I had my reasons. I had to get at least to the point I am at so that what I stated last year about Pascal's wager could become operative.

Perhaps some of you will have guessed—the superego is exactly what I was beginning to spell out in telling you that life, this provisional life that is 114 played out in favor of a chance of eternal life, is the a, but that it is only worth the effort if the A is not barred, in other words, if it is everything at once. However, just as the combined parent doesn't exist, there is the father on one side and the mother on the other, so the subject also doesn't exist, it is equally divided in two, as it is barred, as, in a word, it is the response designated in my graph to the utterance—this seriously calls into question whether one can play at doubling surplus enjoyment or nothing with eternal life.

Yes, this recourse to the myth of Oedipus is really quite sensational. It is worth making the effort to elaborate this. And I was thinking of getting you today to appreciate what is outrageous in the fact that Freud, for example, in the last of the New Introductory Lectures on Psychoanalysis, should think he had cut the question of the rejection of religion off from any acceptable horizon, should think that psychoanalysis has played a decisive role in this, and should believe that it was the end of the matter when he has told us that the support of religion is nothing other than this father whom the child has recourse to in its childhood, and who he knows is all loving, that he anticipates, forestalls what may manifest itself within him as malaise.

Isn't this an odd thing when one knows how things in fact are with the father's function? To be sure, this is not the only point at which Freud presents us with a paradox, namely, the idea of referring this function to some kind of jouissance of all the women, when it is a well-known fact that a father barely suffices for one of them, and even then—he mustn't boast about it. A father has, with the master—I speak of the master as we know him, as he functions—only the most distant of relationships since, in short, at least in the society Freud was familiar with, it is he who works for everybody. He has responsibility for the "famil" I was speaking of before. Isn't that sufficiently strange to suggest to us that after all what Freud retains in fact, if not in intention, is very precisely what he designates as being the most essential in religion, namely, the idea of an all-loving father? This is indeed what is designated by the first of the three forms of identification that he distinguishes in the article I mentioned before—the father is love, the first thing to be loved in this world is the father. Strange vestige. Freud believes that this will make religion evaporate, whereas it is really the very substance of it that he preserves with this strangely composed myth of the father.

We shall come back to this, but you can all see the main thread—it all ends with the idea of the murder, namely that the original father is the one 115 whom the sons have killed, after which it is through the love of this dead father that a certain order unfolds. In all its enormous contradictions, in its baroqueness and its superfluousness, doesn't this seem to be nothing but a defense against these truths that the abundance of all these myths clearly spells out, well before Freud diminishes these truths in opting for the myth of Oedipus? What is there to conceal? That, as soon as the father enters the field of the master's discourse where we are in the process of orientating ourselves, he is, from the origins, castrated.

This is what Freud gives us the idealized version of, and it is completely masked. However, the experience with the hysteric, if not her sayings, at least the configurations she presented him with, should have guided him better here than the Oedipus complex does and led him to consider that this suggests that, at the level of analysis itself, everything is to be put back into question concerning what is necessary from knowledge, in order for this knowledge to be called into question in the site of truth.

There you have the aim of what I am trying to unpack for you here this year.

THE MASTER'S PURE KNOWLEDGE

THE MALAISE OF THE ASTUDIED

GENEALOGY OF SURPLUS VALUE

THE FIELD OF BULLSHITTING

THE OEDIPUS COMPLEX, FREUD'S DREAM

The formulation I tried to give you of the discourse of analysis locates it on the basis of the master's discourse, which is what, via all sorts of traces, at first sight, it manifests itself as already related to.

Or rather analysis draws its importance from the fact that the truth of the master's discourse is masked.

Among the four places in which are situated the articulating elements on which I found the consistency that can emerge when these discourses are put into relationship with one another, the place I have designated as that of truth is only distinguishable if we look at how things function with what comes out of that articulation in that place. This is not peculiar to it, the same can be said of all the others.

The localization that consisted until now of designating the places as "upper right" or "upper left" and so forth are of course not satisfactory. It is question of a level of equivalence of functioning. For example, one could thus write that what is the S_1 in the master's discourse can be said to be congruent with, or equivalent to, what comes and functions as S_2 in the university discourse, in what I have qualified as such so as to focus the mind, or at least the mental accommodation.

118 The place in question will be said to function as the place of orders, of the command, whereas the place that is subjacent to it in my various little four-legged schemas is the place of truth, which does indeed pose its own problem.

At the level of the master's discourse, in effect, the place on the lower left can be occupied only by this $, which, in truth, initially nothing necessitates, occupied only by what in the first instance does not quietly place itself as identical with itself. I will say that this is the principle, not of mastered, but of "master-ized" discourse, with a hyphen, the principle of discourse insofar as acting the master is to think of oneself as univocal.

And surely it is psychoanalysis that leads us to say that the subject is not univocal. Two years ago, when I was trying to characterize the psychoanalytic act—a trajectory that has remained broken down and, like others, will never be taken up again—I gave you the resounding formulation, "Either I am not thinking or I am not." This alternative, simply through being produced, comes to play a role, and a fairly resounding one, as soon as the master's discourse is at issue.

Nevertheless, in order to justify this formulation, we still need to produce it, moreover, where it is simply evident. It has to be produced in the dominant place in the hysteric's discourse in order for it to be in effect quite certain that the subject is confronted by this "vel" that is expressed in the "either I am not thinking or I am not." There where I am thinking I do not recognize myself, I am not, this is the unconscious. There where I am, it is all too clear that I am lost.

In truth, presenting things in this way shows that, if this has remained obscure for such a long time at the level of the master's discourse, it is precisely because it has been in a place which, by virtue of its very structure, masked the division of the subject.

What have I said, in effect, about any possible saying [dire] in the place of truth? The truth, I have been saying, can only be stated via a half-saying [mi-dire], and I have given you a model for it in the enigma. For this is how it is always presented to us, and certainly not in the form of a question. The enigma is something that presses us for a response in the name of a mortal danger. Truth is a question, as has been known for a long time, only for the administrators. "What is truth?" We know by whom that was, on one good occasion, eminently pronounced.

But this form of half-saying that truth restricts itself to is one thing, and 119 this division of the subject which takes advantage of this to mask itself is another. The division of the subject is something quite different. If "where he is not, he is thinking," if "where he is not thinking he is," it is indeed because he is in both places. And I would even say that this formulation of the Spaltung is improper. The subject partakes of the real precisely in that it is impossible, apparently. Or, to put it better, if I had to employ a figure that doesn't occur here by chance, I would say that the case with it is like that of the electron, where the latter is proposed to us as being at the intersection of the wave theory and the corpuscular theory. We are forced to admit that it's as one and the same that it passes through two separate holes at the same time. The order, therefore, of what we characterize by the Spaltung of the subject is different from the one that commands that truth can only be figured through being stated in a half-saying.

Something appears here that it is important to stress. From this very ambivalence, taking the word up in another sense, through which truth is figured only as a half-saying, each of the formulas on the basis of which a discourse can be located takes singularly opposite senses.

Is this discourse good, is it bad? I pin it down as the university discourse intentionally, because it is, in a way, the university discourse that shows where it is capable of sinning, but in its fundamental disposition it is, equally, the one that shows what guarantees the discourse of science.

S_2 occupies the dominant place in that it is this place of the order, the command, the commandment, this place initially held by the master, that knowledge has come to occupy. Why does it come about that one finds nothing else at the level of its truth than the master signifier, insofar as it brings the master's order?

This is what the current movement of science depends on, after it hesitated for a moment, which we have evidence for in Gauss, for instance, when we see in his dairies that he had come close to the remarks that a Riemann subsequently put forward, and made the decision not to release them. "One doesn't go any further." Why put this knowledge into circulation, even though it's purely logical, if it seems that on this basis, much that is in a state of rest may effectively be disturbed by it?

It is clear that we are no longer at the same point. This stems from progress, from this seesaw that I describe as a quarter turn, which brings an unnatural knowledge out of its primitive localization at the level of the slave into the dominant place, by virtue of having become pure knowledge of the master, ruled by his command.

Who, in our day, is capable of dreaming even for an instant of arresting the movement of articulation of the discourse of science in the name of anything at all that could come out of it? Things are already at that stage, for heaven's sake. They have shown where we are headed, from molecular structure to atomic fission. Who can think for even one instant that it would be possible to stop that which, through an interplay of signs, and by overthrowing content in favor of changing combinatory places, incites the theoretical attempt to put oneself to the test of the real, in a manner which, through revealing the impossible, brings about a new power?

It is impossible not to obey the commandment there in the place of what is the truth of science, "Continue. March on. Keep on knowing more and more."

Very precisely, every question about the truth of this sign, about the fact that the sign of the master occupies this place, is properly speaking quashed, and in particular every question about what may be veiled by this sign, the S_1 of the command, "Keep on knowing," about what this sign, through occupying this place, contains that is enigmatic, about what this sign that occupies this place is.

In the field of these sciences that courageously call themselves human sciences we see clearly that the command, "Continue to know," creates a bit of a stir. In effect, as in all the other little squares or schemas with four legs, it is always the one up here on the right that does the work—and thus gets the truth to emerge, for this is the meaning of work. In the master's discourse this place is occupied by the slave, in the discourse of science it is the a student.

One might play around with this word, perhaps it might revitalize the question a bit.

A while ago we saw him compelled to continue to know on the level of physical science. On the level of the human sciences we see something for which a word would have to be made. I don't know yet if this is the right 121 one, but off the cuff, initially, instinctively, for its assonance, I would say, "astudied."

If I bring this word into our vocabulary, I would have more chance than when I wanted the name of the floor mop changed. "Astudied" has more justification at the level of the human sciences. The student feels "astudied." He is "astudied" because, like any worker—get your bearings from the other little orders—he has to produce something.

My discourse happens to give rise to responses that bear some relationship to him. It's a rare occurrence, but it happens from time to time, and it gives me pleasure. When I came to the École normale it so happened that there were some young people who started discoursing on the subject of science, which I had made the object of the first of my seminars in 1965. It was pertinent, this subject of science, but it is clearly not self-evident. They got rapped over the knuckles and it was explained to them that the subject of science doesn't exist, and not at the very point at which they thought they had made it emerge, namely in the relation between zero and one in Frege's discourse. It was demonstrated to them that the progress of mathematical logic had enabled the subject of science to be completely reduced—not sutured but vaporized.

The unease of the astudied is, however, not unrelated to the fact that they are nevertheless requested to constitute the subject of science with their own skin—which, on the latest account, seems to present a number of difficulties in the zone of the human sciences. And it is thus that, for a science so well founded on the one hand, and so obviously triumphant on the other, triumphant enough for it to be qualified as human, no doubt because it takes humans for humus, things happen that land us on our feet again, and bring us into contact with what follows from the fact that the pure and simple command, that of the master, is substituted at the level of truth.

Don't think that the master is always there. It's the command that remains, the categorical imperative, "Keep on knowing." There is no longer any need for anybody to be present. We have, as Pascal says, all embarked upon the discourse of science. It remains the case that the half-saying nevertheless happens to be warranted by the obvious fact that, concerning the human sciences, nothing holds together.

I would like to arm myself against the idea that could emerge in some retarded little brain, that my propositions would imply that one should restrain this science and that, all things considered, if we return to Gauss's
122 attitude, there may perhaps be some hope of salvation. These conclusions, if they were imputed to me, could be very correctly characterized as reactionary. I point them out because it is not unthinkable that, in zones that, in truth, I am not very disposed to frequent, one might deduce this sort of misunderstanding from what I am currently telling you. It would, however, be necessary to get into one's head the idea that in whatever it might be that I am articulating with a particular aim of clarification, there is not the slightest idea of progress, in the sense in which this term might imply a happy outcome.

What truth, when it emerges, has that is resolvent can from time to time be fortunate—and then disastrous in other cases. One fails to see why truth would always necessarily be beneficial. You would have to have the devil in you to imagine such a thing, when everything demonstrates the contrary.

Concerning the position called that of the analyst—in cases that are moreover improbable, for is there even a single analyst? Who knows? But one can raise it theoretically—it is the object a itself that comes to the place of the command. It's as identical with the object a, that is to say with what presents itself for the subject as the cause of desire, that the psychoanalyst offers himself as the end point for this insane operation, a psychoanalysis, insofar as it sets out on the trace left by the desire to know.

I said at the start that this desire to know, the "epistemological drive" is the name they have invented for it, isn't self-evident. It was a matter of seeing where it could have emerged from. As I pointed out, it wasn't the master who invented that all on his own. Someone must have imposed it upon him. It wasn't the psychoanalyst, who, good heavens, has not always been in evidence. And moreover, it is not he that instigates it, he offers himself as the end point for anyone who gets bitten by this particularly problematic desire.

We shall return to this. In the meantime, let me point out that in the structure of what's called the analyst's discourse, the analyst, you see, says to the subject, "Off you go, say everything that comes into your head, however divided it might be, no matter how clearly it demonstrates that either you are not thinking or else you are nothing at all, it may work, what you produce will always be admissible [recevable]." 123

Odd. Odd for reasons that we will have to punctuate, but which we can begin to sketch out now.

You have been able to see, on the upper line of the structure of the master's discourse, a fundamental relationship, which is, to state it quickly, the one that forms the link between master and slave, by means of which, Hegel dixit, the slave will over time demonstrate his truth to him—also by means of which, Marx dixit, he will have been occupied during all this time in fomenting his surplus jouissance.

Why does he owe this surplus jouissance to the master? This is what is masked. What is masked at the level of Marx is that the master to whom this surplus jouissance is owed has renounced everything, and jouissance first up, because he has exposed himself to death, and because he remains firmly fastened to this position whose Hegelian articulation is clear. He has deprived the slave of the disposal of his body, to be sure, but this is nothing, he has left him his jouissance.

How does jouissance come back within the master's reach and express his demand? I think I explained it well in its time, but I will pick it up again, because the things that are important cannot be repeated too often. The master in all this makes a small effort to make everything work, in other words, he gives an order. Simply by fulfilling his function as master he loses something. It's at least through this something lost that something of jouissance has to be rendered to him—specifically, surplus jouissance.

If, by means of this relentlessness to castrate himself that he had, he hadn't computed this surplus jouissance, if he hadn't converted it into surplus value, in other words if he hadn't founded capitalism, Marx would have realized that surplus value is surplus jouissance. None of this, of course, prevents it being the case that capitalism is founded by him, and that the function of surplus value is designated with complete pertinence in its devastating consequences. Nevertheless, to get on top of it, one would per-124 haps need to know at least what the initial stage of its articulation is. It's not because one nationalizes the means of production at the level of socialism in one country that one has thereby done away with surplus value, if one doesn't know what it is.

In the master's discourse, since it is, all the same, there that surplus jouissance is situated, there is no relationship between what will more or less become the cause of desire for a character like the master who, as usual, fails to understand anything about it and what constitutes his truth. As a matter of fact, there is a barrier here, on the lower level.

$$\begin{array}{ccc} S_1 & \rightarrow & S_2 \\ $ & \blacktriangle & a \end{array}$$

The barrier which we are within reach of naming at the level of the master's discourse is jouissance, quite simply insofar as it is prohibited, prohibited fundamentally. One takes jouissance by morsels, but as for going right to the end, I have already told you how that is embodied—no need to reactivate lethal fantasies.

This formula, as defining the master's discourse, has the interest of showing that it is the only one that makes possible this articulation that we have pointed out elsewhere as fantasy, insofar as it is a relationship a has with the division of the subject—($$ \diamond a$).

In its fundamental beginning the master's discourse excludes fantasy. And that's what makes him, fundamentally, completely blind.

The fact that fantasy can emerge elsewhere, and specially in analytic discourse where it stretches out along a horizontal line in a completely balanced way, tells us a bit more about the foundation of the master's discourse.

Be that as it may for the moment, taking things up again at the level of the analyst's discourse, notice that it's knowledge—that is to say the whole articulation of existing S_2, everything that can be known—that is, in my way of writing—I am not saying in the real—put in the place called the place of truth. What can be known is, in the analyst's discourse, invited to function in the register of truth.

125 We get the sense that this is of interest to us, but what on earth does it mean? I have not made this detour into what is current today for nothing. The low level of tolerance, let us say, for the fact that knowledge in the form known as science, modern science, has taken off at a gallop is what can perhaps, without our always understanding much further than the end of our nose, make us sense that surely, if, somewhere, we have an opportunity for it to make sense to question knowledge in terms of truth, it must be in our little turnstile, at least if we are prepared to trust it.

I am saying this in passing. It's for instance what justifies my saying that since at one time they gagged me when I was about to speak about the names of the father I will never talk about them again. That seems to be teasing, not nice. And then—who knows?—there are even people, science fanatics, who tell me, "Keep on knowing. But what? But you have to say what you know about the names of the father!!" No, I will not say what the name of the father is, precisely because I am not part of the university discourse.

I am a little analyst, a rejected stone initially, even if in my analyses I become the cornerstone. As soon as I get up off my chair I have the right to go for a walk. That is reversed, the rejected stone which becomes a cornerstone. It may also be, inversely, that the cornerstone goes for a walk. It's even like that that I will perhaps have some chance that things will change. If the cornerstone left, the entire edifice would collapse. There are some who are tempted by this.

Well, let's not joke about it. I simply cannot see why I should speak about the name of the father, since, in my own way, where it is placed, that is to say at the level at which knowledge functions as truth, we are properly speaking condemned to only being able, even on this point, still vague for us, about the relationship between knowledge and truth, to declare anything at all—take note—through a half-saying.

I do not know whether you sense the import of this. It means that if we say something in a certain way in this field there will be another part of it which, by virtue of this saying itself, will become absolutely irreducible, completely obscure. In such a way that, in sum, there is a degree of arbitrariness, there is a choice that can be made about what is in need of clarification. If I do not speak about the name of the father, this will enable me 126 to speak of other things. This will not be unrelated to the truth, but it's not as it is for the subject—it won't be the same.

Let's return to what we observe about what knowledge becomes in the place of truth, in the analyst's discourse.

I don't think you have been waiting for what I am going to tell you now for it to appear for you. You must all the same remember that what occurs there at the start has a name—it's myth.

To see this one hasn't had to wait for the master's discourse to fully develop and reveal its last word in the capitalist's discourse, with its curious copulation with science. This has always been observed and, in any case, it's the totality of what we see where truth is concerned, the first truth in any case, the one that is of some interest to us a bit all the same, even though science makes us renounce it by giving us only its imperative, "Keep on knowing in a certain field"—a curious thing, in a field that is in some discord with what concerns you, my good man. Well then, it's occupied by myth.

Myth has today been made a branch of linguistics. I mean that what one says that is most serious about myth comes out of linguistics.

I can only recommend on this, in Structural Anthropology, a collection of articles by my friend Claude Lévi-Strauss, that you refer to chapter 11, "The Structure of Myths."[1] You will see the same thing there obviously expressed as what I am telling you, namely that truth is supported only by a half-saying.

The first serious examination that one makes of these large units, as he calls them, for they are mythemes, obviously yields this, which I do not impute to Lévi-Strauss, for I am leaving to one side what he writes literally. The impossibility of connecting groups of relations—it is a question of bundles of relations, as he defines myths—with one another is overcome, or, more exactly, replaced by the affirmation that two mutually contradictory 127 relations are identical, this being so insofar as each is, like the other, self-contradictory. In short, half-saying is the internal law of every species of enunciation of the truth, and what incarnates it best is myth.

One can all the same declare oneself not to be altogether satisfied that we are still, in psychoanalysis, dealing with myth. Do you know what effect the use of the central typical myth of psychoanalytic discourse, the Oedipus myth, has had upon the mythographers? I think that you can all answer this question. It's quite amusing.

There are people who have been occupied with myths over a good period of time. No one had waited for our dear friend Claude Lévi-Strauss, who has contributed an exemplary clarity, in order to take a very lively interest in the function of myth. There are circles in which one knows what a myth is, even if one does not necessarily define it as I have just tried to situate it for you—even though it is difficult to admit that even the most obtuse operator does not see that everything that can be said about myth is this, that the truth reveals itself in an alternation of strictly opposite things, which have to be made to revolve around one another. This holds for whatever has been constructed ever since the world has been the world, including the higher, very elaborate, myths like Yin and Yang.

One can bullshit a lot over myths, because it is precisely the field of bullshitting. And bullshitting, as I have always said, is truth. They are identical. Truth enables everything to be said. Everything is true—on condition that you exclude the contrary—except that it nevertheless plays a role that it be like that.

Well, the Oedipus myth such that Freud made it function—I can tell you for the sake of those who are unaware of this—makes the mythographers inclined to laugh. They find this completely baseless.

Why is this privilege being given to this myth in analysis? The first serious study that it has been possible to make of it shows that it is much more complicated, moreover. As if by chance, Claude Lévi-Strauss, who does not refuse the challenge, states the complete myth of Oedipus in this same article. One can see that it concerns something quite different from whether or not one is going to fuck one's mummy.

It is curious nevertheless that, for example, an altogether good mythographer, with a good head, from the right school, from the right stream that begins with Boas and has converged upon Lévi-Strauss, a certain Kroeber, 128
after having written an inflammatory book on Totem and Taboo has, twenty years later, written something that makes it known that all the same this must indeed have its raison d'être, that there was something in it, he wasn't able to say what, moreover, and that in this myth of Oedipus there was a bone.[2] He doesn't say any more than this but, given the critique he made of Totem and Taboo, it's altogether noteworthy. It had been bothering him, having spoken so ill of it was plaguing him, above all when he saw that that was spreading, namely that the latest student believed he was able to join in the chorus—he couldn't bear that.

Totem and Taboo. One would need—I don't know if you want me to do it this year—to study how it is composed, it is one of the most twisted things one can imagine. It's not at all the case that because I preach a return to Freud I cannot say that Totem and Taboo is twisted. It's even for this reason that one has to return to Freud—it's in order to perceive that if it's twisted in this way, given that he was a chap who knew how to write and think, there must be a good reason for it. I would not like to add, "Moses and Monotheism, don't even mention it!" because, on the contrary, we are going to talk about it.

You can see that all the same I am putting things in order for you, even though I have not begun by giving you any kind of well-worn path. I have done it entirely by myself, to be sure—nobody helped me—so that we know what formations of the unconscious are, for example, or the object relation. One could think that now I am simply making little somersaults around Freud. That's not what it's about.

Let's try to cotton onto, ever so little, something of what the Oedipus myth is about in Freud. As I do not rush, I won't get to the end of it today. I don't see why I should wear myself out. I speak with you as it comes to me, and we shall see where, slowly, slowly, it leads us to.

I will start at the end and give you my aim straightaway, because I don't see why I shouldn't lay down my cards. It wasn't quite like this that I was counting on speaking to you, but at least it will be clear.

I am not at all saying that the Oedipus complex is of no use, nor that it has no relationship with what we do. It is of no use for psychoanalysts, that's true, but as psychoanalysts are not clearly psychoanalysts, this doesn't prove anything. Psychoanalysts are becoming increasingly involved in something which is, in effect, excessively important, namely the mother's role. For heaven's sake, I have already begun to examine these things.

The mother's role is the mother's desire. That's fundamental. The mother's desire is not something that is bearable just like that, that you are indifferent to. It will always wreak havoc. A huge crocodile in whose jaws you are—that's the mother. One never knows what might suddenly come over her and make her shut her trap. That's what the mother's desire is.

Thus, I have tried to explain that there was something that was reassuring. I am telling you simple things, I am improvising, I have to say. There is a roller, made out of stone of course, which is there, potentially, at the level of her trap, and it acts as a restraint, as a wedge. It's what is called the phallus. It's the roller that shelters you, if, all of a sudden, she closes it.

These are things that I have expounded in their own time, at a time when I spoke to people one had to treat gently, psychoanalysts. They had to be told things crudely, like that, so that they would understand. Moreover, they didn't understand. I spoke therefore about this level of the paternal metaphor. I have only ever spoken of the Oedipus complex in that form. That should be a bit indicative, don't you think? I said that it was the paternal metaphor, whereas this is nevertheless not how Freud presents things to us. Above all he clings strongly to what actually happened, this blessed story of the murder of the father of the horde, this Darwinian buffoonery.

130 The father of the horde—as if there has ever been the slightest trace of it, this father of the horde. We have seen orangutans. But not the slightest trace has ever been seen of the father of the human horde.

Freud holds that this was real. He clings to it. He wrote the entire Totem and Taboo in order to say it—it necessarily happened, and it's where everything began. Namely, all those little shitty things—including being a psychoanalyst.

It's striking—someone could have got a little bit excited about this paternal metaphor and known how to make a little hole. This is what I have always desired, that someone should make some progress, make a trace for me, begin to show a little path. Anyway, be that as it may, it has never happened, and the question of Oedipus is intact.

I am going to make some preliminary remarks for you, because the thing really does have to be hammered home. This history can't be whisked away. There's something that we are very used to, trained in, in analytic practice, which is these stories of manifest content and latent content. That's our experience.

For the analysand who is there, in the $, the content is his knowledge. We are there in order to get to the point where he knows everything that he does not know even as he knows it. That's what the unconscious is. For the psychoanalyst the latent content is on the other side, in S_1. For him the latent content is the interpretation that he is going to give, insofar as it is, not this knowledge that we discover in the subject, but what is added on to it to give it a sense. This remark could be useful for some psychoanalysts.

Let's leave this manifest content and this latent content to one side for the moment, except for retaining the terms. What's a myth? Don't all answer at once. It's a manifest content.

This is not enough to define it, and we defined it differently before. But it is clear that, if it is possible to put a myth on index cards that one then stacks up to see what combinations unfold, this is the manifest order. Two myths are, one in relation to the other, exactly like these little machines that you can turn around through ninety degrees and get results. They are not latent, my little letters on the blackboard, they are manifest. Well, what's that doing there? The manifest content has to be put to the test. And, having done this, we shall see that it is not so manifest as all that.

Let's proceed like that—I am proceeding as best I can—let's recount 131 the story.

The Oedipus complex as it is recounted by Freud when he refers to Sophocles is not at all treated like a myth. It's Sophocles' story minus, as you will see, its tragic component. According to Freud what Sophocles' play reveals is that one sleeps with one's mother when one has killed one's father—murder of the father and jouissance of the mother, to be understood in the objective and the subjective senses, one enjoys the mother and the mother enjoys. The fact that Oedipus absolutely does not know that he has killed his father, nor that he causes his mother to enjoy, nor that he enjoys her, changes nothing about the question, since, precisely, it is a fine example of the unconscious.

I think I have been pointing out the ambiguity that there is in the use of the term "unconscious" for long enough. As a substantive it's something that in effect has the repressed representative of representation as its support. One can say that this poor Oedipus was unconscious, in the adjectival sense. There is an equivocation there, the very least one can say. However that may be, this does not disturb us. But, in order for it not to disturb us one has to see what the things mean.

There is the myth of Oedipus, then, borrowed from Sophocles. And then there is this cock-and-bull story I was speaking about earlier, the murder of the father of the primal horde. It is quite curious that the result is exactly the contrary.

The old daddy had the women all to himself, which already is incredible—why would he have them all to himself?—whereas there are other blokes around, nevertheless, perhaps they too might have their own little idea. They kill him. The consequence is completely different from the myth of Oedipus--for having killed the old man, the old orang, two things happen. I place one of them in brackets, for it is incredible—they discover that they are brothers. Well, that may give you some idea of what brotherhood is about, I will give you a little elaboration, something temporary—we will have the time perhaps to return to it before we part this year.

The energy that we put into all being brothers very clearly proves that we are not brothers. Even with our brother by birth nothing proves that we are his brother—we can have a completely opposite batch of chromosomes.
132 This pursuit of brotherhood, without counting the rest, liberty and equality, is something that's pretty extraordinary, and it is appropriate to realize what it covers.

I know only one single origin of brotherhood—I mean human, always humus brotherhood—segregation. We are of course in a period where segregation, ugh! There is no longer any segregation anywhere, it's unheard of when you read the newspapers. It's just that in society—I don't want to call it "human" because I use terms sparingly, I am careful about what I say, I am not a man of the left, I observe—everything that exists, and brotherhood first and foremost, is founded on segregation.

No other brotherhood is even conceivable or has the slightest foundation, as I have just said, the slightest scientific foundation, unless it's because people are isolated together, isolated from the rest. It is a matter of grasping its function, and of knowing why it is like this. But, in the end, that it is like this jumps out at you, and acting as if it weren't true must, necessarily, have drawbacks.

What I said just then was half-saying. I am not telling you why it is like this. Initially it's because, if I say this is how it is, I am unable to say why it's how it is. That's an example.

Be that as it may, they discover they are brothers, one wonders in the name of what segregation. This is to say that the myth is more like a fable. And then, they all decide, with one mind, that no one will touch the little mummies. Because there is more than one of them, to top it off. They could exchange, since the old father had them all. They could sleep with their brother's mother, specifically, since they are only brothers through their father.

No one ever seems to have been flabbergasted by this curious thing, the extent to which Totem and Taboo has nothing to do with the current use of the Sophoclean reference.

Moses is the limit. Why does Moses have to be killed? Freud gives an explanation, and it's the richest of them all—it's so that Moses will return among the prophets, via repression no doubt, via mnesic transmission through chromosomes, he is forced to admit.

The remark made by an imbecile like Jones that Freud does not appear to have read Darwin is accurate. He had read him, however, since it's on Darwin that he bases himself so as to carry Totem and Taboo off.

It's not for nothing that Moses and Monotheism, like everything else Freud 133 writes, is absolutely fascinating. If one is independent-minded, one can say that it makes absolutely no sense at all. We will speak about it again. What is certain is that what the prophets are about does not have anything at all to do, this time around, with jouissance.

Let me point out to you—and, who knows? perhaps someone could do me this favor—that I went off in search of the book that serves as a basis for what Freud says, namely the work of a certain Sellin published in 1922, Mose und seine Bedeutung für die israelitisch-jüdische Religionsgeschichte.

This Sellin is not unknown. I obtained Die Zwölf Propheten. He begins with Hosea [Osée]. He's a minor one, but a daring one [osé]—so daring, it seems, that he is the one in whom one finds a trace of who is supposed to have murdered Moses.

I must tell you that I haven't waited to read Sellin before reading Hosea, but never in my entire life have I been able to procure this book for myself, and I am starting to become obsessed by it. It's not in the Bibliothèque nationale, it's not in the Alliance israélite universelle, and I have turned all Europe upside down to get it. I still believe, though, that I will manage to get my hands on it. If any of you had it in your pocket, you might bring it to me at the end of the seminar, I would return it to you.

In Hosea there is one thing that is quite clear. This text Hosea is extraordinary. I don't know how many people there are here who read the Bible. I can't say that I was brought up on the Bible, because I was raised a Catholic. I regret it. But then, I don't regret it, in this sense that when I read it now—well, "now" is a fair while ago—it has a fantastic effect upon me. This familial delusion, these entreaties by Yahweh to his people, which contradict one another from one line to the next, it makes you sit up and take note.

One thing is certain, all relations with women are [. . .], as he says in his strong language. I will write it in Hebrew on the blackboard for you, in very beautiful letters. It's "prostitution," znunim.

134 Addressing Hosea, this is the only thing it's about—his people have prostituted themselves definitively. Prostitution covers more or less everything that surrounds him, the entire context. What the master's discourse uncovers is that there is no sexual relation, I have already put this to you in strong terms. Well then, one has the idea that our chosen people found themselves in a bit of a pickle where things were very probably different, where there were sexual relations. This is probably what Yahweh calls prostitution. In any case, it is quite clear that, if it's the spirit of Moses that returns here, it is not exactly an issue of a murder which has engendered access to jouissance.

All of this is so fascinating that no one has ever seemed to realize—it would doubtless have seemed too immediate, too stupid to make these objections, and moreover they are not objections, we are fully into our subject—that the prophets, in the final analysis, never mention Moses. One of my best students made this remark to me—it has to be said that she is a Protestant, to the point where she had noticed this a long time before I did. But above all, they absolutely do not speak of this thing that, for Freud, seems to be the key, namely that the god of Moses is the same god as the god of Akhenaton, a god who is supposed to be One.

As you know, very far from this being the case, the god of Moses simply says of the other gods that one must not have relations with them, but he does not say that they do not exist. He says that one must not hasten toward idols, but, after all, he's referring to idols that represent him, as was certainly the case of the Golden Calf. They were expecting a god, they made a Golden Calf, that was quite natural.

We can see that there is a completely different relationship there, which is a relationship with truth. I have already said that truth is the little sister of jouissance, we will have to come back to this.

What is certain is that the crude schema murder of the father—jouissance of the mother totally elides the tragic mainspring. To be sure, it's through murdering the father that Oedipus finds free access to Jocasta, and that this is granted to him, to popular acclaim. Jocasta, as I have always said, knew something about this, because women do not lack these little pieces of information. She had there a servant who had been present during the whole affair, and it would be curious if this servant, who returned to the palace and who is found at the end, hadn't said to Jocasta, "He's the one who blew your husband away." Be that as it may, it's not important. What's important is that Oedipus was admitted to Jocasta's side because he had triumphed at a trial of truth. 135

We shall come back to the enigma of the Sphinx. And then, if Oedipus comes to a very sticky end—we will see what this "comes to a very sticky end" means, and to what extent that's called coming to a sticky end—it's because he absolutely wanted to know the truth.

It is not possible seriously to examine the Freudian reference without bringing the dimension of truth to bear, along with murder and jouissance.

That's where I can leave you today.

It's simply that, seeing how Freud articulates this fundamental myth, it is clear that it is truly incorrect to put everything in the same basket as Oedipus. What in God's name, so to speak, does Moses have to do with Oedipus and the father of the primal horde? There really must be something there that stems from the manifest content and the latent content.

To finish up for today, I would say that what we propose is to analyze the Oedipus complex as being Freud's dream.

From myth to structure

TRUTH, CASTRATION, AND DEATH

THE FATHER, A STRUCTURAL OPERATOR

THE DEAD FATHER IS JOUISSANCE

ACT AND AGENT

THE HYSTERIC WANTS A MASTER

A person in this audience saw fit, and I thank her for it, to be so kind as to season what I said last time with a certain disappointment. This person has, as she put it, given me the pleasure—pleasure, as you know, is the law of least effort—of having preceded me down a pathway that I am said to have opened.

The person in question—I can see she is smiling, she is present, why not name her, Marie-Claire Boons—sent me, then, a little offprint from a highly interesting journal called L'Inconscient. I have reasons for not having read her article before. This journal, in effect, in which there have been some very good things, I must say, is not even distributed to me, paradoxically perhaps because of this very fact that in principle, at least in its editorial committee, it used to base itself on [s'autorisait de] my teaching. My attention having been drawn to this issue on "Paternity," I first read the article by Marie-Claire Boons with great care, and then read another one by our friend Conrad Stein.[1]

I am quite prepared, if Marie-Claire Boons wants, to take her article today as a text for commentary, and a number of questions might arise concerning the path she takes over the father's murder in Freud. I believe, as a matter of fact, that it would easily appear that there is nothing in it that anticipates what I have already advanced concerning the Oedipus complex by the date at which she published this article—advanced, I said, very modestly.

138 There is another method, which is that today I try to go further by showing that this is already implied in the careful progress I have made up till now. Then, perhaps, at a second stage, on the occasion of one of our gatherings, what I would like to say will retroactively become clearer than if I were just to leave you hanging concerning the different points in an article which, in effect, from many aspects presents a sort of introduction, questioning, and, if you will, preparation.

You may express a wish here for one or other of these two methods—I give the floor to Marie-Claire Boons.

I will proceed in the second way, then.

The father's death. In effect, everyone knows that this appears to be the key to, the vital point for everything that is stated, and not only in the name of myth, concerning what psychoanalysis is about.

By the end of her article Marie-Claire Boons would even give us to understand that many things flow from this death of the father and notably a certain something that would make it the case that in some way psychoanalysis frees us from the law.

Fat chance. I am well aware that this is the register in which a libertarian hook supposedly attaches itself to psychoanalysis.

I think that this is not at all the case, and this is the entire meaning of what I am calling the other side of psychoanalysis.

The father's death, insofar as it echoes this statement with its Nietzschean gravity, this statement, this good news, that God is dead, does not seem to me to be of a kind to liberate us, far from it. The first plank in the proof of this is indeed Freud's own utterance. Quite rightly, at the start of her article Marie-Claire Boons draws our attention to what I was already saying two seminars ago, that the announcement of the death of the father is far from incompatible with the motivation for religion that Freud proposes in the name of an analytic interpretation of the latter. Namely, religion itself reposes on something that Freud quite astonishingly puts forward as primary, which is that it is the father who is recognized as deserving of love. There is already the indication of a paradox here, which leaves the author I have just named in a certain difficulty concerning the 139 fact that, in sum, psychoanalysis would prefer to maintain, to preserve, the field of religion.

Here, too, it can be said that this is not at all the case. The pinnacle of psychoanalysis is well and truly atheism, provided one gives this term another sense than that of "God is dead," where all the indications are that far from calling into question what is in play, namely the law, it is consolidated instead. A long time ago I observed that for the sentence of old father Karamazov, "If God is dead, then everything is permitted," the conclusion that forces itself upon us in the text of our experience is that the response to "God is dead" is "Nothing is permitted anymore."

To clarify this point whose horizon I am announcing for you, let's start with the death of the father, allowing that Freud did declare it to be the key to jouissance, to jouissance of the supreme object identified with the mother, the mother as the object of incest.

It is certainly not as an attempt to explain what sleeping with the mother means that the murder of the father is introduced into Freudian doctrine. On the contrary it's on the basis of the father's death that the prohibition of this jouissance is established in the first place.

As a matter of fact, it is not just the father's death that is at issue, but the father's murder, as the person I am speaking of also put it very well in the title of her investigation. It's here, in the Oedipus myth as it is stated for us, that the key to jouissance is found. But if this is in fact how this myth—we are examining it closely—is presented to us in its statement [énoncé], I have already said that it is appropriate to treat the latter for what it is, namely manifest content. By virtue of this fact one has to begin by expounding it properly.

The Oedipus myth, at the tragic level at which Freud appropriates it, clearly shows that the father's murder is the condition of jouissance. If Laius is not brushed aside—in the course of a struggle in which, moreover, it is far from certain that by this step Oedipus is going to accede to jouissance of the mother—if Laius is not brushed aside then there will not be any jouissance. But does he obtain it at the price of this murder?

It's here that the principal thing is presented, and because the reference is taken from a myth enacted in tragedy, it becomes all important. He obtains it in the name of the fact that he has delivered the people from a question that is decimating its best by seeking to answer what presents itself 140 as an enigma, that is to say, what is represented as being supported by this ambiguous being of the Sphinx, in whom strictly speaking a double disposition is incarnated, by virtue of being made, like the half-saying, from two half-bodies. By answering, Oedipus finds himself—this is the ambiguity—suppressing the suspense that the question of truth thus introduces among the people.

He has surely no idea of the extent to which the answer he gives to that question anticipates his own drama, nor of the extent to which, through his making a choice, this answer perhaps falls into the trap of truth. It's man. Who knows what man is? Is it to say everything about him to reduce him to the process—and how ambiguous it is in the case of Oedipus—which makes him go first on all fours, then on the two hind ones—in which Oedipus, like his entire line, is characterized, as Claude Lévi-Strauss has very well pointed out, by not walking straight—then, at the end, with the aid of a stick which, while not the white cane of the blind man, was for Oedipus nonetheless of the most unusual character, this third element being, to give it its name, his daughter Antigone?

Truth has strayed? What does that mean? Is this so as to leave the way open to what for Oedipus will remain the path of return? For the truth will reemerge for him, as this will be because he will again want to intervene in the face of a misfortune that is twice as great this time, no longer decimating his people by the choice of those who volunteer for the Sphinx's question, but striking at all his people in this ambiguous form that is called the plague, and for which the Sphinx is responsible in the themes of Antiquity. This is where Freud points out for us that for Oedipus the question of truth is renewed, and that it ends with what? With this thing that we are able to identify, in a first approximation, with something that at least bears a relationship to the price paid in the form of castration.

Is that really saying everything—given that, in the end, what happens to him is not that the scales fall from his eyes, but that his eyes fall from him like scales? Don't we see Oedipus being reduced to this very object, not by being subject to castration but, as I would prefer to say, by being castration itself?—namely, being what remains when one of the privileged supports of the object, in the form of his eyes, disappears from him.

What does this mean? It can only mean that the question arises whether the price he has to pay is not to be mounted on the throne by the path of succession, but by way of being chosen as the master, for having effaced the 141 question of truth? In other words, introduced to my statement, as you already are, that what constitutes the essence of the master's position is to be castrated, can't you see that here we find, veiled to be sure, but indicated, that what is properly called succession proceeds from castration also.

Given that fantasy is always very curiously indicated by, but never properly attached to, the fundamental myth of the father's murder, then, if castration is what strikes the son, is it not also what brings him to accede, by the right path, to what the function of the father is about? This is indicated in all our experience. And does it not indicate that castration is transmitted from father to son?

Henceforth, what about death, which presents itself as being there at the origin? Do we not have an indication here that it is perhaps a kind of mask? Even though it has emerged from, been experienced in, the analyst's position in the subjective process of the function of castration, isn't there something here that nevertheless hides it, veils it in a certain way, and places it, if one can put it this way, under its aegis?—and thereby saving us from going to the heart of what the analyst's position enables us to state in a final and rigorous manner?

How has this happened? It is not irrelevant to point out that the myth of the father's murder, as essential, is initially encountered by Freud at the level of the interpretation of dreams, where a wish for death appears. Conrad Stein's article produces a remarkable critique of this by picking up the recrudescence of these death wishes with respect to the father at the very moment at which his death became real. In Freud's own words The Interpretation of Dreams emerged from his father's death. Freud thus wished to be guilty for his father's death.[2]

Is there equally here, as the author stresses, the mark of something hidden that might properly speaking be a wish that the father be immortal?

This interpretation is put forward along the lines of analytic psychologism, where it is regarded as a basic presupposition that the essence of the child's position has its foundation in an idea of omnipotence that would place it beyond death. In the hands of an author who does not abandon his 142 presuppositions, this interpretation is, if I may say so, predictable. On the contrary, by criticizing what is said about what the essence of the child's position is, it follows that these wishes for death and what they mask, if indeed they mask anything, have to be explored via another avenue.

And in the first place, in the observations we have to make concerning subjective structure as being dependant upon the introduction of the signifier, can we place at the head of that structure anything at all we could call knowledge [connaissance] of death?

For his line of interpretation, which is that of a denial of death in the name of omnipotence, Conrad Stein makes clever use of Freud's analyses concerning a number of his major dreams, such as the famous request to close the eyes, with the ambiguity of this "an eye" under a bar, which he also produces as the product of an alternative.[3]

But it can also be read in another sense.

It is, in effect, perhaps susceptible to another sense, if we take the last dream in the same series and make it the central one, which I have done in its day.

Freud himself puts the emphasis on a dream that is not his own, but one of his patient's, a dream which goes, "He didn't know he was dead."[4]

I broke this dream down to analyze it, lining it up along the two lines of utterance and statement. This was designed to remind us that one of two things must be true. Either death doesn't exist and there is something that survives, but this does not resolve the question whether the dead know that they are dead. Or there is nothing beyond death, and it is quite certain that, in this case, they do not know it. This is to say that no one knows, no living being in any case, what death is. It is remarkable that spontaneous productions formulated at the level of the unconscious are stated on the basis of this, that, for anyone, death is properly speaking unknowable.

[2] See "Preface to the Second Edition," SE 4:xxvi.

In its day I emphasized that it is indispensable for life that something irreducible does not know—I won't say, "Doesn't know that we are dead," 143 because that's not what we should say, in the name of "we," we are not dead, not all at once in any case, and that's our foundation—but, "Something does not know that I am dead." I am dead, very exactly, insofar as I am destined to die—but, in the name of this something that does not know it, I don't want to know either.

This is what makes it possible for us to place at the center of logic this "all men"—"all men are mortal"—the basis of which is precisely the nonknowledge of death, just as it is what makes us believe that "all men" means something, all men born of a father, who, we are told, insofar as they, the men, are dead do not enjoy what is there for them to enjoy. An equivalence is therefore drawn, in Freudian terms, between the dead father and jouissance. It is he who keeps it in reserve, if I can put it like that.

In the manner in which it is stated, not at the level of the tragic, with all its subtle suppleness, but in the statement of the myth of Totem and Taboo, the Freudian myth draws an equivalence between the dead father and jouissance. This is what we can describe with the term "structural operator."

Here the myth transcends itself through stating in the name of the real—for this is what Freud insists upon, that it actually happened, that it is the real—that the dead father is what guards jouissance, is where the prohibition of jouissance started, where it stemmed from.

The fact that the dead father is jouissance presents itself to us as the sign of the impossible itself. And in this way we rediscover here the terms that are those I define as fixing the category of the real, insofar as, in what I articulate, it is radically distinguished from the symbolic and the imaginary—the real is the impossible. Not in the name of a simple obstacle we hit our heads up against, but in the name of the logical obstacle of what, in the symbolic, declares itself to be impossible. This is where the real emerges from.

In effect, there beyond the Oedipus myth we recognize an operator, a structural operator, which is called the real father—with, I would say, this property that in the name of a paradigm, it is also the promotion, at the heart of the Freudian system, of what the father of the real is, which places a term for the impossible at the center of Freud's utterance [énonciation].

144 That is to say, Freud's utterance has nothing to do with psychology. No psychology of this original father is conceivable. However, in the way in which it is presented it evokes derision, and I don't need to repeat what I said about this at the last seminar—he who enjoys all the women is inconceivable to imagine, whereas it is fairly normally observable that being enough for one is already quite a lot. We are referred here to a completely different reference, that of castration, as soon as we have defined it as the principle of the master signifier. By the end of today's discourse I will have shown you what that can mean.

The master's discourse shows us jouissance as coming to the Other—it is he who has the means for it. Anything that is language only obtains jouissance by insisting to the point of producing the loss whereby surplus jouissance takes body.

First, language, including the language of the master, cannot be anything other than a demand, a demand that fails. It is not from its success, it is from its repetition that something of another dimension is engendered, which I have described as a loss—a loss whereby surplus jouissance takes body.

This repetitive creation, this inauguration of a dimension by which everything the analytic experience can be judged by is ordered, may equally well start out as an original impotence—to be explicit, the child's impotence, a far cry from its omnipotence. If it has been possible to see that psychoanalysis shows us that the child is the father of the man, it's very much because there has to be, somewhere, something that mediates them, and this is very precisely the instance of the master, insofar as it comes to produce, and this can be any signifier after all, the master signifier.

At a time when I formulated what is involved in the object relation in relation to Freudian structure, I suggested that the real father is the agent of castration.[5] But I only suggested it after I had first of all taken care to uncover what there is that is distinct in the essence of castration, frustration, and privation. Castration is an essentially symbolic function, that is, is conceivable from nowhere else than the articulation of signifiers, frustration is imaginary, privation, as is self-evident, is real.

What can one define as a result of these operations? We have to make the enigma that the phallus poses for us, insofar as it is manifestly imaginary, 145 the object of the first of these operations, castration. It is—why not?—always a question of something very real in frustration, even if the only resource that the claim on which it is founded has is to imagine that one is owed this real, which is not self-evident. It is clear that privation can only be situated with respect to the symbolic, for as far as anything real is concerned, nothing can be lacking—what is real is real, and it has to be from elsewhere that this introduction, which is nevertheless essential, be made, for without it we would not be in the real ourselves, namely that something in it is lacking—and this is what initially characterizes the subject.

I remained less explicit then about the level of the agents, though I did indicate it. The father, the real father, is none other than the agent of castration—and this is what affirming the real father as impossible is destined to mask from us.

What does "agent" mean? Initially, we slip into the fantasy that it is the father who is the castrator. It is very striking that none of the forms of the myth that Freud was attached to give any idea of this. It is not because at some initial hypothetical time, the sons, who were still animals, did not have access to the troop of women that, so far as I know, they are castrated. Castration as the statement [énoncé] of a prohibition can in any case only be founded at a second moment, that of the myth of the murder of the father of the horde, and as this actual myth states, it arises out of nothing other than a common accord, a singular initium whose problematic character I was showing last time.

Equally, the term "act" needs to be picked up here. If, when discussing the psychoanalytic act, what I was able to say about the level of the act is to be taken seriously, that is, if it is true that there can only be an act in a context already replete with everything involving the signifier's effect, its entry into the world, there can be no act in the beginning, at least none that could be described as murder. This myth can have no other sense here than the one I have reduced it to, a statement of the impossible. There can be no act outside a field which is already so completely articulated that the law is located within it. There are no other acts than those that refer to the effects of this signifying articulation and include its entire problematic—with on the one hand whatever loss [chute] the very existence of anything at all that can be articulated as subject entails, or rather is, and with on the other 146 whatever preexists it as a legislative function.

Does the real father's function, then, follow from the nature of the act concerning castration? This is exactly what the term "agent" that I have proposed enables us to put in suspense.

The verb agir, "to act," has more than one resonance in our language, beginning with that of actor. Actionnaire, "shareholder," also—why not, the word is made from action, and this shows you that une action, "a share," is perhaps not quite what one thinks it is. Activiste also—doesn't the activist properly speaking define himself on the basis of the fact that he tends to consider himself to be rather the instrument of something? Actaeon, while we're at it—this would be a good example for anyone who knew what this meant in terms of the Freudian thing. And finally, what one quite simply calls mon agent, "my agent." You can see what this means in general: "I pay him for that." Not even, "I compensate him for having nothing else to do," or "I honor him,"[6] as they say, pretending to begin from the fact that he is capable of doing something else.

This is the appropriate level of the term at which to take both this "real father" and this "agent of castration." The real father carries out the work of the master agency.

We are becoming increasingly familiar with the functions of an agent. We live at a time at which we know what this conveys—fake stuff, advertising stuff, things that are there to be sold. But we also know that it works this way, at the point we have come to in the expansion, the paroxysm, of the master's discourse in a society founded on it.

It is getting late.

I am going to be forced to leave something out here, which I will indicate to you in passing, because we might perhaps return to the matter at hand, which for me is of some value, and which for me does not seem unworthy of our making the effort to clarify. Since I am stressing, giving a very special mark to, the function of agent, some day I will have to show you all the elaborations it can lend itself to by introducing the notion of a double agent.

147 Everyone is aware that in our day this notion is one of the most indisputable, the most certain, objects of fascination. The agent who starts again. He doesn't just want the master's little market, which is the role of each. He thinks that what he is in contact with, namely that everything that has true worth, I mean in the order of jouissance, has nothing to do with the web of intrigues. In his little job it's ultimately this that he conserves.

It's a strange story, one with many implications. The true double agent is the one who thinks that what escapes the web would also have to be arranged [agencé]. Because if that is true, the arrangement is going to become true, and by the same token the first arrangement, the one that was obviously fake, will also become true.

This is most likely what was guiding a character who placed himself, no one knows why, in the function of prototypal agent of this master's discourse, insofar as he allowed himself to keep something whose essence an author, Henri Massis, has profiled by speaking these prophetic words, "Walls are good." Well, someone called Sorgue, with this so Heideggerian name, found a way to be with the Nazi agents, and to make himself a double agent—for whose benefit? For the benefit of the Father of the People, who everyone hopes, as you know, will bring it about that the true will also be arranged [agencé].[7]

The reference I evoke concerning the Father of the People has many links with that of the real father as the agent of castration. As the Freudian statement cannot do otherwise than set out from the master's discourse, if only because it speaks of the unconscious, all Freud can make of this famous real father is the impossible. But then we actually do know this real father—he is something of a completely different order.

First, in general, everybody acknowledges that he is the one who works, and does so in order to feed his little family. If he is the agent of something, in a society that obviously does not give him a big role, it nevertheless remains the case that he has some exceedingly nice aspects. He works. And also he would very much like to be loved.

There is something that shows that the mystagogy that makes him into a tyrant is obviously lodged somewhere quite different. It's at the level of the real father as a construction of language, as Freud always pointed out moreover. The real father is nothing other than an effect of language and 148 has no other real. I am not saying, "other reality," since reality is something quite different, it's what I was talking about a moment ago.

I can even immediately go a little bit further and point out that the notion of real father is scientifically unsustainable. There is only one real father, which is the spermatozoon, and at least up till now, nobody has ever thought to say that he was the son of this or that spermatozoon. Naturally, one can lodge objections, aided by a number of examinations of blood groups, of rhesus factors. But this is quite recent, and it has absolutely nothing to do with anything that up till now has been said to be the function of the father. I sense that I am entering dangerous territory, but too bad—it is, after all, not only in the Aruntas tribes that one could raise the question of what the father really is on an occasion when a woman finds she is pregnant.[8] If there is one question that analysis could raise, it's that one. Why, in a psychoanalysis, would it not be—one suspects that this is the case from time to time—the psychoanalyst who is the real father even if he is in no way the one who has done it, there, on the level of the spermatozoon?

[7] Henri Massis (1886–1970) was a right-wing intellectual who, despite his support for Pétain during the war, was elected to the Académie française in 1960. The "Father of the People" referred to is Marshall Pétain.

[8] An allusion to Ernest Jones, "Mother-Right and the Sexual Ignorance of Savages," International Journal of Psycho-Analysis 6 (1925):109–30.

From time to time one has the suspicion when it concerns a woman patient's relationship with, to be modest about it, the analytic situation that she has finally become a mother. There is no need to be an Arunta to ask oneself questions about what the father's function is.

By the same token we are aware, because this gives a broader perspective, that there is no need to take the reference to analysis, which I have taken as the most burning one, for the same question to arise. One can very well give one's husband a baby, and yet this be someone else's child, even if one hasn't fucked with him, someone, precisely, whom one would have liked to be the father. Yet, it's for that reason that one has had the child.

This takes us, as you see, a little way into the dream, as it were. I am only doing this to wake you up. If I said that what Freud has lucubrated—not, to be sure, at the level of myth, nor at that of the recognition of death wishes in patients' dreams—is a dream of Freud's, it's because, in my opinion, the analyst should tear himself away from the plane of dreams a little.

What analysts have encountered when guided by what is shocking in 149 what Freud introduced, what they have learned from this encounter, has not yet been decanted at all. Last Friday at my patient interviews I presented an ill patient—I don't see why I should say he was ill—to whom certain things had happened, which meant that his encephalogram, as the technician told me, is always on the border of sleep and a waking state, oscillating in such a way that one never knows when he is going to pass from one to the other, and that is where things stand. This is a little bit how I see all our analyst colleagues, and perhaps myself too, in the end. The shock, the traumatism of the birth of analysis leaves them like that. And this is why they spread their wings to try and extract something more precise from the Freudian articulation.

This is not to say that they don't get any closer to it, but what they see is this, for example. It is the position of the real father as articulated by Freud, namely, as impossible, that makes the father necessarily imagined as a depriver. It is not you, nor him, nor me who imagines, it arises from the position itself. It is not at all surprising that we always encounter the imaginary father. It necessarily, structurally depends on something that evades us, which is the real father. And it is strictly out of the question that the real father be defined in any assured manner unless it's as the agent of castration.

Castration is not what every person who psychologizes necessarily defines it as. We saw this appear, it seems, not so long ago at a thesis defense when someone who has decisively chosen the approach of making psychoanalysis the psychopedia we all know said, "For me, you know, castration is only a fantasy." Not so. Castration is a real operation that is introduced through the incidence of a signifier, no matter which, into the sexual relation [rapport du sexe]. And it goes without saying that it determines the father as this impossible real that we have been talking about.

It is now a question of knowing what is meant by this castration, which is not a fantasy, and the result of which is that the only cause of desire is produced by this operation and that fantasy dominates the entire reality of desire, that is to say, the law.

As for dreams, everyone now knows that they are a demand, that they are signifiers at liberty, which insist, which squawk and stamp their feet, which have absolutely no idea what they want. The idea of putting the omnipotent father at the origin of desire is very adequately refuted by the fact that Freud extracted its master signifiers from the hysteric's desire. It must not be forgotten, in effect, that this is where Freud began and that he acknowledged what it is that remains at the center of his question. The fact it has been recorded is made all the more valuable for having been repeated by an ass who had no idea what it meant. It's the question, "What does a woman want?"[9] 150

A woman. Not just any woman. Merely raising the question means that she wants something. Freud didn't say, "What does woman want?" Because after all it is not written down anywhere that woman wants anything at all. I won't say that she will put up with every circumstance. She is put out by every circumstance, Kinder, Küche, Kirche, but there are many others, Culture, Kilowatt, Culbute [somersault, tumble], as someone puts it, Cru et Cuit,[10] all of that suits her equally well. She absorbs them. But as soon as you ask the question, "What does a woman want?" you locate the question at the level of desire, and everyone knows that, for woman, to locate the question at the level of desire is to question the hysteric.

What the hysteric wants—I say this for those who do not have this vocation, there must be a lot—is a master. This is absolutely clear—so much so that you have to wonder whether this isn't where the invention of the master began. This would elegantly bring to a close what we are in the process of tracing out.

She wants a master. That is what resides in the top right-hand little corner, for want of giving it another name. She wants the other to be a master, and to know lots of things, but at the same time she doesn't want him to know so much that he does not believe she is the supreme price of all his knowledge. In other words, she wants a master she can reign over. She reigns, and he does not govern.

[9] The reference is to Marie Bonaparte.

[10] Claude Lévi-Strauss, The Raw and the Cooked (New York: Octagon Books, 1969).

This is where Freud set out from. "She" is the hysteric, but this is not necessarily specific to one sex. As soon as you raise the question, "What does So-and-so want?" you enter the function of desire, and you produce the master signifier.

Freud produced a number of master signifiers, which he covered with the name of Freud. A name can also be used to plug something up. I am astounded that it is possible to associate the idea that at this level there can be some murder or other with this plug of a name of the father, whatever it may be. And how can one believe that analysts are what they are by virtue 151 of a devotion to Freud's name? They are unable to untangle themselves from Freud's master signifiers, that's all. It's not so much to Freud that they adhere as to a number of signifiers—the unconscious, seduction, traumatism, fantasy, the ego, the id, and whatever else you like—there's no question of their leaving that order. They have no father to kill at this level. One is not the father of signifiers, at the very most one is "because of." No problem at this level.

The real mainspring is the following—jouissance separates the master signifier, insofar as one would like to attribute it to the father, from knowledge qua truth. If we take the schema of the analyst's discourse, the obstacle raised by jouissance is found there where I have drawn the triangle, namely, between what can be produced as master signifier, whatever form it may take, and the field that knowledge has at its disposal insofar as it poses as truth.

$$\begin{array}{ccc} \frac{a}{S_2} & \rightarrow & $ \\ & \blacktriangle & S_1 \end{array}$$

And there you have what enables how it truly is with castration to be articulated—it is that even for the child, whatever one might think, the father is he who knows nothing about truth.

I will recommence at this point next time.

152 indicate to the person who so kindly wanted to indicate to me that they were an astudied of the Sorbonne, that I got the Sellin I spoke to you about from Copenhagen, that is, this little book of 1922 which subsequently underwent a degree of rejection, and which is this book around which Freud makes his assurance that Moses was tudied revolve.[11]

I am not aware that many psychoanalysts, apart from Jones and perhaps one or two others, have taken any interest in it.[12] This Sellin, in his text, does deserve to be examined, however, since Freud considered that he carried weight, and it is suitable, naturally, to follow him and put this consideration to the test. It seems to me that this is in line with what I am advancing this year concerning the other side of psychoanalysis. But as I have only had this book for roughly five days, written in a very robust [corsé] German, you will understand that despite the assistance that a number of greater and lesser rabbis—actually, greater, there are no lesser rabbis—have been kind enough to give me, I am not yet ready to give you an account of it today, at least not one that would satisfy me.

Moreover, it so happens that I have been requested—not for the first time, this is an extended request—to reply on Belgian radio, and this by a man, M. Georgin, who, frankly, has evoked my esteem by providing me with a long text which gives at least this proof that he, contrary to many others, has read my Écrits. Good Lord, he got what he could out of it, but it was not nothing, all things considered. Truthfully, then, I was rather flattered. To be sure, this doesn't make me any the more inclined toward this practice that consists in having oneself recorded on the radio—it always wastes a lot of time. However, since it appears that he has taken care to ensure that it takes as little time as possible, I might perhaps agree to it.

The one who will perhaps not agree to it, on the other hand, is he, given that, in order to answer these questions which I will give you three examples of, I did not think I could do any better than reply in writing and not yield to the inspiration of the moment, to this groundbreaking work that I perform here every time I stand before you, which is nourished by plenty of notes, and which works because you see that I am prey to this groundbreaking. This is even the one thing, perhaps, that justifies your presence here.

The circumstances are different when it comes to speaking for some tens, even hundreds, of thousands of listeners, for whom the abrupt test of 153 presenting oneself without the support of the person can produce other effects.

In any case I will refuse to give anything but these texts that have already been written out. I am, then, placing a lot of trust in this condition since, as you will see, the questions put to me necessarily lie in the interval between what a constructed articulation produces and what I shall call a common consciousness expects. A common consciousness also means a series of common formulas. The Ancients, the Greeks, had already called this language, in their own language, the koine. This can be immediately translated into French—the couinée.[13] It squawks.

I don't despise the koine. It is just that I believe that the koine isn't undisposed to certain effects of precipitation being produced within it, to precisely the most abrupt discourse that there is being introduced.

There you are. This is why today I am going to share my replies to three of these questions with you. It is not merely to compensate myself for the effort, for it will be a far greater effort, believe me, to read these texts to you than to proceed as I usually do.

Without any further delay, I will give you the first of these questions, which is this: "In your Écrits you state that Freud anticipated, without being aware of it, the researches of Saussure as well as those of the Prague Circle. Can you explain what you meant?"

That is what I will do, then, not by improvising but, as I warned you, by replying as follows.

[The text of these three replies was published as "Radiophonie" in the journal Scilicet, nos. 2/3, pp. 55–99 (Paris: Éditions du Seuil, 1970). See also Autres écrits (Paris: Éditions du Seuil, 2001), 403–47.]

Yahweh's ferocious ignorance

FREUD AND SELLIN
FALSE INTERPRETATION MAKING PERFUME
MOSES SLAIN
THE MARITAL ALLEGORY

I will not say I am introducing Professor André Caquot, Director of Studies in the Fifth Section of Sciences of Religion of the Hautes Études, where as you know I am Chargé de Conférences.

I will not say I am introducing him because he needs no introduction. I present myself as having been, thanks to his grace and kindness, completely dependent on him over the time that has passed since two days prior to our last meeting, that is, from the moment I decided I wanted to know a thing or two about Sellin's book.

I have said enough about this book for you to be aware of its importance. For the sake of those who by chance have come here for the first time I will repeat that this book turned up at just the right moment, or again, as I put it, like a gift from the gods, for Freud who was then able to maintain the theme of the death of Moses according to which he was murdered. Moses is said to have been killed.

Thanks to Monsieur Caquot I have learned about the situation of this book with respect to exegesis, namely its being located within the efflorescence of what can be called textual technique, as it was instituted, particularly beginning in the nineteenth century, in German universities. I was able 156 to situate Sellin in relation to those who came before him and those who came after him, Edouard Meyer and Gressman, as well as many others.

It was not without difficulty, as I indicated last time, that I managed to get hold of this book, since it was completely unfindable in Europe. Through the efforts of the French-Israelite Alliance, I was finally able to obtain it from Copenhagen. I brought it to Monsieur Caquot's attention, who was one of the rare people not only to have had wind of it, but to have already had it in his hands some time before I went to him with my request. And we examined this text, particularly concerning the point at which it enabled Freud to situate what he had his heart set on, and not necessarily for the same reasons as Sellin.

This obliged us to turn to this field in which my ignorance is profound. You cannot know all that I am ignorant of—fortunately, because if you knew everything I was ignorant of, you would know everything. In the ordeal of the attempt I made at putting order into what I myself had managed to learn from Monsieur Caquot, I suddenly realized that there is a big difference between knowledge, knowing what one is talking about, what one believes one is capable of talking about, and then what I will presently give a name to, using a term that will serve to explain what we are going to do here.

There will therefore be a break for a second time in the manner in which I address you. Last time you were subjected to a difficult trial, to the point where some of you advanced the hypothesis that it was done in order to air out the room a bit—with a mediocre result, seeing how many of you are here. This time I believe that on the contrary you will have reason to stay. And if, subsequently, I were to offer you again what I am able to do today thanks to Monsieur Caquot, I would do it differently. Let's say that all things considered I felt myself drawing away from the thought of handling again today what we have been obliged to handle, namely the Hebrew letters.

In the text I read out to you last time I inserted a definition from Midrash. It was about a relationship to the written that is subject to certain laws that are of enormous interest to us. In effect, as I was saying to you, it is a question of placing oneself in the interval of a certain relationship between the written and a spoken presentation that draws on it and makes reference to it.

157 Analysis in its entirety, I mean analytic technique, can, in a certain manner, elucidate this reference, to be considered as a "game"—in inverted commas—of interpretation. This term has been used indiscriminately ever since people have been talking about conflicts of interpretation, for instance—as if you could have any conflict between interpretations.[1] At the very most interpretations complement one another, indeed, they play with this reference. What matters here is what I was saying last time, the falsum, with the ambiguity that the fall of the false, I mean the contrary of the true, can establish for itself around this word.[2] On occasions this false of interpretation may even have its impact of displacing a discourse. This is actually what we will see. I could not wish for better than this for conveying to you what this is about.

For me, in this field, this can in no way correspond to a form of knowledge, but rather it corresponds to what I have called putting [someone] on the scent [mise-au-parfum]. I am going to continue the operation in your presence, that is, continue trying to put myself on the scent, in the form, which has nothing fictive about it, of questions that necessarily remain unexhausted, and which are those that I have been putting to Monsieur Caquot over the last few days. I will, in this respect, like you, be in a relationship of putting myself on the scent concerning a certain form of knowledge, that of biblical exegesis.

Need I tell you that Monsieur Caquot is in this Fifth Section under the heading of Comparative Semitic Religions? Through the experience I have had of it I have come to believe that in this domain nobody can more adequately, in the sense in which I found it myself, get you to feel what the approach of a Sellin is about, when from the texts of Hosea, you will see by what procedures, he extracts a thing that he himself really wants to bring out. He has his reasons for this, and these reasons matter to us. What Monsieur Caquot conveyed to me on this is equally valuable.

I mentioned ignorance just before. To be a father, I mean not only a real father but a father of the real, there are things that one must ferociously ignore. One would, in a certain way, have to ignore everything that is not what last time I tried to set into my text as being of the level of structure, this level having to be defined as the order of the effects of language. This is where one falls, if I can put it this way, upon truth—the "upon" could equally well be replaced by "from." One falls upon truth, that is to say, a remarkable thing, if we envisage this reference to be absolute, it could be 158 said that anyone who adhered to it—but, of course, it is impossible to adhere to it—would not know what he is saying.

In no way is this saying anything that might in any way serve to specify the analyst. This would be to place him—or, more precisely, you are ready to tell me that this would be to place him—on the same rung as everybody else. Who knows, in effect, what he is saying? This would be a mistake. It is not because everybody speaks that everybody says something. It could be a question of an entirely different reference, of knowing what discourse one is inserted into, at the limit of this position that is in some sense fictitious.

Here is someone who satisfies that position, and whom I am going to name without hesitation, because he seems to me to be essential to the interest that we analysts should bring to Hebraic history. It is, perhaps, inconceivable that psychoanalysis could have been born anywhere else than in this tradition. Freud was born into it, and he insists on this fact, as I have stressed, that for making advances in the field he has discovered he only truly has confidence in these Jews who have known how to read for quite a long time and who live—this is the Talmud—on the reference to a text. He whom I am going to name, who, or which, actualizes this radical position of ferocious ignorance, has a name—it's Yahweh himself.

In interpellating this chosen people, it is characteristic of Yahweh, when he announces himself, that he is ferociously ignorant of everything that exists of certain religious practices that were rife at the time, and that are founded on a certain type of knowledge—sexual knowledge.

When we talk about Hosea in a moment, we will see the extent to which this is the basis on which he inveighs. He has in his sights a relationship that blends supernatural agencies in with nature itself which, in a way, is itself dependent on them. What right do we have to say that this has no basis? That the manner of moving the Baal who, in return, fertilized the earth, didn't correspond to something that may well have worked? Why not? Simply because there was Yahweh and because a certain discourse was inaugurated that this year I am trying to isolate as the other side of analytic discourse, namely the master's discourse—for precisely this reason we no longer know anything about it.

Is this the position the analyst has to have? Surely not. The analyst—would I go so far as to say that I have been able to experience it on 159 myself?—the analyst does not have this ferocious passion that surprises us so much where Yahweh is concerned. Yahweh is located at the most paradoxical point with respect to another perspective that might, for example, be that of Buddhism, where it is recommended that one purify oneself of the three fundamental passions, love, hatred, and ignorance. What is the most striking thing about this unique religious manifestation is that Yahweh lacks none of them. Love, hatred, and ignorance—there, in any case, are passions that are not absent from his discourse.

What characterizes the analyst's position—I won't go and write it up on the blackboard today with the help of my little schema, where the analyst's position is indicated by the object a on the top left-hand side—and this is the only sense that one can give to analytic neutrality, is not to partake of these passions. This constantly places him in an uncertain zone where he is vaguely in quest of being put on the path, of being put on the scent, of knowledge, which he has, however, repudiated.

Today we are concerned with one approach to Yahweh's dialogue with his people, with what Sellin might have had in mind, and also with what can be revealed to us by the encounter that happens to take place with what grabs Freud's attention—which is properly speaking along these lines, but he stops, he fails, and makes the thematics of the father a sort of mythical knot, a short circuit, or, to be precise, a failure. This is what I am now going to spell out for you.

As I have said to you, the Oedipus complex is Freud's dream. Like any dream it needs to be interpreted. We have to see where this displacement effect is produced, an effect which is to be understood as one that can be produced by that which is out of phase [décalage] in a writing.

The real father, if one can try to reconstitute it from Freud's elaboration, is properly articulated with what only concerns the imaginary father, namely the prohibition of jouissance. On the other hand, what makes him essential is noted, namely, the castration that I was alluding to just before when I said that there was an order of ferocious ignorance there, I mean in the place of the real father. This is what I hope to be able to demonstrate to you all the more easily once, today, concerning Monsieur Sellin, we have clarified a few things.

This is why I will allow myself to put a few questions to Monsieur Caquot first of all. He is well aware, since I have expressed it to him in a thousand different ways, of the heart of our problem on this point—how, 160
why did Freud need Moses?

It is obvious that it is essential for the audience to have a bit of an idea of what Moses means. Sellin's text in fact begins by raising this question, "What was Moses?," summarizing the various positions of those who preceded him, and those who are there working alongside him.

There is no question that these positions can only be clarified in relation to knowing how long Yahweh had been around.

Was Yahweh already the god of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob? Is there a tradition there that we can be certain about? Or is it possible that this tradition was retroactively reconstituted by the founder of the religion, who is supposedly Moses insofar as, at the foot of the Horeb, or more precisely on the Horeb itself, he is supposed to have received, take note, already written out, the Tablets of the Law? These are obviously quite different.

Sellin's book revolves, properly speaking, around this—Mose und seine Bedeutung für die israelitisch-jüdische Religionsgeschichte.

Why was it necessary for Sellin to present Moses to us as killed? It's a question I do not even want to begin to answer, so as to leave the field completely open to Monsieur Caquot. It is certain that this is closely linked to the fact that Moses is regarded as a prophet. Why does he have to be killed in his capacity as a prophet? More precisely, Sellin thinks he has undergone a martyr's death in his capacity as a prophet.

This is already something Monsieur Caquot will be so kind as to elucidate for us.

Something astounds me in Sellin's thought. Naturally, we are unable to penetrate Sellin's thought, but if we assume that what is written has the meaning he deciphers in it when he reconstitutes a text with a certain sense, there's no guarantee anywhere that this text, if one can call it a text, or this vocalization could be understood by anyone. In saying, for instance, that Numbers chapter 25 hides the event of Moses' murder, one is right in the midst of ambiguity.

161 In the register of Sellin's thought, which I do not believe brings the categories of the unconscious into play, the fact of hiding the event of Shittim by such an absurd story is altogether unsustainable.

This is obviously where it gets interesting—the extraordinary latency that such a way of proceeding comprises.

One can understand, up to a point, how Freud derives reinforcement here for the idea that it is a question of a memory, supposed in his register, that stands out despite all the intentions, despite a strong resistance. It remains very odd nevertheless that it is supported by writings, and that it is with the aid of writings that it can be redeciphered.

Jones attests that Freud would have had, apparently, according to Sellin himself, communicated to him that he was not so confident as all that.[3] Moreover, as you indicated just before, he takes the question up again in the second edition.

Monsieur Caquot: In the second edition Sellin left the exegesis of 1922 for chapters 5 and 9. However, on the other hand, he gave up promoting his hypothesis of Moses' death in his works on the famous dead servant of the Deutero-Isaiah.[4] He perhaps retained the idea of Moses' death, but he abandoned the idea of using it to interpret the chapter on the servant. I wonder whether Freud didn't fall victim to Sellin's academic prestige.

The question I wonder about is whether Freud read very closely.

Monsieur Caquot: I think he did. The book is clear and rigorous. It's false, but clear.

That's true. But Freud doesn't build anything on this construction. He simply indicates that a certain Sellin has recently expressed as defensible the hypothesis that Moses had been killed. The note is very brief, and gives a reference to the work that we have a photocopy of, nothing more.[5] I pointed out just before that Jones mentions that, in a work of 1935, which is later than we have been able to verify ourselves, Sellin maintained his position.[6]

If, really, I have not up till now already overabused the effort that I have led you to make, for which I thank you, it would be interesting, for what I will subsequently have to say, if you could give us some idea of how Hosea 162 has a meaning which has nothing to do with these minutiae.

The important point is the use of the 'ich we were talking about the other day. The novelty of Hosea, if I have understood correctly, is in sum this appeal of a very special kind. I hope that everyone will get out a little Bible to obtain some idea of the tone of Hosea. It has a type of invective ferocity, really terrifying, which is that of Yahweh speaking to his people in a lengthy discourse. When I spoke of Hosea before obtaining Sellin's book, I said, "I have read nothing in Hosea that is close to resembling what Sellin finds," but on the other hand I pointed out in passing the importance of invective, of the imputation of a rite of sacred prostitution that extends from start to finish, and, in opposition, advances of some kind whereby Yahweh declares himself to be the spouse. It is possible to say that this is the beginning of the long tradition—in itself quite mysterious, and it does not seem to me to be obvious that we can really locate its meaning—which makes Christ the spouse of the Church and the Church the spouse of Christ. It begins here, there is no trace of it prior to Hosea.

The term used for spouse, 'ich, is the very one which, in the second chapter of Genesis, is used to name Adam's partner. The first time that anyone speaks, that is to say, in verse 27 of the first chapter in which God creates them man and woman, is, if I read it properly, zakhar and nekevah. The second time—since things are always repeated twice in the Bible—'ich is the name for being, object, the rib, in the form 'ichâ. As if by chance, one only needs to add a little a to it.

If you could testify to its usage to designate the term where it concerns something even more divested of sexuality.

[5] Freud actually makes several references to Sellin, and in one place quotes him at length. See Moses and Monotheism, SE 23:51–2.

[6] Jones, Sigmund Freud: Life and Works 3:400. The book is Geschichte des israelitisch-jüdischen Volkes (Leipzig: Quelle & Meyer, 1935); see pp. 76–8. Jones says he was told by Jewish scholars of the day that Sellin subsequently "withdrew his suggestion and apologized for having made it." However, Jones goes on to say that he could never find any support for this in any of Sellin's later writings. He claims that in a work published some thirteen years later Sellin maintains he has found "further confirmation" for his thesis "in the writings of other prophets" (Jones, 3:400).

Monsieur Caquot: The conjugal uses are only a minor part of the acceptations of the word 'ich, which designates man in general. It is no more surprising than when one says "my man" for "my husband." In French mon homme, "my man," is more familiar.

The following verse says, "I would like to be called your spouse." It is to be compared to the term Baal, which can have the same meaning on occasions, namely lord and master, in the sense of spouse.

163 Monsieur Caquot: The terminology is extremely fluid. In Hosea the acceptations are restricted in such a way as to play upon "Yahweh" in opposition to "Baal."

An extremely sharp difference is accentuated here, a difference that in short remains quite opaque, despite centuries of commentaries. It's quite curious.

Monsieur Caquot: This is the first time that this conjugal metaphor makes its appearance in the Bible. It is what makes possible, much later, the allegorization of The Song of Songs. It's Hosea that makes this allegory possible. I wondered whether there were not a kind of demythification, of transference onto the Israel collectivity of the goddess who is the wife of Baal in the Semitic religions. There are at times several traits by which Israel is described as a goddess. But that has never been said.

That's very important. Ultimately something of what I was beginning to announce before hinges on that. You hadn't indicated that to me at all.

Monsieur Caquot: One has the impression that the prophetic religion replaces the goddess with Israel. This would be the case with Hosea—it replaces her with the people.

Given the hour, I think we can leave it there.

Interview on the steps of the Pantheon

AFFECTS PHILOSOPHY AND PSYCHOANALYSIS
SCIENCE AND PSYCHOANALYSIS
THE STUDENT AND THE PROLETARIAN

[As the Law Faculty in rue Saint-Jacques was closed, an exchange with a small number of participants took place on the steps of the Pantheon. Several questions, inaudible on the recording, are missing.]

I would like an explanation for the disagreeable process that has brought us here. In the circumstances I will await your questions.

X: [On Hegel's dialectic.]

I have become aware lately that I have already spoken quite precisely about the functions of master and slave, extracted from Hegel's discourse, and much more than I am doing now.

I only ever give things that come to me in advance, and I had therefore already assumed this was the case. But this is not the same as going back and checking the text of my seminar, which is always taken down in stenography, as you know.

In November 1962, when I commenced my seminar on anxiety at Sainte-Anne and, I think, from the second session on, I clarified, in an extremely precise manner, something which is, in short, identical with what I am now developing concerning the master's discourse.[1] I indicated how the positions of the master and the slave, formulated in the Phenomenology of the Spirit, differ. This is Kojève's starting point, and he always evaded what was there prior to their coming to be—but this is not what I emphasize.

What I find myself developing at the moment, under the heading "master's discourse," was already motivating the way in which I approached anxiety. 168

[1] See Le Séminaire, Livre X, L'Angoisse, 1962–1963 (Paris: Éditions du Seuil, 2004).

Someone whose intentions I don't need to describe is doing an entire report, to be published in two days time, so as to denounce in a note the fact that I put affect in the background, that I ignore it. It's a mistake to think I neglect affects—as if already everyone's behavior was not enough to affect me. My entire seminar that year was, on the contrary, structured around anxiety, insofar as it is the central affect, the one around which everything is organized. Since I was able to introduce anxiety as the fundamental affect, it was a good thing all the same that already, for a good length of time, I had not been neglecting affects.

I have simply given its full importance, in the determinism of die Verneinung [negation], to what Freud has explicitly stated, that it's not affect that is repressed. Freud has recourse to this famous Repräsentanz which I translate as représentant de la représentation, and which others, and moreover not without some basis, persist in calling représentant-représentatif, which absolutely does not mean the same thing.[2] In one case the representative is not a representation, in the other case the representative is just one representation among others. These translations are radically different from one another. My translation implies that affect, through the fact of displacement, is effectively displaced, unidentified, broken off from its roots—it eludes us.

This is what is essential in repression. It's not that the affect is suppressed, it's that it is displaced and unrecognizable.

X: [On the relations between existentialism and structuralism.]

Yes, it's as if existential thought was the only guarantee of a recourse to affects.

X: What do you think of the relations that exist between you and Kierkegaard concerning anxiety?

No one can yet imagine the extent to which people attribute thoughts to me. I only have to mention someone and I am said to be condescending.
169 It's the very model of academic vertigo. Why in fact wouldn't I speak about Kierkegaard? It's clear that if I place all this emphasis on anxiety in the economy, for it's a question of economy, it's obviously not in order to neglect the fact that at a certain moment there was someone who represents the emergence, the coming into being, not of anxiety but of the concept of anxiety, as Kierkegaard himself explicitly calls one of his works. It's not for nothing that historically this concept emerged at a certain moment. This is what I was counting on expounding for you this morning.

[2] Lacan has in mind Freud's term "Vorstellungsrepräsentanz," which Strachey renders as "ideational representative" in SE. Lacan's translation, représentant de la représentation, comes out as the "representation's representative," while the alternative rendering, représentant-représentatif, would give, in English, the equally awkward "representative representative." See Jean Laplanche and Serge Leclaire, "The Unconscious: A Psychoanalytic Study," Yale French Studies 48 (1972):118–75; and also Michel Tort, "A propos du concept freudien de 'Représentant'(Repräsentanz)," Cahiers pour l'analyse 5 (1966):41–67.

I am not alone in making this comparison with Kierkegaard. Yesterday I received a book by Manuel de Diéguez.[3] Well, the things he says about me! As I had to prepare my stuff for you and because it is all done at the very last minute—what I have to tell you is never ready until the final hour, everything I write down and recount to you is generally noted down between five and eleven in the morning—I haven't had the time to locate myself in all this great to-do I am inserted into, in relation not only to Kierkegaard, but to Ockham and Gorgias too. It's all there, as are huge chunks of what I recount. It's fairly extraordinary, because without quoting me half of the book is called "Lacan and"—I'll give you three guesses—"transcendental psychoanalysis." Read it. To me it seems to be pretty overwhelming. I hadn't thought of myself as all that transcendental, but then, you can never be very certain. Someone once said to me, concerning books that were published about him, "Ah! We do have ideas, my friend, we do have ideas!" Let's move on.

X: Do you think, then, that the ideas you get from the practice of psychoanalysis give you something that cannot be found outside it?

It's precisely because I do think that that I have gone to all this effort for the past eighteen or nineteen years. Otherwise I can't see why I would do it. And I can't see what would lead to my name's being added precisely to a list of philosophers, which doesn't seem to me to be entirely judicious.

X: Can you go back to what you started saying about Hegel?

I certainly won't be giving this morning's seminar here. This is not why I 170 am here. I am using the occasion to learn a bit about what some of you might have to say to me, which doesn't easily occur when we are in a lecture theater.

X: You spoke about the Other as the treasure trove of signifiers, and you said that there was no confronting it. Might it include incoherent things? The signifier is not necessarily coherent.

Are you sure that I have said what you are imputing to me? Where did I say that there was no confronting the Other? I do not think I have said that at all. I would be surprised. If I did say it, it was out of clumsiness, but I would be just as surprised to have committed such a blunder.

[3] The book in question is Science et nescience (Paris: Gallimard, 1970).

X: [Inaudible.]

I will try to give you the essential part at my next seminar, if it takes place.

X: [Inaudible.]

I am attacking philosophy? That's greatly exaggerated.

X: That's an impression.

Yes, that is an impression. I was asked just a minute ago whether I believed that things I recount may not be problematic. I said that I did. My sole motivation for advancing them is because of a precise experience, the psychoanalytic experience. If it weren't for that I would consider that I had neither the right nor above all the desire to extend the philosophical discourse very much beyond the point at which it was most properly effaced.

X: That transforms it.

That doesn't transform it. It's a different discourse. This is what I am trying to show you by reminding those who have no idea about analytic expe-
171 rience, to the entire extent that I believe it to be so, that this is, all the same, its currency. This is where I start from. Otherwise this discourse would not have an aspect that is philosophically so problematic, which was pointed out just before by the person over there, who spoke first, when he translated it into sophistical terms. I don't think this is right. The person I was talking about before places me as a kind of point of emphasis, locates me at the center of some kind of mixture, of fracturing, opening up of philosophical discourse. It's not badly done, it's done in an extremely sympathetic manner, but my initial response—perhaps I will change my views on it—I said to myself, "And yet, to place me in that heritage is quite some Entstellung, quite some displacement, away from the import of what I am capable of saying."

X: What you say is always decentered in relation to sense, you shun sense.

This is perhaps precisely why my discourse is an analytic discourse. It's the structure of analytic discourse to be like that. Let's say that I adhere to it as much as I can, without daring to say that I strictly identify myself with it, if I am successful.

Yesterday I read quite an amazing article in a review that, for personal reasons, I had never opened, which is called L'Inconscient. In the latest issue to be published a certain Cornelius Castoriadis, no less, has this question about my discourse, supposedly with reference to science.[4] What does he say? He says what I find myself repeating, namely that this discourse has an extremely precise reference to science. What he denounces as the essential difficulty of this discourse, namely—I will spell it out for you—this displacement that never ceases, is the very condition of analytic discourse, and it's in this respect that one can say that it is, I won't say totally the discourse of science, but conditioned by it, in that the discourse of science leaves no place for man.

I was counting on emphasizing this for you this morning. I won't spoil what I am going to say about it next week.

X: Concerning anxiety, I thought it was the opposite of jouissance.

What I insist upon when I address the affects is the affect that is different 172 from all the others, that of anxiety, in that it's said to have no object. Look at everything that has ever been written about anxiety, it's always this that is insisted upon—fear has a reference to an object, whereas anxiety is said to have no object. I say on the contrary that anxiety is not without an object. I have already stated this, I did so a long time ago, and it's quite obvious that I will still have to explain it to you again.

At the time I did not designate this object as surplus jouissance, which proves that there was something to construct before I could name it as such. It's very precisely the . . . I am unable to say the name, because, precisely, it's not a name. It's surplus jouissance, but it's not nameable, even if it's approximately nameable, translatable, in this way. This is why it has been translated by the term "surplus value." This object without which anxiety is not can still be addressed in some other way. It's precisely this that over the course of the years I have given more and more form to. I have in particular given many chatterboxes the opportunity to rush hastily into print on the subject of what I may have had to say with the term "object a."

X: [Inaudible.]

In the articulation that I describe as the university discourse the a is in the place of what? In the place, let's say, of the exploited in the university discourse, who are easy to recognize—they are students. In focusing one's reflection on this place in the notation many things can be explained in these singular phenomena that, for the moment, are happening around the world. To be sure, one has to differentiate between the emergence of its radicality—this is what is happening—and the way in which the university's function has become clogged up, blocked, maintained—this can last for a very long time. The university has an extremely precise function, in effect, one that at every moment is related to the state we are in with respect to the master's discourse—namely, its elucidation. As a matter of fact, this discourse has been a masked discourse for a very long time. Through its internal necessity it will become less and less masked.

[4] "Epilegomena to a Theory of the Soul Which Has Been Presented as a Science," pp. 3–45 in Crossroads in the Labyrinth (Cambridge, Mass.: MIT Press, 1984).

What use has the university been? This can be read according to each epoch. By virtue of the increasingly extreme denudation of the master's dis-173 course, the university discourse finds itself displaying—all the same, don't think it's shaken or finished—that for the moment it's encountering a heap of difficulties. These difficulties can be approached at the level of the close relationship that exists between the student's position of always being, in the university discourse, in a more or less masked manner, identified with this object a, which is charged with producing what? The barred S that comes next on the lower right-hand side.

That is the problem. A subject has emerged, from out of this product. Subject of what? A divided subject in any case. That it should be less and less tolerable for this reduction to be limited to producing teachers is brought completely into the light of day in the present epoch, and this requires a study that is all the more improvised for being in the process of becoming a fact. What is being produced, and this is called the crisis of the university, can be inscribed in this formula. It requires it, because it's founded at an altogether radical level. It's not possible to limit oneself to treating it in the way it's being treated. It's uniquely on the basis of the rotating relationship, which is revolutionary, as I say in a slightly different sense from the usual one, between the university position and the three other discourse positions that what is currently happening in the university can be illuminated.

X: [On revolutionaries and the proletariat.]

The proletarian? When did I mention the proletarian? At the level of the master's discourse his place is altogether clear.

In its origins the master's discourse has to do with everything that initially happened as being the proletarian, who was initially the slave. We fall back here on the Hegelian term. The slave, as I have stressed, was knowledge at the outset. The evolution of the master's discourse is here. Philosophy has played the role of constituting a master's knowledge, extracted [soustrait] from the slave's knowledge. Science as it has currently come to light properly consists in this transmutation of the function, if one can put it like that—one is always more or less led at some moment to grasp at an archaic theme, and, as you know, I incite you to be prudent.

Be that as it may, there is certainly a difficulty in knowledge, which resides in the opposition between know-how and what is episteme in the strict sense. The episteme was constituted out of an interrogation, a purification of 174 knowledge. The philosophical discourse shows the philosopher making reference to it at every turn. It's not for nothing that he questioned the slave, and that he demonstrates that the latter knows—that he knows what he doesn't know, moreover. One shows that he knows only because one asks the right questions. This is the path by which the displacement was brought about that makes it the case that our scientific discourse is currently on the side of the master. It's precisely this that cannot be mastered.

X: Where do you place the proletarian, then?

He can only be in the place that he has to be in, on the top right-hand side. In the place of the big Other, don't you think? Very precisely, there knowledge no longer has any weight. The proletarian is not simply exploited, he has been stripped of his function of knowledge. The so-called liberation of the slave has had, as always, other corollaries. It's not merely progressive. It's progressive only at the price of a deprivation.

I won't risk going into this, I would only go into it cautiously, but if there is something whose tone strikes me in the thematics called Maoist, it's the reference to the knowledge of manual labor. I do not claim to have an adquate view on this, but I will make one observation that struck me. The renewed emphasis on the knowledge of the exploited seems to me to be very profoundly motivated structurally. The question is knowing whether this is not something that is entirely dreamed up. In a world in which there has emerged, in a way that actually does exist, that is a presence in the world, not the thought of science, but science objectified in some way, I mean these things entirely forged by science, simply these little things, gadgets and things, which at the moment occupy the same space as us—in a world in which this emergence has taken place, can know-how at the level of manual labor carry enough weight to be a subversive factor? This is how, for me, the question arises.

What do you do with all I tell you? You record it on a little machine, and afterward, you give parties which you hand out invitations to—that's a Lacan tape for you.

THERE'S ONLY ONE AFFECT THE OBJECT A AND THE COGITO SCIENCE AND PERCEPTION
THE MULTIPLICATION OF LATHOUSES

A lot of water has passed under the bridge since our last meeting, I am speaking of the one in April, and not the most recent one, which took place elsewhere, and only with some of you.

The exchange of remarks on the steps of the Pantheon was not of a bad level, since it enabled me to go over a number of points that deserved to be made precise, in response to questions that were not at all inept. That is what I think with the lapse of a week. But my first reaction immediately afterward when I was with someone who was accompanying me was, however, of a certain inadequacy.

Even the best of those who spoke, and who were not unjustified in their questions, seemed to me, except at the start, to be lagging behind a bit. This seems to me to have been reflected in the fact that, at least in this friendly interpellation that was still not a questioning, they situated me within a number of references.

These references are not all to be rejected, certainly. I recall that the first was to Gorgias, of whom I am supposed to be conducting some sort of repetition. Why not? But what was inappropriate is that in the mouth of the person who evoked this character whose effectiveness we, in our days, cannot evaluate very well it was about someone from the history of thought. This is the distancing that seems disturbing to me—this term enables a sort of sampling of views from a distance concerning this person and that person whom one has bracketed together under "function of thought."

176 It seems to me that there is nothing less homogeneous here—if I can put it like that - nothing that would enable one to define a species. It is not legitimate to give some people, in whatever capacity one might imagine them, the function of a species representing thought. Thought is not a category. I would almost say it is an affect. Although, this is not to say that it is at its most fundamental under the aspect of affect.

There is only one affect--this constitutes a certain position, a new one to be introduced into the world, which, I am saying, is to be referred to what I am giving you a schema of, transcribed onto the blackboard, when I speak of the psychoanalytic discourse.

As a matter of fact, transcribing it onto the blackboard is distinct from talking about it. I remember that at Vincennes, when I appeared there for the first time which hasn't been repeated since, but which will be repeated, it occurred to someone to call out to me that there were real things that were truly preoccupying the assembly. Namely, that there was a brawl going on at a place at some distance from where we were gathered, that this was what we should be thinking about, that the blackboard had nothing to do with this real. That's where the error is.

I would say that, if there is any chance of grasping something called the real, it is nowhere other than on the blackboard. And even, whatever commentary I am able to give it, which will take the form of speech, relates only to what is written on the blackboard.

That's a fact. And it is demonstrated by this fact, by this artifice that is science, whose emergence one would be completely wrong to inscribe as arising solely out of a philosophical concoction. Metaphysical, rather than physical, science, perhaps. Does our scientific physics deserve to be called metaphysical? This is what would need to be spelled out.

Spelling it out seems possible to me, namely on the basis of the psychoanalytic discourse. In effect, from the perspective of this discourse, there is only one affect, which is, namely, the product of the speaking being's capture in a discourse, where this discourse determines its status as object.

This is where the Cartesian cogito derives its exemplary value from, provided that one examine it and revise it, as I will do once again, today, to start with.

I mentioned that affect by which the speaking being of a discourse finds itself determined as an object. It has to be said that this object is not nameable. If I try to call it surplus jouissance, this is only a device of nomenclature.

What object is it that results from this effect of a certain discourse? We know nothing about this object, except that it is the cause of desire, that is to say that strictly speaking it manifests itself as want-to-be. There is therefore no being that is thereby determined.

Certainly, what the effect of a given discourse bears upon may well be a being that one may call man, for example, or else a living being to which one can add that it is sexed and mortal, and one will fearlessly advance toward thinking that what the discourse of psychoanalysis bears upon is here, under the pretext that sex and death are constantly at issue here. But from our perspective, if it is true that we start at the level of what reveals itself initially, and as the prime fact, to be structured like a language, we are not yet at this point. It is not a question of beings [étant] in the effect of language. It is only a question of a speaking Being [être]. At the outset we are not at the level of beings, but at the level of Being.

We must, however, beware of the mirage here of thinking that Being is thereby settled, and beware of the error, which lies in wait for us, of assimilating this to everything that has been worked out as the dialectic of an initial position of being and nothingness.

The initial affect of this effect, let's now put this in inverted commas, of "Being" only appears at the level of what makes itself the cause of desire, that is to say, at the level of what we situate, of this initial effect of the setting [appareil], of the analyst—the analyst as the place that I am trying to grasp with these little letters on the blackboard. This is where the analyst positions himself. He positions himself as the cause of desire. This is an eminently unprecedented position, if not a paradoxical one, one that is validated by a practice.

The importance of this practice can be measured by taking what has been designated as the master's discourse as a reference point. It is not a question here of a distant relationship, or of an overview, but of a fundamental relationship—the analytic practice is, properly speaking, initiated by this master's discourse.

178 There is something that becomes present by virtue of the fact that all determination of the subject, and therefore of thought, depends on discourse. In this discourse, in effect, there arises the moment at which the master becomes differentiated. It would be quite false to think that this occurs at the level of a risk. This risk is, despite everything, quite mythical. It's the trace of a myth that still remains in Hegelian phenomenology. Isn't this master nothing other than the one who is the strongest? This is certainly not what Hegel records. The struggle for pure prestige at the risk of death still belongs to the realm of the imaginary. What does the master do? This is what the articulation I am giving you of discourse shows. He plays upon what I have called, in different terms, the crystal of language.

Why not use in this respect what can be designated in French by the homonym m'être, m'être à moi-même? It's from this that the m'être signifier emerges, whose second term I leave to you to write as you will.[1]

[1] m'être, a construction of Lacan's, is homophonic with maître, "master." Having the grammatical form of a quasi pronominal construction, it can be taken roughly to suggest being as an activity, thus, "I am being."

This unique signifier operates by means of its relation with what is already there, already articulated, in such a way that we can only conceive of it against the presence of a signifier that is already there, that, I would say, has always been there. In effect, if this unique signifier, the signifier "the master," write it as you wish, is articulated to some part of a practice that it orders, then this practice is already shot through, woven through, with what, to be sure, does not yet emerge from it, namely, the signifying articulation. The latter is at the heart of all knowledge, even if it could only have been approached through know-how.

We find the trace of the initial presence of this knowledge where it is already some distance off, by virtue of having been fiddled with for a long time in what is called the philosophical tradition—a judgment about the grip that the signifier of the master has on this knowledge.

Let's not forget that when Descartes asserts his "I am thinking therefore I am," it's by virtue of having for some time sustained his "I am thinking" by calling into question, putting in doubt, this knowledge that I am saying is "fiddled with," which is the knowledge already elaborated at length through the master's intervention.

What can we say about contemporary science that will give us a reference point? I will mention three stages here because, poor teacher that I am, I am not sure that you are cottoning onto my sentences. Three stages—science—behind, philosophy—and beyond, something of which we have a notion if only through biblical anathemas.

This year I have given a large place to the text Hosea, with reference to 179
what Freud extracts from it, according to Sellin. The greatest benefit of it is perhaps not, though it does exist on this level, calling the Oedipus complex into question, which I have called this "residue of myth," in psychoanalytic theory. Surely, if there were something necessary here to make present some ocean of mythical knowledge regulating the life of men—and how do we know whether it was harmonious or not?—the best reference could well be what Yahweh condemns, with what I called his ferocious ignorance, with the term "prostitution."

This is enough of a foothold [bias], to my mind, and surely a better one than the common reference to the fruits of ethnography. Ethnography conceals all kinds of confusion within itself, through adhering to what it gathers as if it were natural. And how is it gathered? It is gathered in writing, that is to say, detailed, extracted, distorted forever from the supposed terrain on which one is supposedly uncovering it.

This is certainly not to say that mythical knowledge could inform us at greater length, or inform us better, about the essence of the sexual relation.

If psychoanalysis makes sex and, as a dependency, death present for us—even though here nothing is certain, except a general apprehension of a link between sexual difference and death, it's by demonstrating, in a way that I wouldn't call lively but merely articulated, that concerning the capture of this being—whatever it may be, which is to say that it is not even a being—in discourse the articulation in which the sexual relation is expressed only ever appears in a complex manner. This complex manner is one that cannot even be said to be mediated, even though there are medii—media, if you prefer—one of which is this real effect that I am calling surplus pleasure, which is the little a.

What does experience indicate to us, in point of fact? That it is only when this little a is substituted for woman that man desires her. That, inversely, what a woman has to deal with, insofar as we are able to speak about this, is this jouissance that is her own and is represented somewhere by a man's omnipotence, which is precisely where man, when he speaks, when he speaks as master, discovers that he is a failure [en défaut].

This is where one has to start from in analytic experience—what could 180 be called man, that is to say the male as speaking being, disappears, vanishes through the very effect of the master's discourse—spell it as you will—through being inscribed solely in castration, which, by this very fact, is properly to be defined as being deprived of woman—of woman insofar as she would be realized in a suitably congruent signifier.

Being deprived of woman—this, expressed in terms of the failure [défaut] of discourse, is what castration means. It is indeed because this is not thinkable that the speaking order institutes this desire, constituted as impossible, as an intermediary and that makes the mother, insofar as she is prohibited, the privileged feminine object.

This is the wrapping established by the fundamental fact that in a mythical union between man and woman there is no possible place that could be defined as sexual.

This is, indeed, where what we grasp in the psychoanalytic discourse—the unifying One, the whole One—is not what is involved in identification. The pivotal identification, the major identification, is the unary trait. It is Being, marked one.

Prior to the promotion of any being, by virtue of a singular one, of what bears the mark from this moment forward, the effect of language arises, as does the first affect. This is what the formulas I wrote on the blackboard are saying.

$$\frac{1}{1+1} \quad = \quad ? \quad \frac{\text{I am one}}{\text{I am thinking} = \text{therefore I am one}}$$

Somewhere this something that the cogito only marks is isolated, also with the unary trait, that one can suppose the "I am thinking" has in order to say, "Therefore, I am." Here the effect of division is already marked by an "I am" which elides the "I am marked by the one"—for Descartes is, to be sure, inscribed in a scholastic tradition, which he wriggles out of acrobatically, which is not at all to be disdained as a means of escape.

Moreover, it is as a function of this initial position of the "I am" that the "I am thinking" can be even so much as written. You will recall how I have been writing it for a long time now—"I am thinking, 'Therefore I am.'" This "Therefore I am" is a thought.

It supports itself infinitely better by carrying its characteristic of knowledge, which does not go beyond the "I am marked by the one," by the singular, by the unique, by what?—by this effect which is, "I am thinking."

But here again, there is an error in the punctuation, which a long time 181 ago I expressed thus—the "ergo," which is nothing other than the "ego" in play, should be put alongside the "cogito." The "I am thinking, therefore, 'I am'" gives the formula its real significance. The cause, the "ergo," is thought. The point of departure to take is the effect of what is involved in the simplest order, from which the language effect comes into play at the level of the emergence of the unary trait.

To be sure, the unary trait is never alone. Therefore, the fact that it repeats itself—that it repeats itself in never being the same—is properly speaking the order itself, the order in question because language is present and already there, already efficacious.

Our first rule is never to seek the origins of language, if only because they are demonstrated well enough through their effects.

The further back we push their effects, the more these origins emerge. The effects of language are retroactive, precisely in that it is as language develops that it manifests what it is qua want-to-be.

Moreover, I will indicate—in passing, for today we have to move on—that we can write it like this, and that we can bring into play here, in its strictest form, something that right from the origins of a rigorous use of the symbolic appeared in the Greek tradition, namely at the level of mathematics.

Euclid is the fundamental reference here, and the definition he gives us of proportion is primary, it had never been given before him, I mean before what remains as having been written in his name—of course, who knows from where he might have borrowed this strict definition? The one that gives the only true foundation of geometrical demonstration can be found, if I remember correctly, in book five.

The term "demonstration" is ambiguous here. By constantly highlighting the intuitive elements that are here in the figure, he makes it possible for you to miss the fact that, very formally, the requirement in Euclid is one of symbolic demonstration, of an order that is grouped into equalities and inequalities, which alone enable proportion to be assured in a way that is not an approximation but is properly demonstrable, in this term "logos," in the sense of proportion.

182 It is curious and indicative that we had to wait for the Fibonacci series to see what is given in the apprehension of this proportion which is called the proportional mean. I will write it out here—you will be aware that I made use of it when I discussed From an Other to the other.[2]

$$\cfrac{1}{1+\cfrac{1}{1+\cfrac{1}{1+1}}} = \gamma$$

A romanticism still continues to call this the golden number and goes astray in finding it on the surface of everything that has been possible to paint or draw over the ages, as if it were not certain that this is only about being able to visualize it. One only has to open a work of aesthetics that makes a case for this reference in order to realize that, while it may be possible to superimpose it, it is certainly not because the painter had drawn the diagonals in advance, but because there is in effect a kind of intuitive harmony, which means that it is always this that sings most sweetly.

Except that there is also something else, which it will not be easy for you to grasp. By taking each of these terms and starting to calculate from the bottom up, you will quickly see that you are dealing first with 1/2, then with 2/3, next with 3/5. You will thus find the numbers the sequence of which constitutes the Fibonacci series, 1, 2, 3, 5, 8, . . . , each being the sum of the two preceding numbers, as I pointed out to you at the time. This relation of two terms we can write for instance as $u_{(n+1)} = u_{(n-1)} + u_n$. The result of the division u_{n+1} / u_n will be equal, if the series is continued long enough, to the effectively ideal proportion that is called the proportional mean, or again, the golden number.

If we now take this proportion as an image of what affect is, insofar as there is repetition of this "I am one" on the next line, this retroactively results in what causes it—the affect.

We can momentarily write this affect as "equal to a," and we can see that we rediscover the same a at the level of the effect.

[2] Le Séminaire, Livre XVI, D'un Autre à l'autre, 1968–1969 (Paris: Éditions du Seuil, 2006).

This a, the effect of repeating the 1, is at the level of what is designated 183
here by a bar. The bar is precisely only this, that there is something to get past in order for the 1 to affect. In short, it is this bar that is equal to a. And there's nothing astonishing in the fact that we can legitimately write the affect below the bar, as that which is the effect that is here thought, overturned, when the cause is made to emerge. It is in the initial effect that the cause, as thought cause, emerges.

This is what is motivating me to find a more certain articulation of what the effect of discourse is in this initial tentative use of mathematics. It's at the level of the cause, insofar as it emerges as thought, the reflection of the effect, that we attain the initial order of what the want-to-be is. Initially Being only affirms itself with the mark of the 1, and everything that follows is a dream—notably, the mark of the 1 insofar as it supposedly encompasses, could supposedly combine, anything at all. It can combine nothing at all, unless it is, precisely, the confrontation, the addition of the thought of the cause with the initial repetition of the 1.

This repetition already costs and institutes, at the level of the a, the debt of language. Something has to be paid to the one who introduces its sign. This year I have designated this something, using a nomenclature that tries to give it its historical weight—strictly speaking it was not this year, but let's say that for you it was this year—with the term Mehrlust.

What does this infinite articulation reproduce? As the little a is the same here as it is there, it is self-evident that repetition of the formula cannot be the infinite repetition of the "I am thinking" within the "I am thinking," which is the mistake the phenomenologists never fail to make, but only the following: "I am thinking," were it to be done, is only able to be replaced by "I am, 'I am thinking, therefore I am.' " I am he who is thinking, "Therefore I am," and so on indefinitely. You will observe that the small a always gets farther and farther away in a series that reproduces exactly the same order of 1s, such as they are here deployed on the right, with the sole difference that the final term will be a small a.

$$\cfrac{1}{a+\cfrac{1}{a+1}} = a$$

Notice that it's a remarkable thing, this small a. It is sufficient that it sub- 184 sist, however far down you take it, for equality to be the same as in the formula I first wrote up, namely that the multiple and repeated proportion equals, in total, the result of the small a.

In what way is this series marked off? In sum, it does nothing other, if I am not mistaken, than mark the order of the converging series which has the largest intervals while remaining constant. Namely, still the object a.

In a certain sense, this is only a local articulation. It certainly does not pretend to solve, with a fixed and guaranteed proportion, the question of the effectiveness of the most primary manifestation of number, namely the unary trait. I only did it to remind you what science is such as we have it now, if I can put it like this, on our hands—I mean, present in our world in a manner that goes well beyond anything that an effect of knowledge [connaissance] may lead us to speculate about.

In effect, it is, all the same, necessary not to forget that it is characteristic of our science not to have introduced a better and more extensive knowledge of the world but to have brought into existence, in the world, things that did not in any way exist at the level of our perception.

Attempts have been made to organize science according to some mythical genesis that begins with perception, under the pretext that such and such a philosophical meditation had supposedly come to a standstill for a long time over the question of knowing what guarantees that perception is not illusory. This is not where science emerged from. Science emerged from what was embryonic in the Euclidean demonstrations. Nevertheless, these still remain very suspect because they still contain that attachment to the figure, the self-evidence of which serves as a pretext. The entire evolution of Greek mathematics proves to us that what rises to the highest point is the manipulation of numbers as such.

Consider the method of exhaustion which, already in Archimedes, prefigures what leads to what is essential, to what for us is, as it happens, structure, namely the calculus, the infinitesimal calculus. There is no need to wait until Leibniz, who, moreover, at his first attempt shows himself to have 185 been a little awkward. It had already been started by Cavalieri, simply by reproducing Archimedes' exploit on the parabola, in the seventeenth century, but well before Leibniz.

What is the result of this? No doubt you can say of science that nihil fuerit in intellectu quod non prius fuit in sensu, what does that prove? The sensus has nothing to do, as people nevertheless know, with perception. The sensus is only there in the manner of what can be counted, and the actual counting rapidly dissolves. Taking what is our sensus at the level of the ear or eye, for example, leads to counting vibrations. And it was owing to this play of numbers that we in fact set about producing vibrations that had nothing to do either with our senses or with our perception.

As I was saying the other day on the steps of the Pantheon, the world that is assumed to have always been ours is now populated, in the very place where we are, without your having the slightest suspicion of it, by a considerable and intersecting number of what are called waves. This is not to be neglected as the manifestation, presence, existence, of science, and to describe what is around our Earth would require that one not be satisfied with speaking of atmosphere, of stratosphere, of whatever you would like to spherize, however distant the particles we can apprehend. It would be necessary to take account also of what in our day goes well beyond, and which is the effect of what? Of a knowledge that has progressed less through its own filtering, through its own critique as we say, than through an audacious leap from an artifice, no doubt that of Descartes—others will choose different ones—the artifice of giving the guarantee of truth back to God. If truth there be, that he take responsibility for it. We take it at face value.

Solely by means of the play of a truth that is not abstract but purely logical, solely by the play of a strict combinatory that is subject only to the requirement that rules, under the name of axioms, must always be given—this is where a science is constructed, one that no longer has anything to do with the presuppositions that the idea of knowledge [connaissance] has always implied—namely, the mute polarization, the imagined ideal unification of that which is knowledge [connaissance], where one can always find, whatever the name one dresses them up in, "endosunia," for instance, the reflection, the image, which is moreover always ambiguous, of two principles, the male principle and the female principle. 186

The space in which the creations of science are deployed can only be qualified henceforth as the in-substance, as the a-thing, l'achose with an apostrophe—a fact that entirely changes the meaning of our materialism.

It is the oldest figure of the master's infatuation—write "master" as you will—for man to imagine that he shapes woman. I think you all have experienced enough to have encountered this comical story at one stage of your life or another. Form, substance, content, call it what you will –this is the myth scientific thought must detach itself from.

I figure that I am allowed to plow on fairly crudely in order to express my thought well. I am failing to act as if I had had a thought, whereas, precisely, this is not the issue, but, as everyone knows, it's thought that communicates itself, by means of misunderstanding, of course. Well, let's communicate and say what this conversion consists in, the conversion by which science is shown to be distinct from any theory of knowledge [connaissance].

This doesn't make sense, in fact, because it is precisely in the light of the apparatus of science, to the extent that we can grasp it, that it is possible to found the nature of the errors, the obstacles [les butées], the confusions that in effect didn't fail to be present in what was being articulated as knowledge [connaissance], with this undercurrent that there were two principles to cleave apart—one that forms and one that is formed. This is what science makes quite clear for us, and this is confirmed by the fact that we find an echo of it in analytic experience.

To express myself in these large-scale, approximate terms, take the male principle for example—what effect does the incidence of discourse have on it? It is that, as a speaking being, he is summoned to give an explanation of his "essence"—irony, inverted commas. It is very precisely and solely because of the affect that this discourse effect subjects him to—that is, insofar as he receives this feminizing effect of the small a—that he recognizes what makes him, that he recognizes the cause of his desire.

Conversely, at the level of the so-called natural principle, where it is not for nothing that it has always been symbolized, in the bad sense of the word, by a female reference, it is, on the contrary, from out of the insub-187 stance, as I was saying just before, that this void appears. Void of what? Let's say that the something in question, if we want, very much from a distance, from a very long way away, to give it the horizon of woman, is in what is in question as unformed jouissance, precisely without any form, that we can find the place, in the "operceive" in which science comes to be constructed.[3] What I perceive, which is claimed to be original, must, in effect, be replaced by an operceive.

Insofar as science only refers to an articulation that only takes form in the signifying order, it is constructed out of something where there was nothing beforehand.

This is what it is important to grasp if we wish to understand something that has to do with—what?—with the forgetting of this very effect. Being what we are, all of us, to the extent that the field increases by virtue of the fact that science perhaps functions as the master's discourse, we do not know how far—for the reason that we have never known at any point—each one of us is initially determined as object small a.

I was speaking before of these spheres with which the extension of science—which, curiously, is found to be very effective at determining what a being is—encircles the earth, a series of zones that science describes as being what it finds. Why not also take account of the place in which these fabrications of science are located, if they are nothing more than the effect of formalized truth? What are we going to call this place?

Here again I am overly emphasizing what I want to say, and I am not necessarily very proud of what I am putting forward on this occasion, but I think that it is useful, you will see why, to raise this question which is not a question of nomenclature.

It is a question about a place that is well and truly occupied—by what? I was speaking just before about waves. This is what is at issue. Hertzian waves or other waves—no phenomenology of perception has ever given us the slightest idea of them and it would certainly never have led us to them.

We certainly won't be calling this place the noosphere, which we ourselves supposedly populate.[4] If indeed there is anything that as it happens is in the background, twenty-five rows back, of everything that may be of interest to us, it is this. But in using aletheia in a way which, I agree, has nothing emotionally philosophical about it you could, unless you find something better, call it the alethosphere.

Don't get too excited. The alethosphere gets recorded. If you have a little 188 microphone here, you are plugged into the alethosphere. What is really something is that if you are in a little vehicle that is transporting you toward Mars you can still plug into the alethosphere. And, even, this surprising effect of structure which meant that two or three people have gone wandering around on the moon, you must think that, concerning their exploit, it was certainly not for no reason that they always stayed within the alethosphere.

These astronauts, as they are called, who had some minor problems at the last minute, would probably not have overcome them so well—I am not even talking about their relations with their little machine, for they would perhaps have overcome that on their own—if they had not been accompanied the entire time by this little a that is the human voice. By virtue of this they could allow themselves to say nothing but bullshit [conneries], such as for example that everything was going well when everything was going poorly. But that's beside the point. The point is that they stayed within the alethosphere.

It takes time to observe all the things that populate it, and this is going to oblige us to introduce another word.

The alethosphere—it sounds good. That's because we suppose that what I have been calling formalized truth already has, sufficiently, the status of truth at the level at which it operates, at which it operceives. But at the level of the operated-on, of what moves around, the truth is not at all unveiled.

[4] Neologism by Teilhard de Chardin from the Greek noos, "mind."

The proof of this is that the human voice, with its effect of grabbing you by the perineum, as it were, does not unveil its truth at all.

We shall name that with the help of the aorist of the same verb that, as a famous philosopher pointed out, aletheia came from. Only philosophers would ever notice such things, and perhaps the odd linguist. I'm going to call that the "lathouses."

The world is increasingly populated by lathouses. Since you seem to find that amusing, I am going to show you how it is spelled.

You will notice that I could have called that "lathousies." That would have gone better with ousia, this participle with all its ambiguity.[5] Ousia is not the Other, it's not a being, it's between the two. It is not altogether Being either, but, ultimately, it's pretty close.

As far as the feminine unsubstance is concerned, I would go as far as "parousia." And these tiny objects little a that you will encounter when you 189 leave, there on the footpath at the corner of every street, behind every window, in this abundance of these objects designed to be the cause of your desire, insofar as it is now science that governs it—think of them as lathouses.

I notice a bit late, since it's not long since I invented it, that it rhymes with ventouse.[6] There is vent, "wind," inside, lots of wind, the wind of the human voice. It is quite comical to find that at the end of our gathering.

If man had less often played the spokesman of God in order to believe that he forms a union with a woman, this word "lathouse" would have perhaps been found a long time ago.

Be that as it may, this little emergence is designed to make you ill at ease in your relations with the lathouse.

It is quite certain that everyone has to deal with two or three of this species. The lathouse has absolutely no reason to limit its multiplication. What is important is to know what happens when one really enters into relationship with the lathouse as such.

The ideal psychoanalyst would be one who commits this absolutely radical act, and the least that one can say is that seeing it done causes anxiety.

One day, at a time when it was a question of my being traded, I tried, because it was part of the ritual, to advance a few little things on this subject. In effect, while I was being traded, people were very keen to pretend to be interested in what I might have to say about the training of analysts, and I put forward, in a spirit of absolute indifference, since everyone was only interested in what was happening in the corridors, that there was no reason why a psychoanalysis should cause anxiety. It is certain that if the lathouse exists, anxiety—since that is what we are dealing with—is not without an object. That is what I started with. A better approach to lathouse must calm us a little bit.

[5] Ousia in Plato is usually rendered into English as "essence" or "being," and in Aristotle as "substance."

[6] A ventouse is a sucker (of an octopus), a suction cap (on the tip of a toy arrow), or a cupping glass (for the bleeding of a patient).

The question is to put oneself in a position where there is someone whom you have taken charge of with respect to his anxiety, who wishes to come and hold the same position that you occupy, or that you do not occupy, or that you barely occupy, who wishes to come to know how you occupy it, and how you do not occupy it, and why you occupy it, and why you do not occupy it.

This will be the object of our next seminar, whose title I can already give 190 you—it will be on the relations, still supported by our little schemas, between impotence and impossibility.

It is clear that it is completely impossible to hold the position of the lathouse. However, that's not all that is impossible, there are many other things as well, provided one gives this word "impossible" a strict meaning—that is to say, provided one determines them only at the level of our formalized truth—namely, that in every formalized field of truth there are truths that one can never demonstrate.

It's at the level of the impossible, as you know, that I define what is real. If it is real that there are analysts, it's precisely because this is impossible. This forms part of the position of the lathouse.

What's annoying is that, in order to be in the position of the lathouse, it is really necessary to have established that it is impossible. It is for this reason that one loves to emphasize impotence so much more, which also exists, but which is, as I will show you, in another place than strict impossibility.

I know that there are some people here who are distressed from time to time by seeing me, as one says—how does one say?—abuse, interpellate, vociferate against analysts. These are young people who are not analysts. They do not realize that I am doing something nice, that these are little signs of acknowledgment that I am giving them.

I do not want to put them through too difficult a trial. And when I allude to their impotence, which is therefore my own, it means that at that level we are all brothers and sisters, and that one has to extricate oneself as best one can.

I hope this will calm them down before I talk to them about the impossibility of the analyst's position.

The impotence of truth

FREUD AND THE FOUR DISCOURSES CAPITALISM AND THE UNIVERSITY
HEGEL'S PRACTICAL JOKES
IMPOTENCE AND IMPOSSIBILITY
WHAT CAN A MISCARRIAGE DO?

We are at that time of the year when final examinations happen. I am going to try to lighten things up a bit.

Fortunately, it's drawing to a close, ça se tire, as we say. I would even be inclined to leave it at that, if I didn't have to give you, all the same, two little complements that are intended to bring out the essential of what I hope to have got across this year—two little points for the future, which may give you a glimpse, by drawing you a bit closer to it, of the way in which there are perhaps notions that are fairly new, and that have, in every case, this mark that I am always emphasizing, which those who find themselves working with me at a more practical level can confirm, of operating on a level with an experience.

It is not impossible that this will be of use elsewhere, at the level of something that is taking place now, without, for the moment, our knowing quite what. Naturally, when things happen, one never quite knows at the time they are happening what they are, especially when one covers them over with the news. But ultimately something is happening in the university.

In various places people are surprised. What's eating them, these students, the little dears, our favorites, the darlings of civilization? What's up with them? Those who are saying this are playing the fool, this is what they are paid to do.

It should nevertheless be possible that something of what I am elaborating about the relationship between the analyst's discourse and the master's discourse should show people a way to enable them, in some way, to explain themselves to one another and to understand one another.

192 What is happening at the moment is that everyone is competing with everyone else in an attempt to minimize the seriousness of failed, suppressed little demonstrations, increasingly confining them to a street, a corner. To explain it, to make it understood at the very moment at which I say I could do it, I would like you to understand this, which is that to the extent to which I managed to do this, to the extent to which I succeeded in getting you to understand something, you could be certain that to that extent I would have made you make a big mistake. For it is ultimately limited to this.

Today I would like to spell out, as simply as I can, the relationship between what is happening and the things I have been daring to manipulate for a while, which, by virtue of this fact, gives a kind of guarantee that this discourse hangs together. I have dared manipulate them in a way which is, ultimately, completely wild.

I have not hesitated to speak about the real, and not for some time, since it is even where I took the first step in this teaching. Then, years later, this little formula emerged, the impossible is the real. Heavens knows that no one abused it at first. Then I happened to trot out some reference to truth, which is more common. There are nevertheless some very important observations to make, and I think I am under an obligation to make a number of them today, before leaving all that within the reach of innocents to use without rhyme or reason, which is really par for the course, sometimes, in my entourage.

I made a trip to Vincennes last week—this succinctly tells the tale that I had replied to an invitation from that place. Besides, I announced this to you here last time, to set you off on the right path for a reference I began with, one that is far from innocent—this is even the reason why one must read Freud.

In effect, in "Analysis Terminable and Interminable" we can read the lines concerning what an analyst is.

It is observed there that one would be very mistaken to require of analysts a large dose of mental normality and correctness, they would become too rare, and then, it must not be forgotten that the analytic relation, "unendlich ist nicht zu vergessen, dass die analytische Beziehung auf Wahrheitsliebe," is founded on the love of truth, and "d. h. auf die Anerkennung der 193
Realität gegründet ist," that is to say, on the recognition of realities.

"Realität" is a word you will recognize since it is copied from our Latin. It is in competition, in the way Freud uses it, with the word "Wirklichkeit" which also can sometimes signify what the translators, without looking any further, translate quite consistently, in both cases, as "reality."

I have on this issue a little recollection of the truly frothing rage that overcame a couple, or more particularly one of them—I really do have to call him by his name, it is not an accident, it's a certain Laplanche, who has had a certain role in the avatars of my relations with analysis—at the thought that another—whom I am also going to name, since I named the former, a certain [Pierre] Kaufmann—had put forward the idea that it was necessary to distinguish between this Wirklichkeit and this Realität. The fact that he had been beaten by the other to make this remark, which was, in fact, altogether primary, had unleashed a kind of passion in the former of these two characters.

The pseudocontempt displayed by this fussing about is, actually, something quite interesting.

The sentence finishes thus, "gegründet ist und jeden Schein und Trug ausschliesst," excludes from this analytic relationship all false appearances, all deception.[1] A sentence like that is very rich. And immediately, in the following lines, it appears—despite the friendly little greeting that Freud gives the analyst on the way—that in sum there is no Analysieren. We are quite close here to truly having, we have all the appearances of, this function that is the analytic act. "Das Analysieren" does not mean anything other than this term that I employed as the title of one of my seminars.[2] The analytic act would be the third impossible profession, in inverted commas, "'unmöglichen' Berufe."

Freud quotes himself here, making reference to the fact that he has already mentioned—Where did he say it? My research is incomplete, perhaps it is in the letters to Fliess—the three professions in question, which in this previous passage he had called Regieren, Erziehen, Kurieren, and in which he is obviously following common usage. Analysis is new, and Freud inserts it into this series by substitution. The three professions, if indeed 194 they really are professions, are therefore Regieren, Erziehen, Analysieren, that is, governing, educating, and analyzing.[3]

You can't miss the overlap between these three terms and what this year I am identifying as forming the radical of the four discourses.

The discourses in question are nothing other than the signifying articulation, the apparatus whose presence, whose existing status alone dominates and governs anything that at any given moment is capable of emerging as speech. They are discourses without speech, which subsequently comes and lodges itself within them. Thus I can say to myself, concerning this intoxicating phenomenon called speaking out, that certain reference points in the discourse in which this is inserted would perhaps be of such a nature that, occasionally, one does not start to speak without knowing what one is doing.

Given a certain style of speech, in use in the month of May, the idea cannot fail to occur to me that one of the representatives of the little a, at a level that was not instituted in historical but rather in prehistoric times is, surely, the domestic animal. One can no longer employ the same letters in this case, but it is quite clear that a particular knowledge was required to domesticate what corresponds to our $\mathbb{S}$—a dog, for instance, is its barking.

One cannot fail to form the idea that if an animal that barks is indeed what barking is then S_1 takes on a meaning that there would be nothing abnormal in discovering at the level at which we are situating it, at the level of language. Everyone knows that the domestic animal is merely implicated in language by primitive knowledge, and that it does not have one. It is, obviously, only open to it to pick over what it has been given that comes closest to the signifier S_1—that is, carrion.

You will know this if you have had a good dog, whether a guard dog or some other kind, one you have had as a good friend. They are incapable of resisting carrion, they adore it. Look at the Bathory, a charming woman, a Hungarian, who every now and then liked to carve up her servants, which, of course, is the least of things one can offer oneself in a certain position. If she ever placed the said morsels a bit too close to the ground, her dogs would return them to her immediately.

This is a somewhat neglected aspect of the dog. If you didn't keep stuffing him full, at lunch or dinner, by giving him things he only likes because 195 they come from your plate, this is what he would mainly bring you.

You have to pay very close attention to the fact that at a higher level—that of an object little a, and that of another species, which we will try to define later and which will bring us back to what I have already said—speech can very easily play the role of carrion. In any case, it is no more appetizing.

This has contributed a great deal to the fact that it has been poorly understood what the importance of language has been. The deployment of speech, which has no other symbolic value, has been confused with what discourse is. As a result it is never just in any old way or at just any old time that speech functions as carrion.

The aim of these remarks is to get you to wonder over, and at least to ponder this question concerning the master's discourse. How can this discourse, which is so wonderfully well understood, have maintained its name—as is proven by the fact that workers work, whether they are exploited or not?

Work has never been given such credit ever since humanity has existed. It is even out of the question that one not work.

This is surely an accomplishment of what I am calling the master's discourse.

For this to be the case it needed to go beyond certain limits. In a word, it comes down to something whose mutation I have tried to point out for you. I hope you remember it, and in case you can't—which is quite possible—I am going to go back over it straight away. I am speaking of this capital mutation, also, which gives the master's discourse its capitalist style.

Why, good heavens, is this taking place, and why is it not taking place by chance?

You would be wrong to think that there are knowledgeable politicians somewhere who are calculating exactly how everything has to be done. You would be equally wrong to think that there are none—there are some. It is not clear that they are always in a place where one can engage in suitable action. But, ultimately, it is perhaps not this that is so important. That they exist, even if in another place, suffices for what is of the order of the displacement of discourse to be transmitted nevertheless.

196 Let's now ask how this society called capitalist society can afford to allow itself a relaxation of the university discourse.

This discourse is nevertheless merely one of these transformations that I have been expounding all along. It's the quarter turn in relation to the master's discourse. Hence a question which it is worth making the effort to envisage—if we embrace this relaxation which, it has to be said, has been offered, aren't we falling into a trap? The idea is not new.

As it happens, I have written a short article on university reform, which I had been invited to write for a newspaper, the only one to have a reputation for balance and honesty, by the name of Le Monde. They had insisted that I write this little page concerning the reorganization of psychiatry, concerning reform. Now, it is quite striking that despite this insistence this little article, which I will publish some day, did not get through.

In it I speak of "a reform in its hole." Precisely, it was obviously a matter of using this whirlwind of a hole to take a number of measures concerning the university. And good heavens, by correctly referring to the terms of certain fundamental discourses one might have certain scruples, let's say, about acting, one might look twice before jumping in to profit from the lines that have opened up. It is quite some responsibility to transport carrion down these corridors.

That is what our remarks today, which are not usually, not commonly said, must be linked up with.

$$\frac{S_2}{S_1} \rightarrow \frac{a}{$} \qquad \frac{S_1}{$} \rightarrow \frac{S_2}{a}$$

$$\frac{a}{S_2} \rightarrow \frac{$}{S_1} \qquad \frac{\text{agent}}{\text{truth}} \rightarrow \frac{\text{work}}{\text{production}}$$

This is like an apparatus. You should, at least, get the idea that it could be used as a lever, as a pair of pliers, that it can be screwed down, assembled in one way or another.

There are several terms. It's no accident if I have given only these little 197 letters here. It's because I do not want to put things up that might give the appearance of signifying. I do not at all want to signify them, but to authorize them. Writing them is already to authorize them a bit more.

I have already discussed what constitutes the places in which these non-signifying things are inscribed, and I have already spelt out what it is that is the agent.

This term carries a connotation as if it were a sort of enigma of the French language—the agent is not at all necessarily someone who does but someone who is caused to act.

As a consequence, and as you may already suspect, it is not at all clear that the master functions. This, in all probability, defines the place of the master. This is the best thing one can ask oneself concerning him, and naturally people didn't wait for me to do it. A certain Hegel had a go at it, though you have to take a closer look.

It is very irritating to think that there are perhaps not five people here who have fully read The Phenomenology of Spirit since I have been talking about it. I won't ask them to raise their hand.

It pisses me off that I have until now only come across two people who have read it completely, since I too, I have to confess, have not peered into every corner. I have in mind my master, Alexandre Kojève, who has demonstrated this a thousand times over, and one other person, of a kind that you won't believe. The latter has truly read The Phenomenology of Spirit in an illuminating manner, to the extent that everything that might be in Kojève's notes, which I had and which I passed onto him, was truly superfluous.

What is unheard of is that, even though at one stage I wore myself out making people aware of the fact that The Critique of Practical Reason is manifestly a book of eroticism that is extraordinarily more amusing than what Eric Losfeld has published, it has had no kind of effect, and that, if I say to you that The Phenomenology of Spirit is hysterically funny, well then, this won't fare any better.[4] And yet, that is what it is.

It is truly the most extraordinary thing there is. It is also a cold, I won't say black, humor. There is one thing you can be absolutely convinced of, which is that he knows perfectly well what he is doing. What he is doing is sleight of hand and he takes the whole world in. And this, on the basis of the fact that what he says is true.

198 There is obviously no better way to pin down the master signifier S_1, which is up there on the board, than by identifying it with death. And so, what is involved? It involves showing in a dialectic, as Hegel puts it, what it is that is the zenith, the highest point, the thought of this term's function.

What, in sum, is the point of entry of this brute, the master, into the phenomenology of mind, as Hegel puts it? The truth of what he articulates is absolutely seductive and sensational. We can actually read it there, opposite us, provided we allow ourselves to be taken in by it, since I assert, precisely, that it cannot be read off directly. The truth of what he articulates is this—the relationship to this real insofar as it is, properly speaking, impossible.

It's not at all clear why there should be a master who emerges from the struggle to death of pure prestige. And this is despite the fact that Hegel himself says that it would result in this strange outcome at the start.

To cap it off, Hegel finds a way—it is true, in a conception of history that touches on what emerges from it, namely the succession of phases of dominance, of composition of the play of the mind [esprit], which runs the length of this thread that is not nothing, which up until his day was called philosophical thought—Hegel finds a way to show that what results from this is that in the end it is the slave who, through his work, produces the master's truth, by pushing him down underneath. By virtue of this forced labor, as you can see from the outset, the slave ends up, at the end of history, at this point called absolute knowledge.

Nothing is said about what happens next, because in truth, in the Hegelian proposition, there were not four terms, but initially the master and then the slave. I call this slave S_2, but you can also identify him here by way of the term jouissance, which, first, he did not want to renounce and which, secondly, he did indeed want to, since he substitutes work for it, which is not at all its equivalent.

Owing to what? Owing to the series of dialectical mutations, to the ballet, the minuet that is established on the basis of this initial moment and that traverses the entire development of culture from start to finish, thread by thread, history finally compensates us with this knowledge that is not described as completed—there are good reasons for this—but as absolute, as indisputable. And the master subsequently appears only as the instrument, the magnificent Cuckold of history. 199

It is sublime that this quite remarkable dialectical deduction was undertaken, and that it should have succeeded, if one can say this. All the way through—take as an example what Hegel is able to say about culture—the most pertinent remarks concerning the play of events and exercises of wit abound. I repeat, there is nothing more amusing.

The cunning of reason is, he tells us, what directed the entire game.

This is a very fine term which has a lot of value for us, analysts, and we can follow it at the level of our ABC, whether reasonable or not, for we are dealing with something very cunning in speech where the unconscious is concerned. However, the high point of this cunning is not where one thinks it is. It is the cunning of reason, no doubt, but one has to recognize the cunning of the reasoner, and take one's hat off to him.

Had it been possible that at the beginning of the last century, at the time of the battle of Iéna, this extraordinary dirty trick called The Phenomenology of Spirit should have subjugated anyone, the trick would have succeeded.

It is in effect quite evident that not for a single instant can one hold that we are in any way approaching the ascendancy of the slave. This unbelievable way of giving him the credit—giving his work the credit—for any kind of progress, as we say, of knowledge is, truly, extraordinarily futile.

But what I am calling the cunning of the reasoner is there to make us aware of an essential dimension, which one has to be careful about. If we designate the agent's place—whoever it is, this place is not always that of the master signifier, since all the other signifiers are going to pass through there in turn—the question is as follows. What makes this agent act? How is it possible to produce this extraordinary circuit around which what deserves, strictly speaking, to be designated by the term "revolution" revolves?

Here, at a certain level, we rediscover Hegel's expression, "putting work back into the world."

Which is truth? It is located there, with a question mark. What inaugurates this agent, what brings him into play? For, in the end, it has not been there forever, it has been there ever since historical time.

A good thing to appreciate concerning such a brilliant case, so dazzling that precisely for that reason it doesn't occur to one, one is unable to see it, is this. Hegel is the sublime representative of the discourse of knowledge [savoir] and of university knowledge. 200

We others in France only ever have as philosophers people who travel the highways and byways, little members of provincial societies, such as Maine de Biran, or else characters like Descartes, who wander all over Europe. You nevertheless have to know how to read him, too, and listen to his tone—he speaks of what he can expect from his birth. One sees what sort of a fellow he was. This doesn't mean he was an idiot, far from it.

Here in France, you won't find the philosophers in the universities. We can claim this as an advantage. But in Germany they are in the university. And people are capable, at a certain level of university status, of thinking that these poor fellows, these dear little chaps, the ones who at that time were only just entering the industrial era, the great era of hard labor, of exploitation unto death, will be captivated by the revelation of this truth that they are the ones who make history, and that the master is only there to get the show on the road.

This is a valuable remark, and it is my intention to emphasize it forcefully, because of Freud's phrase that the analytic relationship must be founded on the love of truth.

He really was a charming character, this Freud. He really was all fire, all flame. He also had his weaknesses. His relationship with his wife, for example, is something unimaginable. To have tolerated such a trollop his entire existence is quite something.

Anyway, take note of the following—if there is something that truth must inspire you with, if you want to uphold Analysieren, it is certainly not love. For truth, as it happens, makes this signifier "death" appear. And even, there is every appearance that if there is one thing that gives a completely different sense to what Hegel proposed, it is what Freud had nevertheless discovered at that time, which he characterized as best he could, as the death instinct, namely the radical character of repetition, this repetition that insists, and which characterizes the psychical reality, if there is such a thing, of this being inscribed in language.

201 It's perhaps the case that truth has no other face. That's no reason to go mad over it.

This isn't exact either. Truth has more than one face. But that's the point, what could be the first line of conduct to maintain as far as analysts are concerned is to be a little suspicious of it, and not to become all of a sudden mad about a truth, about the first pretty face encountered at the first turn in the road.

This is precisely where we encounter this remark of Freud's in which we find "reality" accompanied by this Analysieren. It is indeed the sort of remark to make us say that, in effect, there is perhaps, just like that, a completely naïve real—this is how people generally speak—that passes itself off as the truth. Truth is experienced, this does not at all mean that it thereby knows [connaît] any more about the real, especially if one speaks about knowing, and if one bears in mind the features of the real that I point out.

If the real is defined as the impossible the real is placed at the stage at which the register of a symbolic articulation was found to be defined as the impossible to demonstrate to be true. This may help us take the measure of our love for truth—and it may also enable us to put our finger on why governing, educating, analyzing also, and why not, causing desire, so as to complete the series with a definition of what the hysteric's discourse might be, are operations that, strictly speaking, are impossible.

These operations exist, they are robust, very much so, in so far as they raise for us the question of what their truth is—that is to say, how they are produced—these mad things which are defined in the real as only being able to be articulated, when one nears them, as impossible. It is clear that their full articulation as impossible is precisely what gives us the risk, the barely glimpsed opportunity, that their real, if I can put it like this, breaks out.

If we are obliged to swan around at such length in the corridors, the labyrinths of truth, it's because there is precisely something that prevents us from concluding. And why be astonished by this when it concerns those discourses that for us are brand new? It is not as if one has not yet had a good three-quarters of a century to envisage things from this angle, but then, being seated in an armchair is perhaps not the best position from which to come to grips with the impossible.

Be that as it may, we are forever wandering about in the dimension of 202 the love of truth, and everything indicates that this dimension makes the impossibility of that which maintains itself as real slide between our fingers, at the level, quite precisely, of the master's discourse, as Hegel has said. This fact necessitates the reference to what analytic discourse, fortunately, enables us to glimpse and articulate exactly. And this is why it is important that I articulate it.

I am persuaded that there are five or six people here who will be very well able to displace what I am saying in such a way that it will have a chance of reemerging.

I won't say that this is Archimedes' lever. I will not tell you that this makes the slightest claim to a renewal of the world system, or of thinking about history. I am only indicating how it is that analysis places us on a footing to accept, through chance encounters, a number of things that may appear to be illuminating.

Myself, for example, I might easily have never encountered Kojève. If I had never encountered him, it is highly likely that, like all French people educated over a certain period, I would never have suspected that there was anything in The Phenomenology of Spirit.

It would not be a bad thing if analysis enabled you to realize what the impossibility is due to, that is to say, what it is that stands in the way of grasping, of seizing the only thing that could perhaps ultimately introduce a mutation, namely, the naked real, without truth.

But there's the rub. Between us and the real, there is truth. Truth, as I once told you one day in a flight of lyricism, is the dear little sister of jouissance. I hope that this has come back to mind, at least for some of you, at the moment when I am stressing the contrast between the first line and the second in each of the four formulas that I have given you.

The first line comprises a relation, indicated here by an arrow, which is always defined as impossible. In the master's discourse, for instance, it is effectively impossible that there be a master who makes the entire world 203 function. Getting people to work is even more tiring, if one really has to do it, than working oneself. The master never does it. He gives a sign, the master signifier, and everybody jumps. That's where you have to start, which is, in effect, completely impossible. It's tangible every day.

With impossibility written on the first line, it is now a matter of seeing, as is already indicated by the place given to the term "truth," whether it might be at the level of the second line that one would have the last word.

However, at the level of the second line there is no suggestion of an arrow. And not only is there no communication, but there is something that acts as a block.

What is it that is blocking? It is what results from the work. And what a certain Marx's discovery accomplished was to give full weight to a term that was already known prior to him and that designates what work occupies itself with—it's called production.

Whatever the signs, whatever the master signifiers that come to be inscribed in the place of the agent, under no circumstances will production have a relationship to truth. One can do all one wants, one can say all one wants, one can try to conjoin this production with needs, which are the needs one fashions—there is nothing doing. Between the existence of a master and a production's relation with truth, there is no way of getting it to work.

Each impossibility, whatever it may be, between the terms that we put in play here is always linked to this—if it leaves us in suspense over its truth, it is because something is protecting it, which we shall call impotence.

Take, for instance, in the university discourse, the initial term, the one that is articulated here under the term S_2 and is in this position of unheard-of pretension of having a thinking being, a subject, as its production. As subject, in its production, there is no question of it being able to see itself for a single instant as the master of knowledge.

This can be detected here, tangibly, but it extends much further back, back to the level of the master's discourse which, thanks to Hegel, I allow myself to presuppose since, as you will see, we no longer know it now except in a considerably modified form.

This surplus jouissance that I have articulated this year is a construction, even a reconstruction, and I am putting it at the start as a support. It is a 204 truer support. Let's be careful, this is indeed what is dangerous about it, but all the same it does have the strength to be articulated in this way, as one can see by reading people like Aristotle, principally, who have not read Hegel.

When we read Aristotle we have the suspicion that the master's relation to the slave really presented him with a problem. He was looking for the slave's truth, and it is really magnificent to see the way in which he tries to extricate himself in the three or four passages in which he deals with it—he only goes in a single direction, that of an essential difference from which the slave's good would emerge.

He is not an academic. He is not a clever little fellow like Hegel. He senses that when he utters this or that, it gets away from him, it slides all over the place. He is neither very sure nor very passionate. He does not impose his own opinion. But then, he feels that this is where there might well be something that motivates the relationship between master and slave. Ah! If they were not the same sex, if they were man and woman, this would be truly sublime, and he hints that there would be some hope. Unfortunately, that's not how it is, they are not of different sexes, and he shrugs his shoulders. We can see clearly what is going on, it's what, in the name of surplus jouissance, the master receives from the slave's work.

It would seem that this has to be self-evident. And what is unheard of is that nobody seems to notice that there is, precisely, a lesson to be learned from the fact that it is not self-evident. The problems of ethics here, suddenly, start to abound—the Nicomachean Ethics, the Eudemian Ethics, and several other works of moral reflection.

It's irresolvable. Nobody knows what to do with this surplus jouissance. In order to successfully place a sovereign good at the heart of the world, you need to be as embarrassed as a fish with an apple. And yet the surplus jouissance that the slave brings us lies within arm's reach.

What is demonstrated, attested to, by all the thought of Antiquity that Hegel makes us revisit with his wonderful sleight of hand and other acts, including the politicized masochism of the Stoics, is that to calmly set oneself up as the master's subject cannot be done qua surplus jouissance.

Let's now take the hysteric's discourse as it is articulated—place the $ on the top left-hand corner, the S_1 on the right, the S_2 underneath, the small a in the place of truth. It cannot be the case, either, that the hysteric's 205 division, symptomatic tearing apart, is motivated as the production of knowledge [savoir]. Her truth is that she has to be the object a in order to be desired. The object a is a bit thin, at the end of the day, although, of course, men go crazy about it and they are unable even to suspect that they could get by with anything else—another sign of the impotence that covers the most subtle of all impossibilities.

Let's move on to the level of the analyst's discourse. Naturally, nobody has made the observation that it is fairly curious that what he produces is nothing other than the master's discourse, since it's S_1 which comes to occupy the place of production. And, as I was saying last time when I was leaving Vincennes, perhaps it's from the analyst's discourse that there can emerge another style of master signifier.

In truth, whether it is another style or not, it is not in two days' time that we will learn what it is, and at least for the moment we are completely impotent when it comes to referring it to what is at play in the analyst's position, namely, this seduction of truth that he presents in the fact that he would know a bit about what, in principle, he represents.

Am I adequately stressing the features of the impossibility of his situation?—insofar as the analyst puts himself in the position of representing, through being the agent, the cause of desire?

This, then, is the relationship between these terms that are four in number. The one I have not named is the unnamable one, because the entire structure is founded upon its prohibition—that is to say, jouissance.

This is where the little perspective, the little window, the way of looking that analysis has contributed introduces us to what may be a fertile step, not of thought, but of act. And it is in this that it appears to be revolutionary.

It is not situated around the subject. Whatever fertility the hysteric's questioning has displayed, questioning which, as I have said, is the first to introduce the subject into history, and although the entry of the subject 206 as agent of discourse has had very surprising results, the foremost of which is that of science, it is not here, for all that, that the key to all the mainsprings is to be found. The key lies in raising the question of what jouissance is.

It could be said that jouissance is limited by natural processes. But, actually, we have no idea whether they are natural processes. We simply know that we have ended up considering to be natural the mollycoddling that a society that is more or less orderly maintains us in, except that everyone is dying to know what would happen if things went really bad. Hence this sadomasochistic dread that characterizes our nice sexual ambiance.

That is completely futile, even secondary. What is important is that, whether natural or not, it is well and truly as bound to the very origin of the signifier's coming into play that it is possible to speak of jouissance. Nobody will ever know anything about what the oyster or the beaver enjoys, because, in the absence of the signifier, there is no distance between jouissance and the body. The oyster and the beaver are at the same level as the plant, which, after all, perhaps may have jouissance at this level.

Jouissance is very precisely correlated with the initial form of the entry into play of what I am calling the mark, the unary trait, which is a mark toward death, if you want to give it its meaning. Observe that nothing takes on any meaning except when death comes into play.

It is on the basis of the split, the separation, between jouissance and the henceforth mortified body, it is from the moment that there is a play of inscriptions, a mark of the unary trait, that the question arises. There is no need to wait until the subject has shown itself to have been well hidden, at the level of the master's truth. The subject's division is without doubt nothing other than the radical ambiguity that attaches itself to the very term, "truth."

It is insofar as language, everything that institutes the order of discourse, leaves things in a gap that, in sum, we can be confident that in following our thread we are always doing nothing other than following a contour. But it does bring us something extra, and it is the minimum that it would be really necessary for us to know for a reply to the question with which I began, namely, what is currently going on at the level of the university discourse.

We have to begin by seeing why it is that the master's discourse is so solidly established, to the point where few of you, it seems, judge how stable it is. This stems from something Marx demonstrated—without, I have to say, emphasizing it—concerning production and which he calls surplus value, not surplus jouissance. 207

Something changed in the master's discourse at a certain point in history. We are not going to break our backs finding out if it was because of Luther, or Calvin, or some unknown traffic of ships around Genoa, or in the Mediterranean Sea, or anywhere else, for the important point is that on a certain day surplus jouissance became calculable, could be counted, totalized. This is where what is called the accumulation of capital begins.

Don't you feel, in relation to what I said before on the impotence of conjoining surplus value with the master's truth, that ground is being won here? I am not saying that it is the most recent step that is the decisive one, but the impotence of this conjunction is all of a sudden emptied. Surplus value combines with capital—not a problem, they are homogeneous, we are in the field of values. Moreover, we are all up to our necks in it, in these blessed times in which we live.

What is striking, and what no one seems to see, is that from that moment on, by virtue of the fact that the clouds of impotence have been aired, the master signifier only appears even more unassailable, precisely in its impossibility. Where is it? How can it be named? How can it be located?—other than through its murderous effects, of course. Denounce imperialism? But how can this little mechanism be stopped?

Where do things stand now with the university discourse? Nowhere else can there be any possibility that things should move a bit. How can they move? I reserve the right to point this out to you later since, as you can see, I am going slowly. But I can already tell you that at the level of the university discourse the object a comes to occupy a place that is in play each time it moves, the place of more or less tolerable exploitation.

The object a is what makes it possible to introduce a little bit of air into the function of surplus jouissance. You are all an object a, insofar as you are lined up there—so many miscarriages of what has been, for those who engendered you, the cause of desire. And this is where you have to get your bearings from—psychoanalysis teaches you this.

Please don't bore me stupid telling me that I would do well to point out to those who are agitating here and there that there is a world of difference between the miscarriage of the high bourgeoisie and that of the proletariat.
208 After all, the miscarriage of the high bourgeoisie, as miscarriage, is not obliged constantly to carry its incubator around with it.

The fact remains that the claim to situate oneself at a point that would all of a sudden be particularly illuminated, illuminable, and that would manage to make these relations move, must not, all the same, be elevated to the point to which things were pushed by a person—a little recollection that I give to you—who accompanied me for two or three months of what it is customary to call the folly of youth. This delightful person said to me, "I am of pure proletarian race."

We are never finally done with segregation. I can tell you that it will only ever continue to increase. Nothing can function without it—what is happening here, as the a, the a in living form, miscarriage that it is, displays the fact that it is an effect of language.

Be that as it may, there is in every case a level at which things do not work out. It's the level of those who have produced the effects of language, since no child is born without having to deal with this traffic by the intermediary of his beloved so-called progenitors, who were themselves caught up in the entire problem of discourse, with the previous generation behind them also. And this is the level at which it would really be necessary to have made enquiries.

If it's one's wish that something turn—of course, ultimately, no one can ever turn, as I have emphasized enough—it is certainly not by being progressive, it is simply because it can't prevent itself from turning. If it doesn't turn, it will grind away, there where things raise questions, that is, at the level of putting something into place that can be written as a.

Has that ever existed? Yes, no doubt, and it is the Ancients who, in the end, give us its strongest proof and, subsequently, over the course of ages, the formal, classical things that in some way were copied from them.

For us, at the level at which things are happening for the moment, what can this point of auscultation, everything that in the body remains alive, remains as knowledge, this nursling, why not, this look, this cry, this squawking, it barks—what can this hope for? What can it do?

I will try to tell you next time what that which I call "the strike of culture" signifies.[5]

The power of the impossibles

A BIT OF SHAME IN THE SAUCE

THE MILK OF TRUTH PUTS ONE TO SLEEP

THE LUSTER OF THE REAL

THE STUDENT, BROTHER OF THE LUMPEN-PROLETARIAT

A LITTLE SHELTER

It does have to be said that it is unusual to die of shame.

Yet it is the one sign—I have been talking about this for a while, how a signifier becomes a sign—the one sign whose genealogy one can be certain of, namely that it is descended from a signifier. After all, any sign can fall under the suspicion of being a pure sign, that is to say, obscene [obscène], Vincennes [vinscène], dare I say, a good example to make you laugh.[1]

Dying of shame, then. Here, the degeneration of the signifier is certain—certain to be produced by the signifier's failure, namely, being toward death, insofar as it concerns the subject—and who else could it concern? Being toward death, that is, the visiting card by which a signifier represents a subject for another signifier—you are beginning to know this off by heart, I hope.

This visiting card never arrives at the right destination, the reason being that for it to bear the address of death, the card has to be torn up. "It's a shame [une honte]," as they say, which should produce a (h)ontology [hontologie] spelled properly at last.

In the meantime, to die of shame is the only affect of death that deserves—deserves what?—that deserves to die.

People have been quiet about this for a long time. Speaking about it, in effect, is to open this redoubt, which is not the last, the only one that what can be said honestly of the honest partakes in, "honest," which stems from the honor—that is all shame and companion—of making no mention of 210 shame. Precisely, of the fact that it is impossible for the honest to die of shame. You know from me that this means the real.

"He doesn't deserve to die for that!" people say about anything and

[1] Vincennes was the site of the University of Paris VIII campus. The university was founded in 1969 and included the Department of Psychoanalysis headed at that time by Serge Leclaire. Lacan is playing on "vain scene."

everything, thus bringing everything down to being futile. Said as it is said, with that end in mind, it elides the fact that death can be deserved.

Now, it should not be a matter of eliding the impossible, as it happens, but of being its agent. To say that death is deserved—the time at least to die of shame that it's not so, that it's deserved.

If it happens now, well then, it was the only way to deserve it. You were lucky. If it doesn't happen, which, with respect to the preceding surprise, is bad luck, then you're left with a life of shame by the bucketful, by virtue of the fact that it is not worth dying for.

Is it worth my speaking about it in this way?—when, as soon as one speaks about it, the twenty scenes [vingt-scènes] I mentioned above are only asking to be taken up again in the form of buffoonery.

Vincennes, precisely.

They were, it seems, pleased with what I said there, pleased with me. It wasn't reciprocal. I was not very pleased with Vincennes.

Despite there being one nice person who tried to fill up the first row, to make a Vincennes [faire Vincennes], there was clearly no one from Vincennes there, or hardly anyone, only the ears of those most worthy of awarding me a good mark. It was not quite what I had been expecting, especially as my teaching, it seems, has been propagated there. There are times when I can be aware of a certain slack.

But then, there was nonetheless just what was needed to indicate to us the point of agreement that there can be between La Minute and Les Temps modernes. I only mention it because, as you will see, this touches on today's topic—how to behave in the face of culture?

Sometimes something minor is enough to throw a glimmer of light, a recollection which nobody knows how I myself became aware of. Once you recall the publication of a certain tape recording in Les Temps modernes, the relationship with La Minute is striking.[2] Try this, it's fascinating, I have done it. You cut out paragraphs from the two newspapers, you mix them up 211 together somewhere, and you draw them out. I assure you that, except for the paper, it won't be so easy to work out which is which.

This is what must make it possible for us to take the question in another way than on the basis of the objection I made just before to touching on things in a certain tone, with a certain word, out of fear that they might get carried away by buffoonery. Begin, instead, with the following fact, that the buffoonery is already present. Perhaps, by adding a bit of shame to the mix, who knows, this might keep it in check.

In short, I am playing the game of "You hear me because I am talking to you." Otherwise, there would, rather, be an objection to your hearing me, since in many cases this prevents you from hearing what I am saying. And it's a pity, for at least the younger ones among you have for a fair while now also been capable of saying it without me. You lack for that, precisely, a bit of shame. It might come to you.

Obviously, you do not find it under the hooves of horses, of a hobby-horse even less, but the furrows of the alethosphere, as I said, that take care of you, and even careful you [soyousent] all alive already, would perhaps already be quite a sufficient load of shame.

Appreciate why it was that Pascal and Kant fidgeted about like two valets in the process of acting like Vatel with respect to you. There has been a lack of truth up above for three centuries. The service has arrived nevertheless, reheating on demand, even as the musician has from time to time, as you know. Don't make such a long face, you are being served, you can say that there is no longer any shame.

These boxes about which, when I say that they are empty of chatter, you wonder what is bothering me—well then, quickly make provision in them for enough shame so that when the festivities begin, there is no lack of seasoning.

You will say to me, "What's the use of shame? If that is what the other side of psychoanalysis is, we don't want any." My reply to you is, "You've got enough to open a shop." If you are not yet aware of this, then do a bit of analysis, as they say. You will see this vapid air of yours run up against an outlandish shame of living.

That's what psychoanalysis discovers. Be a bit serious and you will 212 notice that this shame is justified by the fact that you do not die of shame, that is, by your maintaining with all your force a discourse of the perverted master—which is the university discourse. Rhegel yourselves! I say.

On Sunday I returned to this damned satire called The Phenomenology of Spirit, wondering whether I wasn't misleading you last time when I dragged you through those reminiscences I was indulging myself in. Not at all. It's staggering.

You will see this, for example, "Ignoble consciousness is the truth of noble consciousness."[3] And it's dispatched in a way that draws you up short. The more unworthy you are—I won't say obscene, that's been out of the question for a long time—the better off you are. That really clarifies the recent reforms of the university, for instance. Everything, credit points—to have the makings of culture, of a hell of a general, in your rucksack, plus some medals besides, just like an agricultural show, that will pin onto you what people dare call mastery. Wonderful! You'll have it coming out of your ears.

Being ashamed of not dying from this would perhaps introduce another tone to it, that with which the real is concerned. I said the real and not the truth for, as I already explained to you last time, it's a temptation to suck the milk of truth, but it's toxic. It will put you to sleep, and that's all that is expected of you.

I recommended to one charming person that he reread Baltasar Gracián, who, as you know, was a Jesuit living at the turn of the sixteenth century. He wrote his great pieces at the start of the seventeenth century. All things considered, this is where the view of the world that suits us was born. Even before science climbed to our zenith people sensed it coming. It's curious, but that's how it is. It's even to be recorded for any truly experimental appreciation of history that the Baroque, which suits us so well—and modern art, whether figurative or not, is the same—began before, or at just the same time as, the initial steps of science.

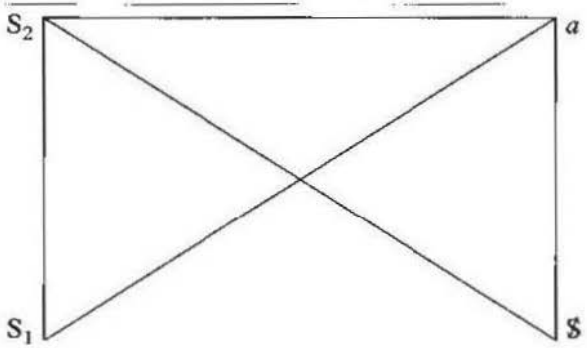
In El Criticón, which is a sort of fable in which the plot of Robinson Crusoe, for example, is already found to be included—the majority of masterpieces are the crumbs of other unknown masterpieces—in the third part, on the dimension of old age—since he takes this graph of ages—we find something called "truth in labor" in the second chapter.

'Truth is in labor in a town that is only inhabited by beings of the high- 213
est purity. This doesn't stop them from taking flight, and under the influence of a hell of a fear, when they are told that truth is like having a child.

I wonder why they asked me to explain this, when this discovery was made for me—for, in truth, it wasn't me that located it—unless they didn't come to my last seminar, for this is precisely what I said then.

It's here that one has to hold firm, for if you want your remarks to be subversive, you must take great care that they don't get too bogged down on the path to truth.

What I wanted to spell out last time in putting on the board these things that I can't keep drawing every time is that the S_1, the master signifier which holds the secret to knowledge in its university situation, is very tempting to stick to. You remain caught up in it.



What I am indicating, and perhaps it's this alone that a number of you will be able to retain from this year, is that one should focus on the level of production—of the production of the university system. A certain production is expected of you. It is perhaps a matter of obtaining this effect, of substituting another for it.

On this matter, simply as a stage, a relay, and because I presented them as an indicator of what I had declared to you last time, I will read you three pages. I apologize to those few people with whom I have already been through this.

These three pages are a reply to this inquisitive Belgian who asked me some questions that hold my interest sufficiently for me to wonder whether I hadn't dictated them myself without knowing it. He deserves credit for them.

214 Here, then, is the sixth one, charmingly naïve, "In what respect are knowledge and truth"—everyone knows that I have tried to show that they are stitched together, these two virtues—"incompatible?"[4]

I say to him, "Speaking off the cuff, nothing is incompatible with truth: we piss on it, we spit on it. It is a thoroughfare or, to put it better, a place for the evacuation of knowledge and all the rest. It is possible to cleave to it permanently, even to be driven mad by it.

"It is worth noting that I put psychoanalysts on their guard, by connoting this locus they are engaged to through their knowledge as 'love.' I would say to them straight away: one does not marry truth; there can be no contract with her, and even less can there be any open liaison. She won't stand for any of that. Truth is firstly a seduction, intended to deceive you. If you are not to be taken in, you must be strong. This is not the case with you.

"This is how I spoke to psychoanalysts, this ghost that I hail, even that I haul, against the joy of rushing at the invariable hour and day ever since the times when I upheld the wager for you that psychoanalysts understand me. It is therefore not you that I am informing; you do not run the risk of being bitten by truth; but—who knows?—should what I am fashioning ever come alive, should the psychoanalyst ever take over from me, at the limits of the hope that this is not encountered, it's them that I am alerting; that one has everything to learn from truth, this common place destines each one to get lost in it. It will be enough that each knows something about it, and he would do well to leave it at that. It would be even better were he to do nothing. There is no more treacherous an instrument.

"We know how a—not the—psychoanalyst typically extracts himself; he leaves the thread of this truth to the one who already has his worries with it and who, in this capacity, really does become his patient, as a result of which he worries about it like a curse.

"Nevertheless, it is a fact that for some time some people have been making it their business to feel themselves more concerned about it. This is perhaps due to my influence. I have perhaps played some part in this correction. And this is precisely what makes it my duty to warn them not to go too far, because if I have obtained it, it's through not giving the appearance of having laid a finger on it. But this is precisely what is serious, besides, of course, one pretends to be somewhat terrified by it. It is a refusal. But a refusal doesn't exclude collaboration. A refusal can itself be a collaboration."

For those who listen to me on the radio and who do not, as I was saying before, have any impediment to hearing what I am saying, which is to understand me, I will go on. It is for this reason that I am reading it to you, since, if I can speak it at a particular level of the mass media, why not give it a trial run here?

And then, these initial responses that have so bewildered you here, and 215 that, it seems, went across over the radio much better than people think, have confirmed the principle that I have adopted, and that is in the line of things that today I would like to pass on to you. This is one of the methods by which it would be possible to take action upon culture.

When one is caught by chance at the level of a large public, of one of these masses that a type of medium presents you with, why not precisely raise the level, in proportion to the assumed ineptitude—which is a pure assumption—of this field? Why lower the tone? Who do you have to rope in? It is precisely the game of culture to engage you in this system, namely, once the aim is reached, you can't tell head from tail.

Here, then, and even though it is still altogether possible to say it in this room, I am saying what is remarkable, for not having been remarked upon, in my formula of the subject supposed to know, as the mainspring of the transference.

"I have not said that the psychoanalyst is moreover supposed to know the truth about the supposed knowledge out of which, according to me, the psychoanalysand makes the transference. Think about it, and you will understand how adding this complement to it would be fatal for the transference. But equally, do not think about it if understanding this would, precisely, prevent its effect from remaining true.

"I suffer indignation over the fact that one person dresses up what I am denouncing in the little knowledge from which the transference draws its material. It's only up to him to furnish that with something besides the chair he says he is ready to sell if I am right. He leaves no way out of the affair only because he doesn't restrict himself to his means. The psychoanalyst only insists upon not having a bone to pick in his being. The famous non-knowledge for which people mock us is only dear to his heart because, for him, he knows nothing. He repudiates the mode of unearthing a shadow and then pretending it is carrion, repudiates being valued as a hunting dog. His discipline steeps him in the fact that the real is not initially there to be known—this is the only dam that can hold idealism back.

"Knowledge gets added to the real; indeed, it is for this reason that it can bring the false into being, and even into being there a bit.[5] I dasein with all my force on this occasion, one needs help for this.

"To be truthful, it is only from where knowledge is false that it is concerned with the truth. All knowledge that is not false couldn't give a damn about it. In becoming known, only its form is a surprise, a surprise in dubious taste, moreover, when by the grace of Freud it speaks to us of language, since it is nothing but its product.

216 "This is where the political impact takes place. It concerns, here, this question in act: Out of what knowledge is the law made? Once one has uncovered this knowledge, it may happen that that changes. Knowledge falls to the rank of symptom, seen from another perspective. And this is where truth comes in.

"For truth one fights, which is, however, only produced through its relations with the real. But that it is produced is much less important than what that produces. The effect of truth is only a collapse of knowledge. It is this collapse that creates a production, soon to be taken up again.

"The real is neither better nor worse off as a result. In general it dusts itself off until the next crisis. Its momentary benefit is that it has refound its gloss. This would even be the benefit that one might expect from any revolution, this gloss that would shine for a long time in this always murky locus of truth. But there's the rub. This shine never again throws light on anything."

[5] être-là, "being there," is the French for Dasein, picked up in the following sentence.

That is what I had cast into a corner the day after the last seminar—for you, apparently, since there is no longer any question of adding it to my little radiological raft.

What has to be understood in this respect is the following—what is frightening about truth is what it puts in its place.

The locus of the Other, as I have always said, is made for truth to be inscribed there, that is, everything of that order, the false, even lies—which only exist on the foundation of truth. This is in the free play speech [parole] and language.

But what about truth in this quadrupedal structure, which presupposes language and takes a discourse to be structured, that is, which conditions any speech able to be produced therein? What does the truth in question, the truth of this discourse, that is what it conditions, put in its place? How is it that the master's discourse holds firm? This is the other face of the function of truth, not the visible face, but the dimension in which it is necessitated by something hidden.

Our furrows in the alethosphere are traced out on the surface of the longtime deserted heavens. But at issue is what one day I called—using this word which titillated some of you enough to the point of wondering what had come over me—the lathouse.

It wasn't I who invented this dimension of truth which makes it the case that it is hidden. It is Verborgenheit[6] that constitutes it. In short, things are 217 such that it makes one think it has something in its belly.

Very early on there were some clever people who observed that if this were to emerge, it would be dreadful. Probably winged as well, so as to improve the landscape. Nowadays, it is equally possible that this is the whole thing, that it would be terrible if it were to emerge. If you spend your time waiting, then you are done for. In sum, one mustn't tease the lathouse too much. What does undertaking this always assure? What I am forever explaining to you—it assures the impossible by virtue of the fact that this relationship is effectively real. The more your quest is located on the side of truth, the more you uphold the power of the impossibles which are those that I respectively enumerated for you last time—governing, educating, analyzing on occasion. For analysis, in any case, this is obvious.

The subject supposed to know scandalizes, when I am simply approaching the truth.

[6] "Concealment." The term is Heidegger's.

My little quadrupedal schemas—I am telling you this today to alert you to it—are not the Ouija boards of history. It is not necessarily the case that things always happen this way, and that things rotate in the same direction. This is only an appeal for you to locate yourselves in relation to what one can call radical functions, in the mathematical sense of the term.

Concerning functions, the decisive step was taken somewhere around this epoch that I designated some time ago, around what there is in common between Galileo's initial step, the emergence of the integrals and differentials in Leibniz, and then also the emergence of logarithms.

A function is this something that entered the real, that had never entered it beforehand, and that does not correspond to discovering, experimenting, seizing, detaching, disclosing, no, but to writing—writing two orders of relations.

Let me illustrate where logarithms arose. In one case the first relation is addition. Addition is nevertheless intuitive. There are some things here, 218 some things there, you put them together, and you get a new collection. Multiplying loaves is not the same as collecting loaves. It is a matter of applying one of these relations to the other. You invent the logarithm. It starts to run wild in the world, on the basis of little rules that seem to be insignificant. But do not think that the fact that they exist leaves you, any of you who are here, in the same state as before they appeared. Their presence is all that matters.

Well then, let me tell you that these more or less winged little terms—S_1, S_2, a, $$$—can be of use in a very large number of relations. One only needs to become accustomed to how to manipulate them.

For example, starting with the unary trait, though one can restrict oneself to it, one can still try to investigate the functioning of the master signifier. Well then, it is altogether usable, if you notice that, provided you make it structurally well founded, there is no need to add a thing to it, none of this grand comedy of the struggle to death of pure prestige and its outcome. Contrary to what people have concluded from their questioning of things at the level of what is true by nature, there is no contingency in the slave's position. There is the necessity that something be produced that functions in knowledge as a master signifier.

One cannot prevent oneself from dreaming, to be sure, or from trying to find out who was the first to do it, and then, one discovers the beauty of this ball that goes back and forth between the master and the slave. But perhaps it was simply someone who was ashamed, who put himself forward like that.

Today I have brought you the dimension of shame. It is not a comfortable thing to put forward. It is not one of the easiest things to speak about. This is perhaps what it really is, the hole from which the master signifier arises. If it were, it might perhaps not be useless for measuring how close one has to get to it if one wants to have anything to do with the subversion, or even just the rotation, of the master's discourse.

Be that as it may, one thing is certain, you have this introduction of S_1, the master signifier, within your grasp in the merest of discourses—it is what defines its readability.

There is, in effect, language and speech and knowledge, and all that seems to have worked in Neolithic times, but we have no trace that any dimension called reading existed. There is not yet any need of any writings [écrit], nor of any impression—not that writings haven't been there for a long time, but, in some way, through a retroactive effect. What makes it the 219 case that when we read any text we can always ask ourselves what characterizes it as readable? We have to search for the joint in the direction of what it is that makes the master signifier.

I will point out to you that, as literary works, everything that one has ever read is off in cloud-cuckoo-land. Why does that hang together?

In my latest blunder—I adore these—I happened to read Balzac's L'Envers de la vie contemporaine.[7] It really is off in cloud-cuckoo-land. If you haven't read it, you can still have read everything you might like to read on the history of the end of the eighteenth century and the beginning of the nineteenth—the French Revolution, to call it by its name. You can even have read Marx. You won't understand a thing, and there will always be something that escapes you, which is only there, in this story that will bore you stiff, L'Envers de la vie contemporaine.

Please have a look at it. I am sure not many of you will have read it. It is one of the least read of Balzac's. Read it, and do the following exercise.

Do exactly the same as the one which, about one hundred years ago, I had tried to give to the people I was speaking to at Sainte-Anne concerning the first scene of Act 1 of Athaliah. All they heard were the quilting points. I am not saying that it was an excellent metaphor. In the end, it was this S_1, the master signifier.

Heaven knows what they made of this quilting point, they even took it off to Les Temps modernes—all things considered, this is not La Minute.[8]

It was a master signifier. It was a way of asking them to notice how something that spreads throughout language like wildfire is readable, that is to say, how it hooks on, creates a discourse.

[7] Available as The Wrong Side of Paris (New York: Modern Library, 2004).
[8] Minute-La France, a right-wing, anti-Semitic weekly established in 1962.

I still maintain that there is no metalanguage. Anything that one might think is of the order of a search for the meta in language is simply, always, a question about reading.

Let us suppose—pure supposition—that I am asked for my advice on something I have not been involved in except on the basis of my place in this location—a place that is, it has to be said, quite an unusual one—and I would be astonished if today that would make an open book of my place with respect to the university. But then, if there are others who, from where 220 they are, and for reasons which are not at all negligible but which appear all the more clearly when one refers to my little letters, find themselves in the position of wanting to subvert something in the order of the university, where should they look?

They can look on the other side, where everything can be threaded onto a little stick, where one can place them, the little pile that they are, along with others who are, as is the nature of the progression of knowledge, dominated.

On that side it is intimated to them that one might find a way to live with this. For ages this has been like a myth. I am not here to preach this to you. Myself, I have spoken of the shame of living.

If they search on that side, they may find that with my little schemas they can find a way of justifying that the student is not displaced in feeling a brother, as they say, not of the proletariat but of the lumpen-proletariat.

The proletariat are like the Roman plebs—these were very distinguished people. The class struggle perhaps contains this little source of error at the start, that it absolutely doesn't take place at the level of the true dialectic of the master's discourse—it is located on the level of identification. Senatus Populusque Romanus. They are on the same side. And the entire Empire includes all the rest.

The question is why students feel that they belong with all the rest. They don't at all seem to be able to see clearly how to resolve it.

I would like to point out to them that production is one essential point of the system—the production of shame. This translates as—it's impudence.

This is why it would perhaps not be a very bad means not to go in that direction.

In effect, and to designate something that is very easily recorded in these little letters, what does one produce? One produces something cultural.

And when one thinks like the university, what one produces is a thesis.

This order of production is always related to the master signifier—not simply because that discerns it for you, but quite simply because it forms a 221 part of the presuppositions according to which everything in this order is related to the author's name.

It is very refined. There is a sort of preliminary step, which lies at the threshold of the university. You will have the right to speak there, subject to the altogether strict convention that you will forever have your thesis pinned onto you. This gives your name its weight. Nevertheless, you are in no way subsequently bound by what is in your thesis. Normally, in any case, you content yourself with that. But that doesn't matter, you will always be able to say whatever you want if you have already become a name. This is what plays the role of a master signifier.

May I say it? I would not like to give too much importance to what I have done. This is how the idea came to me of a thing which you haven't heard much about for a while, Scilicet. Some people have nevertheless been struck by the fact that I said it would be a place in which unsigned things should be written.

You mustn't think that mine are more unsigned. See what I have written—a solo voice singing of a painful experience, the one I had with what is called a school, to which I had contributed propositions so that something would be inscribed there, something that has not failed to be inscribed there, moreover—some effect of catalepsy.

The fact that it is signed by me would only be of interest if I were an author. I am in no way an author. Nobody even dreams of this when they read my Écrits. For a very long time this had remained carefully confined to an organ that had no other interest than to be as close as possible to what I am trying to define as calling knowledge into question. What sort of a disaster does analytic knowledge produce? That is what was in question, what has been in question for as long as it has not made them all itching to become authors. It is very curious that the non signed should appear paradoxical, whereas of course over the centuries all the honest men there have been have always at least acted as if someone had torn their manuscript from their hands, as if someone had played a dirty trick on them. No one expected to be sent a note of congratulations on publication.

In short, if it were possible for something to come out of seriously calling into question knowledge that is lavished about and propagated within the established framework of the university, there is no reason why this couldn't be done under a bit of shelter, a type of place, that would adopt the same law for itself, that is to say, not to present something to make 222 someone important, but in order to say something structurally rigorous, whatever might become of it. This could have a greater impact than one might initially expect from it.

A character called Diderot published Rameau's Nephew, let it fall from his pocket.[9] Someone else took it to Schiller, who knew very well it was by Diderot. Diderot never worried about it. In 1804 Schiller passed it on to Goethe, who immediately translated it and, up until 1891—I can tell you this, because here is the tome, which I brought from my own library—we only had a French retranslation of the German translation by Goethe, who, moreover, had completely forgotten about it one year after it appeared, and who perhaps never saw it, for they were in the midst of that Franco-Prussian brawl, and the people didn't take well to this revolutionary intrusion. In short, this translation went unnoticed, Goethe himself was no doubt unaware that it had appeared, and yet this did not stop Hegel from making it one of the main threads of this booklet so full of humor to which I have been referring lately, The Phenomenology of Spirit.

As you can see, there is not much reason for you to worry that what comes out of you carries the label of what concerns you. This is such an obstacle, let me assure you, to the publication of anything decent—if only because of the fact that even within what you might be naturally interested in you believe that you are obliged, in the name of the laws of a thesis, to refer it to the author—he is talented, it's unconvincing, he hasn't got any ideas, what he says is not totally stupid. And if he has contributed something important that may not concern him in any way, you are absolutely obliged to think that this is a mind that thinks. And with that, you've had it for a long time.

As for psychology, it is striking that there is not even a shadow of it in the order of things that are enlightening, like L'Envers de la vie contemporaine I was speaking to you about just before. It is a little montage whose entire value comes through its master signifiers, it is valuable because it is readable. No need of the slightest psychology.

To spell it out for you, to clear my own name, what saves Écrits from the accident that befell it, namely that people immediately read it, is that it is a "worst-seller" nevertheless.

223 I am not going to prolong this discourse any further today in this heat. This is the last I am going to give this year.

There are clearly many things missing, but it would not be pointless to add the following—if, to speak as Hegel would, there are some slightly less than ignoble reasons for your presence here in such numbers, which has so often been an inconvenience for me—this is obviously a question of tact as [9] Denis Diderot, Rameau's Nephew, in Rameau's Nephew; and, D'Alembert's Dream (Harmondsworth: Penguin, 1976).

Goethe would say, I make of it, it would seem, not too much but just enough—if this phenomenon takes place, which is frankly incomprehensible, given what it is that I put forward for the majority of you, it is because I happen to make you ashamed, not too much, but just enough.

AN AGITATOR PREPARES HIS OWN CHOCOLATE

THE IMPASSE OF PSYCHOANALYTIC SELECTION

NOTHING IS EVERYTHING

LOOK AT THEM DOING IT

[This session took place at Vincennes, an experimental university, on 3 December 1969. It was announced as the first of four under the title "Analyticon, four impromptus."]

I will be talking about my Egeria, who is one of those [a dog walks across the podium].

She is the only person I know who knows what she is speaking—I am not saying, "what she is saying."

It's not that she doesn't say anything—she doesn't say it in words. She says something when she is anxious—which happens—she puts her head on my knee. She knows that I am going to die, which a number of people also know. She's called Justine, she's my dog, she is very beautiful, and you would have heard her speak . . .

The only thing she lacks by comparison with that person wandering around is that she hasn't been to university.

Here I am then, an invited guest, at the experimental center of the said university, an experiment which seems rather exemplary to me.

Since it is a question of an experiment, you might wonder what your use is. If you ask me, I will do a diagram for you—I will try to—because after all the university is very strong, it has deep foundations.

I have kept for you the announcement of the title of one of the four discourse positions I have announced elsewhere—where I started my seminar. 228

"The master's discourse," as I said, since you are accustomed to hearing about this. And it is not easy to give an example, as someone who is very intelligent observed last night. I shall try all the same. This is where I have got to, having left the thing unfinished at my seminar. And, to be sure, there is no question of continuing it here. "An impromptu," I said. You can see that that thing with its lowered tail provided me with one a minute ago. I shall continue in the same tone.

Secondly, hysteric's discourse. This one is very important because it is what the psychoanalyst's discourse takes shape with. Except that there would need to be psychoanalysts. I'm making this my business.

INTERVENTION: There aren't any psychoanalysts at Vincennes, at any rate.

As you say, not at Vincennes.

INTERVENTION: Why is it that Vincennes students, at the conclusion of the teaching they are supposed to have received, can't become psychoanalysts?

This is precisely what I am going to explain, Mademoiselle. This is precisely what is in question. Psychoanalysis is not something that can be transmitted like other forms of knowledge.

The psychoanalyst has a position that sometimes manages to be that of a discourse. He doesn't thereby transmit a body of knowledge, not that there is nothing for him to know, contrary to what is foolishly asserted. This is what is called into question—the function in society of a certain form of knowledge, the one that is conveyed to you. It exists.

There is an algebraic sequence that essentially constitutes a chain whose starting point is in this formula—

$$\begin{array}{ccc} S_1 & \rightarrow & S_2 \\ \overline{$} & & a \end{array}$$

A signifier is defined as representing a subject for another signifier. This is an altogether fundamental notation. It can be taken as one at any rate.
229 Through my offices, an attempt has been developed, which is the one I am coming to now, having put the necessary time into putting it into shape. This is an attempt to found what would be decently required to manipulate a notion by encouraging subjects to trust it and to work with it. This is what is called the psychoanalysand.

I initially wondered what could come of it for the psychoanalyst, and where he, the analyst, was in all this. For on this point it is very obvious that the notions are not clear, since Freud, who knew what he was saying, said that it was an impossible function—and yet fulfilled every day. If you reread his text closely you will see that it is not the function that is in question but the being of the psychoanalyst.

How does it happen that one fine day a psychoanalysand commits himself to being a psychoanalyst? This is what I tried to articulate when I spoke of the psychoanalytic act. I stopped my seminar before the end that year, it was '68, like that, in order to show my sympathy for what was astir and which continues—moderately. The agitating makes me think of something that was invented one day, if I recall correctly, by my good, late friend Marcel Duchamp, "A bachelor prepares his own chocolate." Take care that the agitator is not preparing his own chocolate.

In short, this psychoanalytic act was left for dead, as it were. And I have not had the time to return to it, especially as examples of what that leads to are breaking out all around me.

An issue of a journal called Études freudiennes has appeared.[1] I cannot recommend reading it too highly, never having hesitated to suggest to you bad readings which themselves are in the nature of best-sellers. If I recommend it to you, it is because they are very, very good texts. This is not like that grotesque little text on the remarks about my style that came naturally to find its place in the site vacated by the asinine [Paulhânerie].[2] This is different. You will draw the greatest benefit from it.

Apart from an article by its editor, of whom I could never speak too highly, you have statements that are indisputably and universally agitating against psychoanalytic institutions. There is a charming, solid, and very likable Canadian who, good heavens, makes some highly pertinent remarks. There is someone from the Institut psychanalytique de Paris, occupying a very important position there on the education committee, who gives a cri- 230 tique of the psychoanalytic institution as such, as being in strict contradiction with everything that the very existence of the psychoanalyst calls for—it's really marvelous. I cannot say that I would sign it myself, for I already have signed it—the remarks are my own.

In any case, for me, this has a sequel, namely a certain proposition that draws conclusions from this impasse that is so masterly demonstrated. It would have been possible to say, in a tiny little note somewhere, that in a certain place there is an extremist who has tried to work this into a proposition that radically renews the meaning of the entire psychoanalytic selection process. It is clear that this hasn't been done.[3]

I am not really complaining about it, since according to the very people concerned, this agitation is in a state of complete disarray, gratuitous. There is absolutely no question of this modifying anything at all concerning the present functioning of the Institute that the authors belong to.

[1] Études freudiennes nos. 1–2 appeared in November 1969, with articles by André Lussier, Jean-Luc Donnet, and Robert Barande on the organization of psychoanalytic societies.

[2] A pun on the name of the French writer Jean Paulhan.

2

INTERVENTION: I haven't understood a word yet. So, one could start by saying what a psychoanalyst is. For me he is a kind of cop. The people who go into psychoanalysis don't talk and are only concerned about themselves.

INTERVENTION: We already have priests, but since that was no longer working, we now have psychoanalysts.

INTERVENTION: Lacan, we have been waiting for over an hour now for what you have been stating obliquely, a critique of psychoanalysis. That's why we are silent, because this would also be your own self-criticism.

But I am not criticizing psychoanalysis in the slightest. There is no question of criticizing it. He's hard of hearing. I am not at all an agitator.

INTERVENTION: You said that psychoanalysts were not trained at Vincennes, and that this was a good thing. In fact a body of knowledge is dispensed, but you haven't said what it is. It, in any case, is apparently not a body of knowledge. And so what?

231 Be a bit patient. I will explain it to you. I am your guest, let me remind you. This is beautiful, it's big, it's generous, but I am your guest.

INTERVENTION: Lacan, is psychoanalysis revolutionary?

Now, there's a good question!

INTERVENTION: Is it a body of knowledge or isn't it a body of knowledge? You're not the only paranoid around here.

I will speak about a certain aspect of things where I won't be today, namely the Department of Psychoanalysis. There is the difficult question of credit points.[4]

[4] Unités de valeur, units or courses that are credited toward a degree.

INTERVENTION: The question of credit points is settled, and this is not the place to throw it into the ring. There was all this scheming on the part of the academics in the Department of Psychoanalysis, so as to drag them out over the year. We couldn't care less about credit points. It is psychoanalysis that is at stake. Do you understand? We couldn't care less.

Personally, I do not get the sense that no one could care less about credit points. On the contrary people care a lot about credit points. It's customary to. I have put the schema for the fourth discourse on the board, the one I didn't name last time, and which is called the university discourse. Here it is. And here, in the master position, as we say, is S_2, knowledge.

INTERVENTION: Who are you kidding here? The university discourse is in the credit points. That up there is a myth and what you are asking is that we believe in a myth. The people who invoke the rules of the game that you are imposing are stymied by that. So, don't have us think that the university discourse is up on the board. Because that is just not true.

The university discourse is on the board, and knowledge occupies, on the board, the top left-hand corner, already designated in a previous discourse. For what is important in what is written up are the relations, where this works and where it doesn't work. If you begin by putting in its place what 232 essentially constitutes the master's discourse, namely, that he commands, that he intervenes in the system of knowledge, you can ask yourselves what it means when the discourse of knowledge, through this ninety-degree displacement, does not need to be on the board because it is in the real. In this displacement, when knowledge takes the helm, at this moment in which you are located, it is here that the result, the fruit, the fallout of the relations between master and slave has been defined—namely, what in my algebra is designated by a letter, the object a. Last year, when I made the effort to announce something called D'un Autre à l'autre, I said that the object a was the place Marx revealed, uncovered, as surplus value.

You are the product of the university, and you prove that you are the surplus value, even if only in this respect—which you not only consent to, but which you also applaud—and I see no reason to object—which is that you leave here, yourselves equivalent to more or fewer credit points. You come here to gain credit points for yourselves. You leave here stamped, "credit points."

INTERVENTION: Moral—it would be better to leave here stamped "Lacan."

I am not stamping anyone. Why do you presume that I want to stamp you? What rot!

INTERVENTION: No, you won't stamp us, rest assured. What I mean is that the people here are stamped with the fact that, wanting to maintain the discourse that you maintain for them, they are unable to maintain it in a way that is compatible with their presence here. Some people want to speak in the name of an agitation that you describe as vain. There are others who go "Tiddly tiddly bom bom" in their corner, and that is what forms public opinion. No one says this, pretending that it's for you to say it. What I would like is that you have the desire to keep quiet.

Ah, they're wonderful! They think that I would say it much better than they. As for me, I am going back home—that's what they reproach me for.

233 INTERVENTION: Oh, Lacan, don't make fun of people, okay?

You contribute a discourse which makes such demands that. . . .

INTERVENTION: What I propose is that people not be made fun of when they ask a question, that you don't speak in a high voice as you've already done three times now. You give a reply, and that's it. Now, what was the question you asked? And then there is something else, since there are people here who think that psychoanalysis is all about problems of arse, all we have to do is have a love-in. Are there any people here who would like to transform this into a wild love-in?

[He takes off his shirt.]

Listen, my friend, I've seen this before. I was at the Open Theatre last night, there was a bloke who did that, but he had more cheek than you do, he took everything off. Away you go, come on. Shit!

INTERVENTION: You shouldn't poke fun at him all the same. Why does Lacan confine himself to such a limited criticism of the comrade's practice? To say of the comrade that he cannot undress, while you bang on the table, is perhaps very funny, but it's also very simplistic.

But I am simplistic!

INTERVENTION: And that makes them laugh, which is interesting.

But I don't see why they should stop laughing all of a sudden.

INTERVENTION: Well, I would really like it if they didn't laugh at that point.

That's sad.

INTERVENTION: Just as it is sad to see people leaving here as if to catch the six-o'clock Metro.

So, where are we? It seems that people cannot speak about psychoanalysis because they expect me to. Well then, they are right. I will do it much better than they would. 234

INTERVENTION: That's not quite right, since they feel the need to speak among themselves.

That's been proved.

INTERVENTION: There are a number of people, the same ones who are taking notes and who are laughing, who, when Lacan takes the audience in hand, say a number of things to one another, without so much as rising from their seats, for this is the order of a certain topology. Well then, it is these people that I would like to hear.

INTERVENTION: Come on, let Lacan speak!

In the meantime you say nothing.

INTERVENTION: Lacan with us!

I am with you.

Time is getting on. Let me try, nevertheless, to give you some idea of what my project is.

It is a matter of articulating a logic which, no matter how feeble it may seem to be—my four little letters that are almost nothing except that you have to know the rules according to which they function—is still strong enough to comprise what is the sign of this logical force, namely incompleteness.

That makes them laugh. Except that it has a very important consequence, especially for the revolutionaries, which is that nothing is everything [rien n'est tout].

Whatever way you come at things, whatever way you turn them, each of these little four-legged schemas has the property of leaving its own gap.

At the level of the master's discourse, the gap is precisely that of the recuperation of surplus value.

At the level of the university discourse, it's a different gap. And that's the one that torments you. Not that the knowledge that you are given is not structured and solid. On the contrary, you have only one thing to do, which 235 is to weave yourselves into it along with those who work, that is with those who teach you, under the banner of the means of production and, consequently, of surplus value.

As to the hysteric's discourse, it is what made the decisive shift possible by giving its meaning to what was historically elaborated by Marx. That is, that there are historical events that can only be judged in terms of symptoms. No one saw where that was heading, not till the day when one had the hysteric's discourse to bring about the shift to something else, which was the psychoanalyst's discourse.

At first, the psychoanalyst only had to listen to what the hysteric was saying. "I want a man who knows how to make love."

Ah, yes, that's where man stops. He stops at the fact that he actually is someone who knows. As to making love, we'll get back to you on that later. Nothing is everything and you can always make your little jokes, there is one that is not funny, and it's castration.

INTERVENTION: While this little class is purring along peacefully there are 150 comrades at Beaux-Arts who are being arrested by the cops and who have been at Beaujon since yesterday, because they are not giving classes on the object a like this Mandarin here in our presence, and who no one could care less about. They went to hold a spontaneous seminar at the Ministry of Equipment on the slums and on the politics of Monsieur Chalandon. So I think that the smooth running of this magisterial lecture is a fairly good translation of the current state of decay in the university.

INTERVENTION: If people don't want me to speak it's obviously because no one knows how loud I can shout. Lacan, I would like to tell you a few things.

It strikes me that we have reached the point where it is obvious that some form of agitation is more or less a possibility in this auditorium. It is clear that one can utter a few shrill words, make a few good jokes, but it is also clear, and perhaps in 236 an obvious way today, that we will never manage to make a critique of the university if we remain within it, in its classes and within the rules that it established before we intervened in it.

I think that what the comrade has just said concerning the Beaux-Arts students who went outside the university to hold a spontaneous class on the slums and on the politics of Chalandon is a very important example. It makes it possible for us to find an outlet for our will to change society and, among other things, to destroy the university. And I would like Lacan to give us his point of view on this in a moment. For the university will not be destroyed by a majority of students who are on the inside, but it is much more likely with an alliance over revolutionary positions that we students must make with the laborers, with the peasants and with the workers. I am well aware that this has no relationship with what Lacan was saying before, but. . . .

But not at all, one does exist.

INTERVENTION: Perhaps it does exist, but it is not obvious. The relationship between the actions that we must have toward the exterior and Lacan's discourse, if that's what it is, is obviously implicit. And it would be good if Lacan now said what he thinks of the necessity to leave the university and stopped nit-picking over words, challenging academics over this or that quotation from Marx. Because we're fed up to here with the academic Marx. We've been hearing drivel on this in this university for a year now. We know it's shit. Going on about the academic Marx serves the bourgeois university. If the university is to be overthrown, it will be from the outside, with others who are on the outside.

INTERVENTION: So why are you on the inside?

INTERVENTION: I am inside, comrade, because I want people to leave, I have to come in and tell them.

You see! It's all there, my friend. To get them to leave, you enter.

INTERVENTION: Lacan, let me finish. No, it's not all there, because some students still think that by listening to Monsieur Lacan's discourse they will find elements in it that will enable them to challenge his discourse. I claim that this is to let yourselves get caught in a trap.

Quite true. 237

INTERVENTION: If we think that by listening to Lacan's discourse, or Foucault's, or someone else's we will obtain the means to criticize the ideology that they are making us swallow, we're making a big mistake. I claim that we have to look outside to find the means to overthrow the university.

But outside what? Because when you leave here you become aphasic? When you leave here you continue to speak, consequently you continue to be inside.

INTERVENTION: I don't know what aphasic is.

You don't know what aphasic is? That's extremely revolting. You don't know what an aphasic is? There is a minimum one has to know, nevertheless.

INTERVENTION: I am not at the university twenty-four hours a day.

Still, you don't know what an aphasic is?

INTERVENTION: When some people leave the university it is so as to carry out their own personal buggerizing around. Others leave to militate outside. That's what leaving the university means. Now, Lacan, briefly give us your own point of view.

Create a critical university in short? That is what is happening here? Is that it? You don't know what a critical university is either. Nobody has ever spoken to you.

Okay. I would like to make a small remark. The configuration of workers—peasants has nevertheless led to a form of society in which it is precisely the university that occupies the driving seat. For what reigns in what is commonly called the Soviet Union of Socialist Republics is the university.

238 INTERVENTION: Who gives a damn? We're not talking about revisionism but Marxism-Leninism.

That's enough. You ask me to speak, so I will speak. I am not saying things that are up in the stratosphere, I am saying something precise.

INTERVENTION: You are not saying anything.

Haven't I just said how I construe the organization of the USSR?

INTERVENTION: Absolutely not.

I didn't say that knowledge was king? I didn't say that? Did I?

INTERVENTION: So?

So, that has a number of consequences. You, my friend, would not be very comfortable there.

INTERVENTION: You have been asked a question concerning a certain society and you answer by speaking about another society. What you have to say is why you think it is inevitable.

I agree totally. The fact is that there are unsurpassable limits to a certain logic, which I have called a weak logic, but still strong enough to leave you a bit of incompleteness, which you effectively bear out perfectly.

INTERVENTION: I wonder why this amphitheater is packed full with 800 people. It is true that you are a good clown, famous, and that you have come here to speak. A comrade also spoke for ten minutes to say that groups were unable to get themselves out of the university. And everyone, recognizing that there is nothing to be said, is speaking but saying nothing. So, if there is nothing to say, nothing to understand, nothing to know, nothing to do, why are so many people here? And Lacan, why do you stay?

INTERVENTION: We have strayed into a bit of a false problem. All because the comrade said that he was coming to the university in order to leave again with other comrades.

INTERVENTION: People speak about a New Society. Will psychoanalysis have a function in that society and what will it be?

A society is not something that can be defined just like that. What I am trying to spell out, because psychoanalysis gives me the evidence for it, is what dominates it, namely, the practice of language. Aphasia means that there is something that has broken down in this respect. Just think that there are people who happen to have things in their brain and who no longer have any idea how to manage with language. That makes them somewhat crippled.

INTERVENTION: One could say that Lenin almost became aphasic.

If you had a bit of patience, and if you really wanted our impromptus to continue, I would tell you that, always, the revolutionary aspiration has only a single possible outcome—of ending up as the master's discourse. This is what experience has proved.

What you aspire to as revolutionaries is a master. You will get one.

INTERVENTION: We've already got one, we have Pompidou.

Do you believe that you have got a master in Pompidou? What's all that about?

I, too, would like to ask you some questions. For whom, here, does the word "liberal" have a meaning?

INTERVENTION: Pompidou is a liberal, so is Lacan.

240 I am, like everybody is, liberal only to the extent that I am antiprogressive. With the caveat that I am caught up in a movement that deserves to be called progressive, since it is progressive to see the psychoanalytic discourse founded, insofar as the latter completes the circle that could perhaps enable you to locate what it is exactly that you are rebelling against—which doesn't stop that thing from continuing incredibly well.

And the first to collaborate with this, right here at Vincennes, are you, for you fulfill the role of helots of this regime. You don't know what that means either? The regime is putting you on display. It says, "Look at them enjoying!"

Good-bye for today. Bye. It's over.

Monsieur Caquot's presentation

In suggesting that Moses may have been put to death by his own people, S. Freud appeals to the authority of Ernst Sellin. This biblical scholar, born in 1867, was one of the most productive representatives of the German exegetical school. In 1922, the date of publication of his book Mose und seine Bedeutung für die israelitisch-jüdische Religiongeschichte [Moses and his Meaning for Israelite and Jewish History of Religion], he was Ordinary Professor of the Old Testament at the University of Berlin. As with many of his contemporaries, one can detect, in his work as a historian and exegete, a certain ideology and a methodological option that it is worth discussing if we are to understand the explanations he gives of the Bible.

The ideology is that of liberal Protestantism which sees the high point of biblical revelation in a form of moral preaching that is summed up in the Ten Commandments and developed by the prophets of the eighth century BC, the proto-Isaiah, Hosea, Amos, Micah. Less skeptical than some of his friends, E. Sellin held Moses to be the founder of the religion of Israel, the author of the Ten Commandments and the initiator of the moral preaching that the great prophets were merely furthering. The prophets not only adopted Moses' teaching, they also preserved, within their tradition, a record of his life. This is why, according to E. Sellin, Hosea makes, in a passage I will refer you to, allusions to Moses' violent death, which the "historical" literature of the Bible does not mention (Deut. 34:5–6 mentions Moses' death and burial; but it adds that no one knows the location of his tomb, and this somewhat mysterious indication has given birth to the legend of Moses' ascension to heaven). Sellin thinks that the tradition of Moses' violent death was censored by historians from the circle of priests.

The methodological option consists of not trusting the traditional Hebrew text, called "the masoretic." One usually prefers the doyen of translations, the Greek version called the "Septuagint," in which manuscript testimonies are most often earlier than the Hebrew text. But even without the slightest support from the versions of Antiquity (Greek, Syriac, or Latin), recourse is readily made to corrections in the received Hebrew text, with the aim of giving it a sense that is judged to be more satisfactory. It is supposed that over the course of time the received text, or the Hebrew underlying such a version, has undergone "corruptions" in the oral or written transmission. Exegesis thus understood has sometimes been an exercise in arbitrary virtuosity. E. Sellin's work on Hosea offers a number of examples of this.

It was probably while composing the first edition of his commentary on Hosea, also published in 1922 in the series entitled Kommentar zum Alten Testament, that Ernst Sellin thought he had found allusions to the murder of Moses in the prophet's text. The passages he picks out with the help of his hypothesis will be treated briefly as they were understood before or after Sellin and as he interpreted them and what arguments he used.

1. Hos. 5:2a. The hemistich appears in an invective by the prophet against the priests and against the "house of Israel." It consists of three words, not very clear, which would literally translate as "And the massacre, the strayed deepened [it]." The name translated by "strayed" has been understood best, it would seem, by the Jewish tradition which uses "the idolaters" there. But in the first half of the nineteenth century, F. W. Umbreit proposed that this word be replaced by the toponymous "Shittim," which is the same but for the initial hushing, aspirate consonant, which is different, as is the vocalization of the first syllable. This correction led to others: by substituting a simple t for the emphatic ṭ in writing the first word, and by detaching the final h, to form the article belonging to the toponym, one obtained a sentence judged to be more satisfactory as an accusation: "They deepened the pit at Shittim."

243 E. Sellin welcomes this conjecture enthusiastically, for the toponym "Shittim" presents him with a reference point in the historical literature that plays an essential role in his reasoning in favor of the assassination of Moses. This is the famous passage of Numbers 25 where the straying of the Israelites into the sanctuary of Baal of Peor, which occurred while they were staying at Shittim, is recounted. The Israelites were led into temptation by the Moabite women. God became irritated and sent down a plague. The priest Phinehas put an end to it when he transfixed an Israelite caught in adulterous flagrante delicto with a Moabite woman. A bit further on it is said that the man's name was Zimri and the Moabite's was Cozbi.

Sellin would no doubt not have been led to understand the passage in Numbers as he did if his interpretation of Hosea had not conveyed to him his intuition about the assassination of Moses. What he says concerning the episode of Shittim and Baal of Peor indicates an excessive imagination. He reconstitutes an entire scenario in which the Israelite put to death was none other than Moses, who as we know had a Moabite wife (Exod. 2:15–22), and the violent death of the guide of Israel originally has the value of an expiatory sacrifice that brought the plague to an end. Later, the sacerdotal tradition supposedly recomposes the episode entirely to the glory of the clergy (represented by Phinehas whose zeal is remunerated by the "alliance" granted him by God) and effaces the name of Moses. He is, according to Sellin, the primitive hero of the story the authentic record of whom the prophetic tradition has maintained; they have substituted the name of the insignificant Zimri for his and replaced the name of the Midianite Zipporah by that of Cozbi, constructed on the basis of the root, signifying "to lie."

2. Hos. 9:9. Again, a prophetic indictment against "Ephraim." As in 5:2 this name "the house of Israel" alludes to the kingdom of the North, separated from Judah in 922 and the constant object of Hosea's polemic. 9:8 concerns a "prophet" for whom Ephraim sets a trap. Sellin supposes that it was Moses. The hemistich 8b ending by "he [finds] an adversary in the house of his god" enables Sellin to rediscover the toponym Shittim with which the Hebrew name for the adversary (mastemah) has some resemblance. He restitutes, as the primitive text, "At Shittim, in the house of his god." At verse 9 one rediscovers words close to those of 5:2, and just as difficult to understand, for the translation would literally be "They have deep- 244
ened, they have corrupted as in the days of Gibeah." It is likely that the word commonly translated as "deepen" has a modal value and serves to indicate that the corruption "Ephraim" is accused of has been continuous and systematic. The allusion to the "days of Gibeah" concerns a memorable crime committed in this place, according to the Book of Judges 19. Sellin once again corrects the text to bring it into line with 5:2 as he reads it; by changing the vowels of the verb "they have corrupted," he obtains the substantive "his grave" and translates " . . . Shittim, in the house of his god, they have deeply dug his pit."

3. Hos. 12:13-13:1. The end of chapter 12 (verse 14) is the sole passage of Hosea in which "the prophet" undeniably refers to Moses: "It was by the intermediary of a prophet that YHWH brought Israel up from Egypt and it was by a prophet that [Israel] was tended [gardé]." The text of Hosea 14 can be paraphrased as follows, to bring out the value of the pronominal suffixes that are often equivocal in Hebrew: "Ephraim [= Israel] irritated [YHWH] bitterly, but his blood [= the blood that Ephraim has spilled] will come back upon him [Ephraim] and the Lord will bring the opprobrium that he has committed back upon him."[1] Israel is here accused of crimes of blood, and her punishment by God is announced without any equivocation. The difficulty lies in 13:1, which could be literally translated as "While Ephraim was speaking [there was] a tremor; it arose in Israel. But he became guilty because of Baal, and he is dead." In all probability this is a satire on the grandeur and decadence of the tribe which, according to Hosea, most directly represents the schismatic royalty, since it is the Ephraimite Jeroboam who in 922 brought about the separation of Israel (in the restricted sense, designating the kingdom of the North) from the kingdom of Judah.

Sellin's conjecture consists of substituting the name "my law" (whose consonants would be trt) for the name "tremor" (whose consonants are rtt); reading the substantive nasi ("prince") in place of the verb nasa ("to rise"); giving the verb "make oneself guilty" the acceptation "expiate" which he believes possible because the name of the same root designates an expiatory sacrifice; and, finally, displacing the hemistich 12:15b after the verse 13:1. This would give (12:14) "It was by a prophet [Moses] that YHWH 245 brought Israel up from Egypt and it was by a prophet that [Israel] was tended." (12:15a) "But Ephraim irritated [YHWH] bitterly." (13:1) "While Ephraim was speaking my law, he was prince in Israel. He [the prophet] expiated because of Baal [the sin of Baal of Peor] and he is dead." (12:15b) "But his blood [the blood of the prophet] will come back upon him [Ephraim] and the Lord will bring back upon him the opprobrium that he has committed." Sellin finds here the clearest expression of the meaning he wants to give to the alleged murder of the prophet: Moses was put to death by his own people as an expiatory victim following the collective sin of Baal of Peor. He justifies this strange hypothesis by a declaration by Moses in Exod. 32:32 where the hero pleads for a divine pardon for the people for their sin of the Golden Calf, even if it should be he who is to be effaced from the book of God. But it is not possible to ignore the Christian roots of Sellin's ideas, which in this way found in Moses the prototype of the mysterious suffering characters of whom the prophetic literature speaks: the "servant of YHWH" of Deutero-Isaiah (see in particular Isa. 52:13–53:12 and the "transfixing" of Zech. 12:10).

Sellin was aware of the fragility of his hypotheses of 1922. In 1928, in an article in the Zeitschrift für die alttestamentliche Wissenschaft (46:261–3) entitled "Hosea und das Martyrium des Mose," he returns to the study of Hos. 12:14–13:1, proposing some new corrections to the text of 13:1a: "While Ephraim was uttering these rebellious words [reading rbt in place of rtt], he [namely the prophet, that is, Moses] took [it] upon himself and he expiated." It is in the second edition of his commentary on Hosea, published in 1929, that he shows himself to be the most skeptical with respect to his initial intuition. He still believes that Hosea contains the record of an expiatory death of Moses, but he no longer reads 13:1 as he had interpreted it in 1928. In Hos. 5:2 he rejects F. W. Umbreit's correction, even contests the relevance of the alleged reference to Shittim for evoking the affair of Baal of Peor, and translates 5:2 as "Deeply have they dug the tomb of the strayed." In 9:8–9 he no longer corrects mastemah as "Shittim," and while he does retain his translation of 9:9a, "Deeply have they dug his pit," he no longer thinks that the "prophet" that the possessive refers to is Moses. This would be a personification of the prophetic function as Sellin conceives it; the vehicle of the divine word is destined to be a martyr.

As K. Budde points out in 1932 ("Goethe zu Moses Tod," Zeitschrift für 246 die alttestamentliche Wissenschaft 50:300–03), Goethe had imagined the violent death of Moses a century and a half before E. Sellin. In one of his Noten und Abhandlungen zu besseren Verständnis des west-östliches Diwans (in the Hempel IV edition, p. 320 ff.), he supposes that Joshua and Caleb, tired of Moses' indecision over crossing Jordan to get to the promised land, assassinated the elderly guide in order to take control of Israel. This is a more simple conjecture than Sellin's, but no less gratuitous, for the laconic information of Deut. 34:5–6 on Moses' unknown tomb can certainly stir one's imagination, but it justifies no hypothesis about Moses' death. One might wonder whether S. Freud might not owe this idea of Moses' violent death to a distant recollection of his reading of Goethe and whether he might not have wanted to give it a justification judged to be more scholarly by evoking the sole authority of E. Sellin.

BOOK XVIII

On a discourse that might not be a semblance

Seminar 1: Wednesday 13 January 1971

[Lacan writes on the board]

D'un discours qui ne serait pas du semblant
(On a discourse that might not be a semblance)

A discourse, it is not mine that is at stake. I think I made you sense well enough last year what should be understood by this term discourse. I remind you of the discourse of the Master and what we could call its four positions, the displacements of its terms with respect to a structure, reduced to being tetrahedral. I left whoever wanted to work on it to specify what motivates... these ...slidings (glissements) which could have been more diversified, I reduced them to four. If no one has worked on it, I will perhaps this year give an indication in passing about the privileged status of these four.

I only took up these references with respect to what was my end, stated under the title of The reverse side of psychoanalysis. The discourse of the Master is not the reverse side of psychoanalysis, it is where there is demonstrated the torsion that is proper, I would say, to the discourse of psychoanalysis, what ensures that this discourse poses the question of a front and a back (un endroit et un envers) because you know the importance, the emphasis, that is put in the theory, ever since Freud stated it, the importance and the stress that is put on the notion of double inscription. Now what I wanted you to put your finger on, is the possibility of a double inscription, on the front, on the back, without an edge being crossed. It is the structure well known for a long time, that I only had to use, which is called the Moebius strip.

(10) These places and these elements, are where there is outlined that what is properly speaking discourse, can in no way be referred from a subject, even though it determines him. This, no doubt, is the ambiguity of that through which I introduced what I thought I should make understood within psychoanalytic discourse. Remember my terms, at the period that I entitled a certain report as the function and field of speech and language in psychoanalysis. At that time I wrote intersubjectivity, and God knows the number of false tracks that the statement of terms like that can give rise to. I hope I will be excused for having been the first to make these tracks. I was not able to go ahead except through a misunderstanding. Inter, certainly, in effect, is the only thing that subsequently allowed me to talk about an inter-significance (intersignifiance), subjectivity from its consequences, the signifier being what represents a subject for another signifier where the subject is not. This indeed is how it is, because of the fact that where he is represented he is absent, that nevertheless being represented, he thus finds himself divided. As for discourse, it is not simply that it can henceforth only be judged in the light of its unconscious sources, it is also the fact that it can no longer be stated as anything else than what is articulated from a structure where somewhere he finds himself alienated in an irreducible fashion. Hence my introductory statement: On a discourse – I stop – it is not mine. It is from this statement, a discourse not being able, as such, to be a discourse of any particular person, but being founded from a structure, and from the emphasis that is given by the division, the sliding of certain of its terms, it is from this that I am starting this year for what is entitled "On a discourse that will not be a semblance".

For those who were not able last year to follow these statements which were made previously, I indicate that the appearance, which dates already for more than a month, of Scilicet 2/3, will give them the written references. Scilicet 2/3, because it is a writing, it is an event, if not an advent of discourse. First of all by the fact, that it is the one that I find myself to be the instrument of, without avoiding the fact that it requires the pressure of your numbers, in other words that you should be there and very precisely, under this aspect, a singular aspect of which creates this pressure, undoubtedly with, let us say, the incidences of our history which is something that can be touched, which renews the question of what is involved in discourse in so far as it is the discourse of the Master, this something that can only be made of something that one questions oneself about in naming it. Do not go on too quickly to make use of the word revolution. But it is clear that it is necessary to discern what it is in (11) short that allows me to pursue my statements, with this formula On a discourse which will not be a semblance. Two features are to be noted here in this number of Scilicet. I put to the test, after all, more or less, something which is moreover my discourse of last year, in a setting which precisely is characterised by the absence of what I called this pressure of your presence. And to give it its full emphasis, I will say it in these terms, what this presence signifies, I would pinpoint as a pressurised surplus enjoying (plus-de-jouir pressé). Because it is precisely from this figure that there can be judged, if it goes beyond a discomfort, as they say, as regards too much semblance in the discourse in which you are inscribed, the University discourse, the one that is easy to denounce for neutrality, for example, that this discourse cannot claim to be sustained by a competitive selection when all that is at stake are signs that are addressed to those who are in the know, in terms of a formation of the subject, when it is something quite different that is at stake. Nothing allows us to go beyond this kind of discomfort of semblances - so that something can be hoped for which allows us to get out of it - than to posit that a certain style, that a certain style that is required in the advancement of a discourse, does not split, in a dominant position in this discourse, what is involved in this triage, these globules of surplus enjoying, in the name of which you find yourselves caught up in the University discourse. It is precisely that someone, starting from the analytic discourse, places himself with respect to you in the position of an analysand. This is not new, I already said it but no one paid any attention to it. This is what constitutes the originality of this teaching. This is what justifies what you contribute to it by your pressure and that is why in speaking on the radio, I put to the test this subtraction precisely of this presence, of this space into which you press yourselves, cancelled out and replaced by the pure It exists (Il existe) of this inter-significance that I spoke about earlier in order that the subject can vacillate in it. It is simply a switching of points towards something whose possible import we will learn in the future.

There is another feature of what I called this event, this advent of discourse, it is this printed thing that is called Scilicet, it is, as a certain number already know, that people write in it without signing. What does that mean? That each of these names that are put in a column on the last page of these three issues that constitute one year, can be permuted with each of the others, affirming in this way that no discourse can be that of an author. This is a wager. Here, it speaks (ça parle). In the other case, it is... here the future will tell if it is the formula that, let us say, in five or six years all the other journals will adopt. I mean the good journals. It is a gamble, we shall see!

(12) I am not trying in what I am saying to escape from what is experienced, sensed in my statements, as accentuating, as sticking to the artefact of discourse. This means of course, it is the least that can be said, that doing this rules out my claiming to cover all of it, it cannot be a system and in this regard it is not a philosophy. It is clear that for whoever takes from the angle that analysis allows us to renew what is involved in discourse, this implies that one moves around, I would say, in a désunivers, it is not the same thing as divers (diverse). But I would not even reject this diverse and not simply because of what it implies in terms of diversity, but of what it also implies in terms of diversion. It is very clear also that I am not talking about everything. It is even in what I state, it resists anyone saying everything about it. You can put your finger on that every day. Even on the fact that I state that I am not saying everything, that is something different, as I already said, that comes from the fact that the truth is only a half-saying.

This discourse then, which limits itself to acting only in the artefact, is in short only the prolongation of the position of the analyst, in so far as it is defined by putting the weight of its surplus enjoying at a certain place. It is nevertheless the position that here I cannot sustain, very precisely by not being in this position of the analyst. As I said earlier, except for the fact that you lack knowledge about it, it is rather you who will be in it, by the pressure of your numbers. This having been said, what can be the import of what, in this reference, I am stating?

On a discourse which might not be a semblance, that can be stated from my place and in function of what I previously stated. It is a fact in any case that I am stating it. Note that it is a fact also because I state it. You may be completely hoodwinked by it, namely, think that there is nothing more than the fact that I am stating it. Only, if I spoke in connection with discourse about the artefact, it is because for discourse, there is no fact, as I might say, already there, there is only a fact from the fact of saying it, the stated fact is entirely a fact of discourse. This is what I am designating by the term artefact, and of course, this is what has to be reduced. Because if I speak about artefact, it is not to give rise in it to the idea of something that might be different, a nature, that you would be wrong to get engaged in with a view to tackling its obstacles, because you would never get out of it. The question is not set up in the terms: is it or is it not discourse,

but in the following: it is said or it is not said. I start from what is said, in a discourse whose artefact is supposed to be sufficient for you to be there; a cut here, because I am not adding, that you should be (13) here in the state of pressurised surplus enjoying. I said a cut because it is questionable whether it is already as pressurised surplus enjoying that my discourse gathers you together. It is not decided, whatever one or other may think, that it is this discourse, the one made up of the series of statements that I present you, that places you where? In this position from which it can be questioned by the "not talking" of the discourse which might not be a semblance.

D'un semblant, what does that mean in this statement? A semblance of discourse, for example. You know that this is the position described as logical positivism. The fact is that if starting from a signifier, to be put to the test of something that decides by yes or no, what cannot present itself for this test, this is what is defined as meaning nothing. And with that, people think they have finished with a certain number of questions described as metaphysical. This is certainly not what I hold to. I want to point out to you that the position of logical positivism is untenable, in any case starting from analytic experience in particular.

If analytic experience finds itself implicated by taking its claims to nobility from the Oedipal myth, it is indeed because it preserves the cutting edge of the oracle's enunciation, and I would say more, that in it interpretation always remains at the same level. It is only true by its consequences, like every oracle. Interpretation is not put to the test of a truth that can be settled by a yes or a no, it unleashes truth as such. It is true only in so far as it is truly followed. We will see later that the schemas of implication, I mean of logical implication, in their most classical form, these schemas themselves require the foundation of this truthfulness in so far as it belongs to the word, even if it is properly speaking senseless. The passage from the moment where the truth is settled by its simple unleashing, to that of a logic that is going to try to embody this truth, is precisely the moment when discourse, qua representative of representation, is dismissed, disqualified. But if it can be so, it is because some part of it is always there, and this is what is called repression. It is no longer a representation that it represents, it is this continuation of discourse that is characterised as effect of truth.

The effect of truth is not a semblance. The Oedipus complex is there to teach us, if you will allow me, to teach us that it is red blood. Only there you are, red blood does not reject the semblance, it colours it, it makes it re-semble (re-semblant), it propagates it. A little bit of sawdust and the circus starts up again. This indeed it is why it is at (14) the level of the artefact of the structure of discourse, that the question can be raised about a discourse that might not be a semblance. In the meantime, there is no semblance of discourse, there is no meta-language to judge it, there is no Other of the Other, there is no true of the true.

I amused myself one day by making the truth speak. I ask where is the paradox, what could be more true than stating 'I am lying'? The classical quibbling that is stated under the term of paradox is only embodied if you put this I am lying on paper, as something written. Everyone knows that there is nothing truer that one can say on some occasions than to say: 'I am lying'. It is even very certainly the only truth that in this case is not broken (brisée). Everyone knows that in saying: 'I am not lying', one is absolutely not protected from saying something false. What does that mean? The truth that is at stake, when it speaks, the one that I said speaks I, which states itself as an oracle, who speaks?

This semblance is the signifier in itself. Who can fail to see that what characterises this signifier that, as far as linguists are concerned, I use in a way that embarrasses them, there were some who wrote these lines designed to clearly warn that undoubtedly Ferdinand de

Saussure did not have the slightest idea about it. What do we know about it? Ferdinand de Saussure was like me, he did not say everything; the proof is that people found in his papers, things that were never said in his classes. People think that the signifier is a nice little thing that has been tamed by structuralism, people think that it is the Other, qua Other, and the battery of signifiers, and everything that I explain, of course. Naturally it comes down from heaven, because from time to time I am an idealist!

Artefact, I said initially; naturally, the artefact, it is absolutely certain that it is our everyday fate that we find it at every street corner, within reach of the slightest gestures of our hands. If there is something that is a sustainable, or at least sustained discourse, specifically that of science, it is perhaps no harm to remember that it started very specially from the consideration of semblances. The start of scientific thinking, I am talking about history, what is it? The observation of the stars, what is it if not the constellation, namely, the very type of a semblance. What do the first steps of modern physics turn around at the start? Not, as is believed, elements, because the elements, the four and even if you wish to add a fifth essence, are already discourse, philosophical discourse, and how! They are (15) atmospheric phenomena (météores). Descartes wrote a Traité des Météores. The decisive step, one of the decisive steps turned around the theory of the rainbow, and when I talk about a meteor, it is something that is defined by being qualified as such as a semblance. No one has ever believed that the rainbow, even among the most primitive people, that the rainbow was something there, set up in a curve. It is questioned as an atmospheric phenomenon. The most characteristic atmospheric phenomenon, the most original one, the one that without any doubt is linked to, has the very structure of discourse, is thunder. If I ended my Rome discourse on the evocation of thunder, it is absolutely not like that, by fantasy, no Name of the Father is tenable without thunder, and everyone knows very well that we do not even know what thunder is the sign of. It is the very figure of the semblance. This is why there is no semblance of discourse, everything that is discourse, can only present itself as semblance, and nothing is built on it that is not at the basis of this something that is called signifier, which, in the light in which I put it forward for you today, is identical to this status as such of the semblance.

On a discourse that will not be a semblance; for it to be stated, it is necessary then that this a semblance can in no way be completed by reference to discourse. It is something else that is at stake, the referent no doubt! Restrain yourselves a little bit. This referent is probably not immediately an object, because precisely what that means, is that this referent, is precisely what is walking around. The semblance in which the discourse is identical to itself, is at the level of the term semblance, it is the semblance in nature. It is not for nothing that I reminded you that no discourse that evokes nature ever did anything other than start from what in nature is a semblance. Because nature is full of them. I am not talking about animal nature, which quite obviously superabounds with them. This is even what ensures that there are gentle dreamers who think that the entire animal nature, from fish to birds, sings divine praises, it is self-evident. Every time they open like that, something, a mouth, an operculum, it is a manifest semblance, nothing requires there to be gaps. When we go into something whose efficacy has not been settled, for the simple reason that we do not know how it has come about that there were, as I might say, an accumulation of signifiers, because signifiers, huh, I can tell you, are scattered throughout the world, in nature, they are there by the shovelful. For language to come to birth, it is already something to initiate that, for language to be born, it was necessary that there should be established somewhere (16) this something that I already indicated to you in connection with the wager, it was Pascal's wager, we do not remember it. In presupposing this, the trouble is that this already presupposes the functioning of language because what is at stake is the unconscious. The unconscious and its operation, means that among the numerous

signifiers that travel the world there is going to be in addition the fragmented body. There are, all the same, things from which one can start by thinking that they already exist. They already exist in a certain functioning in which we would not be forced to consider the accumulation of the signifier. It is this business about territory. If the signifier 'your right arm' enters the territory of your neighbour to pick up something – these are things that happen all the time – naturally your neighbour grasps your signifier 'right arm' and throws it back over the dividing wall. This is what you very curiously call projection, do you not, it is the way of understanding one another! It is from a phenomenon like that that we have to start. If your right arm, in your neighbour's property, was not entirely occupied in picking apples, for example, if it had stayed quiet, it is fairly probable that your neighbour would have adored it, it is the origin of the master signifier, a right arm, the sceptre. The master signifier only needs to begin like that, right at the beginning.

Unfortunately it requires a little bit more, it is an unsatisfactory schema. Going a little further, that gives you the sceptre, right away you see the thing materialising as signifier. The process of history shows itself according to every testimony, in the ones that we have, a little more complicated. It is certain that the little parable, the one with which I first began, the arm that is thrown back from one territory into another, it is not necessarily your arm that comes back to you, because signifiers are not individual, one does not know who owns which. So there you see, here we enter into a different kind of original operation as regards the function of chance and that of myths. You construct a world, on this occasion let us say a schema, a support divided like that into a certain number of territorial cells. This happens at a certain level, the one at which it is a matter of putting forward, where it is a matter of understanding a little what has happened.

After all, not alone can one get an arm that is not one's own, in the process of expulsion that you have called, I do not know why, projection, if it is only that, you are projected, of course, not simply an arm which is not yours, but several other arms, so then from that moment on, it is no longer important whether it is yours or whether it (17) is not yours. But anyway, since after all, inside a territory, one only knows one's own frontiers, one does not have to know that on this frontier there are six other territories. You throw it a little bit as you wish, so then it can happen that there is a whole shower of territories. The idea of the relationship that may exist between the rejection of something and the birth of what I earlier called the master signifier, is certainly an idea to remember. But for it to have its whole value, it is certainly necessary that there should have been, by a process of chance, at certain points, an accumulation of signifiers. Starting from there it is possible to conceive something that might be the birth of a language. What we see properly speaking being built up as a first way of supporting in writing what serves as language, gives in any case a certain idea. Everyone knows that the letter A is a bull's head turned upside down, and that a certain number of elements like this, movable, still leave their trace. What is important, is not to go too fast and to see where holes continue to remain. For example, it is quite obvious that the start of this outline was already linked to something marking the body with a possibility of ectopia and of excursion (d'ectopie et de balade) that obviously remains problematic. After all here again, everything is still there. We have finally, this is a very sensitive point, that we can still test every day. Not too long ago, again this week, something, very pretty photos in the newspaper, that everyone was delighted with, the possibilities of the practice of cutting up a human being on another human being are quite impressive. It is from there that everything started.

There remains another hole. As you know, people have tormented themselves about it, people have noted that Hegel is all very well, but there is all the same something that he did not explain. He explains

the dialectic of the master and the slave, he does not explain how there can be a society of masters. It is quite clear that what I have just explained to you is certainly interesting in that, by the simple operation of projection, of retort (rétorsion), it is clear that at the end of a certain number of throws, there will certainly be, I would say, a greater average of signifiers in certain territories than in others. Anyway, it still remains to be seen how the signifier is going to be able to construct a society of signifiers in this territory. One should never leave in the shadows what one does not explain, under the pretext that one has succeeded in giving some little beginning of explanation.

(18) In any case, the statement of our title this year, On a discourse that is not a semblance, concerns something that deals with an economy. Here we will hide (nous tairons) the a semblance from itself, it is not a semblance of something else, it is to be taken in the sense of the objective genitive, what is at stake is the semblance as proper object by which there is ruled the economy of discourse. Are we going to say that it is also a subjective genitive? Does du semblant concern also what gives the discourse? The word subjective is the only one to be rejected here for the simple reason that the subject only appears once there has been established somewhere this liaison of signifiers. A subject can only be the product of signifying articulation. A subject as such never masters in any case this articulation but is properly speaking determined by it.

A discourse, by its nature, appears (fait semblant) as one might say to be a success, or to be light, or to be chic. If what is stated in words is precisely true by always being very authentically what it is, at the level we are at, of the objective and of articulation, it is then very precisely as object of what is only produced in this aforesaid discourse that the semblance is posited. Hence the properly senseless character of what is articulated and it must be said that it is here indeed that there is revealed what is involved in the richness of language, namely, that it contains a logic that surpasses by far everything that we succeed in crystallising of it, in detaching from it.

I employed the hypothetical form of a discourse which might not be (ne serait pas) a semblance. Everyone knows the developments that logic took on after Aristotle, by putting the emphasis on the hypothetical function. Everything that is articulated by giving the value True of False to the articulation of the hypothesis, and combining what results from the implication of a term within this hypothesis, as being signalled as true. This is the inauguration of what is called the modus ponens, and of still many other modes and everyone knows what was made of them. It is striking, at least as far as I know, that no one has ever formalised the resource involved in the use of this hypothetical in the negative.

A striking thing, if one refers for example to what is collected about it in my Ecrits, when someone at the epoch, a heroic epoch at which I began to clear up the terrain of analysis, when someone came to contribute to the deciphering of the Verneinung. Even though in commenting Freud letter by letter, he noticed very clearly – because Freud says it quite literally – that the Bejahung only involves a judgement of attribution, which means that Freud ... shows a finesse (19) and a competence that are quite exceptional at the time he wrote this – because only some logician who is not widely known was able at that time to underline it – the judgement of attribution, in no way prejudges existence. The simple positing of a Verneinung, implies the existence of something which is very precisely what is denied. A discourse which might not be a semblance posits that the discourse, as I have just stated, is a semblance.

The great advantage in putting it like that is that one does not say a semblance of what. Now, it is here of course, it is around this that I propose to advance our statements, namely, to get to know what is involved where it might not be a semblance. Naturally, the terrain is prepared by a singular even though timid step, which is the one that Freud took in Beyond the pleasure principle.

Here I do not want, because I cannot do any more than indicate the knot formed in this statement, by repetition and enjoyment. It is in function of this that repetition goes against the pleasure principle which, I would say, does not recover from it. Hedonism, in the light of analytic experience, can only go back to what it is, namely, a philosophical myth. I mean, a myth of a perfectly defined (and clear) class. And I stated last year the help that they have given to a certain process of the master, by permitting the discourse of the master as such to build up a knowledge. This knowledge is the knowledge of the master. This knowledge has supposed, since the philosophical discourse still carries its trace, the existence over against the master of another knowledge and, thank God, philosophical discourse did not disappear without first pinpointing that there ought to be at the origin a relationship between this knowledge and enjoyment. The one who thus closed philosophical discourse, Hegel to give him his name, naturally only sees the way in which, through work, slavery comes to accomplish what? Nothing other than the knowledge of the master.

And what is introduced, what is introduced anew by what I will call the Freudian hypothesis? It is, in an extraordinarily prudent, but all the same a syllogistic form, the following: if we call pleasure principle the fact that always, by the behaviour of the living being, he comes back to a level which is that of minimal excitation, and that this rules his economy; if it proves to be the case that repetition is exercised in such a way that a dangerous enjoyment, an enjoyment that goes beyond this minimal excitation, is brought back – is it possible, it is in this way that Freud states the question – that it could be imagined that life, caught up itself in its cycle – it is a novelty with (20) respect to this world which does not universally comprise it –

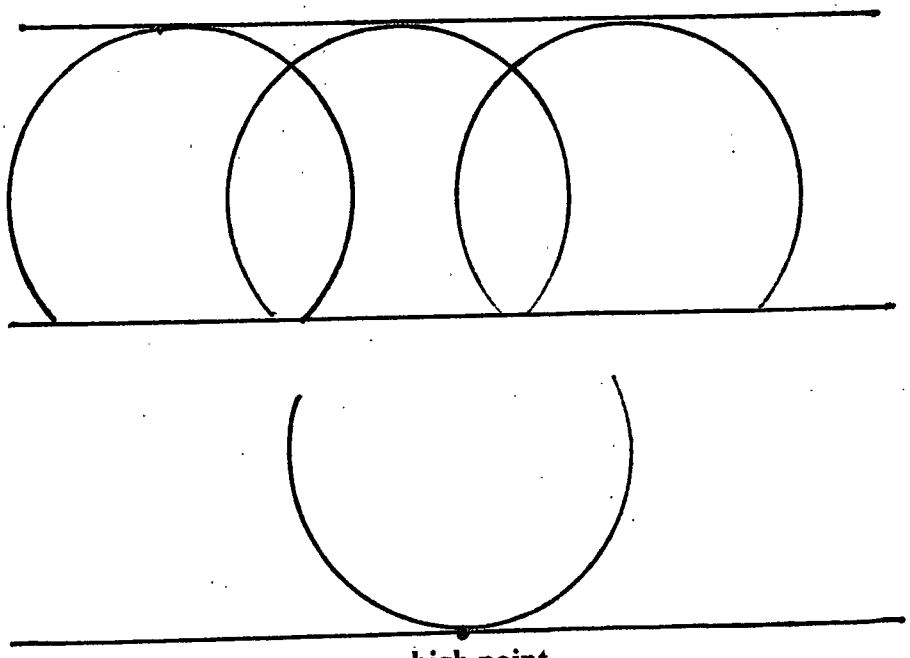
that life includes this possibility of repetition which would be the return to this world in so far as it is a semblance?



high point

I can point out to you by a drawing on the board that this involves, instead of the series of ascending and descending curves of excitation, all close to a limit, which is an upper limit, the possibility of an intensity of excitation that can moreover go to infinity, what is conceived as enjoyment not involving in itself, in principle, any other limit than this lower tangential point, this point that we will call high (supreme), in giving its proper sense to this word which means the lowest point of a higher limit, in the same way as the lowest (infime) is the highest point of a lower limit. The coherence given of the mortal point, then conceived without Freud underlining it, as a characteristic of life but in truth, what people do not think of is, in effect, the fact that we confuse what is non-life, and which is far, my word, from not stirring up the eternal silence of the infinite spaces that dazed Decartes. They talk, they sing, they move about in every (21) way, now when we look at them. What is called the inanimate world is not dead. Death is a point, is designated as a terminal point, a point at the term of what? Of the enjoyment of life.

This is precisely what is introduced by the Freudian statement, one that we could qualify as hyper-hedonism, if I can express myself in this way. Who can fail to see that the economy, even that of nature, is always a fact of discourse. It cannot grasp that this indicates that nothing else could be at stake here but enjoyment in so far as it is itself not only a fact, but an effect of discourse.

If something that is called the unconscious can be half-said as a language structure, it is so that finally there can appear to us the relief of this effect of discourse that up to then appeared to us as impossible, namely, surplus enjoying. Does that mean, to follow one of my formulae, that in so far as it was impossible, it functioned as real? I am opening up the question, because in truth, nothing implies that the irruption of the discourse of the unconscious, however stammering it remains, implies anything whatsoever, in what preceded it, that was subjected to its structure. The discourse of the unconscious is an emerging, it is the emerging of a certain function of the signifier. That it existed up to then as a token, is indeed the reason why I put it at the source of the semblance.

But the consequences of its emerging, is what ought to be introduced so that something may change, which cannot change, because it is not possible. It is on the contrary because a discourse is centred from its effect as impossible that it will have some chance of being a discourse that might not be a semblance.

If I was looking through these sheets, it was not to assure myself, but to reassure myself about what I said the last time, the text of which I do not have at the moment. I have just been complaining about it. Remarks of this kind come back to me - I do not have to go to any trouble for that - it happens that some people were asking themselves at certain points of my discourse the last time as they express it, what I was getting at (où je veux en venir). Other remarks came to me from elsewhere, that it is very hard to hear at the back of the room. I will try – I was absolutely unaware of it the last time, I thought that the acoustics were just as good as in the previous amphitheatre – if you don't mind giving me a sign when my voice lowers despite myself, I will try to do my best.

So then, at certain turning points, people may have asked themselves the last time what I was getting at. In truth, this sort of question seems to me to be too premature to be significant, namely, that it is people who are far from being insignificant, people who are very well informed from whom this remark was reported, and sometimes quite calmly by themselves. It would perhaps have a greater implication, given precisely what I put forward the last time, if they were to ask where I am starting from or even where I want you to start from. Already, this has two meanings, this perhaps means, to go somewhere, and again this may also mean, to get a move on from where you are. This 'what I am getting at' is in any case a very good example of what I put forward about the desire of the Other: che vuoi? What does he want? Obviously when you can say it right away, you are much more comfortable. This is an opportunity to note the factor of inertia that is constituted by this che vuoi, at least when (24) you can answer it. This indeed is why in analysis one strives to leave this question in suspense.

Nevertheless, I clearly specified the last time that here I am not in the position of the analyst. So that in short, I believe I am obliged to answer this question, and in saying this I ought to give the reason why I have spoken. I spoke about the semblance and I said something that is not common knowledge; first of all, I insisted, I laid stress on the fact that the semblance that presents itself as what it is, is the primary function of truth. There is a certain I speak that brings this about, and it is not superfluous to recall it in order to give to this truth, which gives rise to so many logical difficulties, its correct positioning. This is all the more important to recall in that, if there is in Freud, to designate like that a certain tone, if there is in Freud something revolutionary - I already warned about the excessive use of this word - but it is certain that, if there was a moment when Freud was revolutionary, it is in the measure that he put in the foreground a function which is also the one, it is the only common element moreover, which is also this element that Marx contributed, namely, to consider a certain number of facts as symptoms. The dimension of the symptom is that it speaks, it speaks even to those who do not know how to hear; it does not say everything, even to those who know it. This promotion of the symptom, is the turning point that we are living through in a certain register which, let us say, was pursued, rumbling quietly throughout the centuries, around the theme of knowledge. It cannot all the same be said that from the point of view of knowledge we are completely lacking, and we clearly sense what is outmoded in the theory of knowledge when it is a matter of explaining the order of a process constituted by the formulations of science. Physical science gives models of it today. The fact that we are, in parallel to this revolution of science, in a position that one can qualify as being on the path of a certain truth, is what shows a certain heterogeneity of status between the two registers. Except for the fact that, in my teaching, and only there, an attempt is made to show their coherence, which is not obvious, or which is not obvious for those who, in this practice of analysis, go on about the semblance. This is what I will try to articulate today.

I said a second thing. The semblance is not only locatable, essential, to designate the primary function of truth, it is impossible without this reference to qualify what is involved in discourse. What defines discourse, this at least is the way I tried last year to give some weight (25) to this term by defining four of them whose titles I was only able to recall last time, to hastily recall, at which point certain people found that they were out of their depth. What is to be done? I am not going to go through, even rapidly, an account of what is involved, even though of course I will have to come back to it and to show what is involved in it. I pointed out that you could refer in the answers described as Radiophonie in the last Scilicet, to what is involved in them, in what there consists this function of discourse as I announced it last year. It is supported by four privileged places among which one precisely remained unnamed, and precisely the one which, gives the title of each of these discourses, by the function of its occupant. It is when the master signifier is at a certain place that I speak about the discourse of the Master; when a certain knowledge also occupies it, I speak of that of the University; when the subject in its division, fundamental for the unconscious, is in place there, I speak about the discourse of the Hysteric, and finally when surplus enjoying occupies it, I speak about the discourse of the Analyst. This place, which in a way is sensitive, that of the top left, for those who were there and who still remember, this place which is here occupied in the discourse of the Master by the signifier as master, S_1, this place still not designated, I am designating by its name, by the name that it deserves, it is very precisely the place of the semblance. This shows,

after what I stated the last time, the degree to which the signifier, as I might say, is here at its place. Hence the success of the discourse of the Master, the success all the same that makes it worth while to pay attention to it for an instant, because after all, who can believe that any master ever ruled by force? Especially at the start, because after all, as Hegel reminds us in this admirable sleight of hand, one man is worth another. And if the discourse of the Master gives the basis, the structure, the strong point around which several civilisations are organised, it is indeed because its mainspring is all the same of a different order to violence.

This does not mean that we are in any way sure that, in these facts, which it must be said we can only articulate with the most extreme caution, that once we pinpoint them by some term or other, as primitive, pre-logical, archaic, and anything whatsoever of whatever order it may be, archaic, archè, are the beginning, why? And why would this not also be a waste product, these primitive societies? But nothing settles it. What is certain, is that they show us that it is not necessary for things to be established in function of the discourse of the Master; first of all the mytho-ritual configuration, which is the best way of pinpointing them, does not necessarily imply the (26) articulation of the discourse of the Master. Nevertheless, it must be said, it is a certain form of alibi to interest ourselves so much in what is not the discourse of the Master, in most cases it is a way of confusing things completely; while you busy yourself with that, you are not looking after something else. And nevertheless the discourse of the Master is an essential articulation, and the way I expressed it ought to be something that some people, I am not saying everyone, some people, should try to get their heads around. Because what is at stake, and this I also clearly stressed the last time, what is at stake, anything new that can happen and is called, I have always said it, insisting on the tempering that should be applied to it, because what is called revolutionary can only consist in a change, in a displacement of discourse, namely, of each of these places. I would like in a way, to give an image – but you know the sort of cretinising that an image can lead to – to represent by what one might call four bowls, each of which would have its name, the way that into these bowls there slide a certain number of terms, specifically what I have distinguished by S_1, S_2 in so far as, at the point that we are at, S_2 constitutes a certain body of knowledge, the o, in so far as it is directly a consequence of the discourse of the master, the $ which in the discourse of the master, occupies this place which is a place that we are going to talk about today, that for its part I have already named, which is that of the truth.

Truth is not the contrary of semblance, the truth as I might say is this dimension, or this demansion, if you will allow me to make up a new word, to designate these bowls, this demansion which is strictly correlative to that of the semblance. This demansion, I told you that the latter, that of the semblance, supports it. So then, something is indicated all the same about what this semblance is getting at. It is clear that there is a question that is a little inexact, I mean the one that came back to me along quite indirect paths. Two young sages, whom I greet if they are here again to day, I hope they will not be offended that they were overheard in passing, gravely nodding their heads, it appears, asking one another: 'Is he a dangerous idealist?' Am I a dangerous idealist? That seems to me to be completely beside the point! Because I began – and with what emphasis, I would say that I said the opposite of what exactly I wanted to say – by putting the emphasis on the fact that discourse is an artefact. What I am initiating with that, is exactly the contrary, because the semblance is the contrary of an artefact. As I pointed out, semblances flourish in (27) nature. The question, once knowledge is no longer at stake, once we no longer believes that it is along the path of perception, from which we are supposed to extract some quintessence or other, that we know something, but by means of an apparatus which is discourse, there is no longer any question of the idea.

The first time, moreover, that the idea made its appearance, it was a little better positioned than after the exploits of Bishop Berkeley. It was Plato who was involved, and he asked himself where was the real of what was called a horse. His idea of the idea, was the importance of this naming. In this multiple and transitory thing which was moreover perfectly obscure in his epoch more than in ours, is not the whole reality of a horse in this idea in so far as that means the signifier, a horse. You must not believe that because Aristotle put the emphasis of reality on the individual, that he got any further. The individual means exactly what one cannot say. And precisely at a certain point, if Aristotle had not been the marvellous logician that he was, who took the unique step, the decisive step, thanks to which we have a reference point about what an articulated sequence of signifiers is, one could say that in his way of highlighting what ousia is, in other words the real, he behaves like a mystic. What is proper to ousia, he says it himself, is that it cannot in any way be attributed, it is not sayable. What is not sayable, is precisely what is mystical. Only it appears, he is not of that opinion, but he leaves the place to the mystic. It is obvious that the solution to the question of the idea could not come to Plato. It is from the angle of the function and of the variable that all of that finds its solution.

If it is clear that if there is something that I am, it is not a nominalist, I mean that I do not start from the fact that the name is something that is stuck like that onto the real. And you have to choose; if one is a nominalist, one must completely renounce dialectical materialism, so that in short the nominalist tradition, which is properly speaking the only danger of idealism that can be put forward here in a discourse like mine, is very obviously rejected.. It is not a matter of being realist in the sense that people were in the Middle Ages, the realism of universals. But it is a matter of designating, of highlighting the fact that our discourse, our scientific discourse, only discovers the real because of the fact that it depends on the function of the semblance.

The effects of what I call the algebraic articulation of the semblance and as such it is only letters that are at stake, is the only system by (28) means of which we designate what is real; what is real, is what makes a hole in this semblance. In this articulated semblance which is scientific discourse, scientific discourse progresses without even asking itself any more whether or not it is semblance. It is simply a question of whether its network, its net, its lattice, as they say, makes the holes appear in the right place. The only reference is the impossible at which these deductions culminate; this impossible, is the real. The apparatus of discourse in so far as it is what, in its rigor, encounters the limits of its consistency – it is with this that we aim, in physics, at something that is real.

What is important for us in what concerns us, namely, the field of truth – and why it is the field of truth, only qualified as such, that concerns us, I am going to try to articulate today – in what concerns us, we are dealing with something that takes into account that it differs from this position of the real in physics, this something that resists, that is not permeable to every meaning, which is a consequence of our discourse, and which is called phantasy. And what has to be tested are its limits, its structure, the function, the relationship in a discourse of one of the terms, of the o, the surplus enjoying, the $ of the subject, or precisely the point which is broken (rompu) in the discourse of the master. This is what we have to test in its functioning, when in the completely opposite position, that in which the o occupies this place, it is the subject that is opposite, this place where it is questioned, it is here that the phantasy must take on its status, its status which is defined by the very part of impossibility that there is in analytic questioning.

To illuminate what is involved in where I want to get to, I will go to what I want to mark today, about what is involved in analytic theory. Because of this, I am not coming back, I am skipping over a function

that is expressed in a certain way of speaking that I use here when I address you. Nevertheless, I cannot but draw your attention to the fact that, if the last time, I challenged you with a term which might have appeared impertinent, and rightly so, to many, of plus de jouir pressé (a pressurised surplus enjoying) ought I then talk about some kind of pressurised....? Nevertheless this has a meaning, a meaning which is one from which I preserve my discourse, that in any case has not the character of what Freud designated as the discourse of the leader. It is indeed at the level of discourse, at the beginning of the 20's, that Freud articulated in Massenpsychologie und Ichanalyse something which curiously was found to be at the source of the Nazi phenomenon. Consult the schema that he gives in this article, at the (29) end of the chapter on Identification; you will see indicated there almost open to view the relations between capital I and small o. Truly, the schema seems to be designed for the Lacanian signs to be imposed on it.

That which, in a discourse, is addressed to the Other as a Thou, gives rise to an identification to something that one can call the human idol. If I spoke the last time about red blood as being the blood that is most useless to propel against the semblance, it is indeed because, as you have seen, one cannot advance and overthrow the idol without immediately afterwards taking its place, and we know that this is what has happened to a certain type of martyr! It is indeed in the measure that something in every discourse that appeals to the Thou provokes a camouflaged, secret identification, which is only one to this enigmatic object that may seem to be nothing, the tiny little surplus enjoying of Hitler, that went no further perhaps than his moustache, this was enough to crystallise people who....who had nothing mystical about them! Who were the most committed to the process of the discourse of the capitalist, with what that involves in terms of a questioning of surplus enjoying in its form of surplus value. It was a matter of seeing whether, at a certain level, one would still have one's little bit (son petit bout) and indeed this was enough to provoke this effect of identification. It is amusing simply that this should have taken the form of an idealisation of the race, namely, of the thing which on that occasion was least involved. But one can find where this character of fiction comes from, one can find it. What must be simply said, is that there is no need for this ideology for a racism to be constituted, and that all that is needed is a surplus enjoying that recognises itself as such. And that whoever is a little bit interested in what may happen would do well to tell himself that every form of racism, in so far as a surplus enjoying is very well capable of supporting it, is now what is on the agenda. This is what is in store for us in the years to come.

You will understand why better, when I tell you what the theory, the authentic exercise of analytic theory, allows us to formulate as regards what is involved in surplus enjoying. People imagine, people imagine they are saying something when they say that what Freud has contributed, is the underlay of sexuality in everything involved in discourse. People say that when they have been touched a little by what I state about the importance of discourse to define the unconscious. And then when they do not pay attention to the fact that I have not yet for my part, tackled what is involved in this term sexuality, sexual relationship. It is certainly strange – it is only strange from one point of view, the point of view of the charlatanism (30) that presides over every therapeutic action in our society – it is strange that people have not noticed the world there is between this term sexuality, wherever it is beginning, where it is only beginning, to take on a biological substance - and I would point out to you that, if there is somewhere that one can begin to notice the sense that this has, it is rather on the side of bacteria - of the world that there is between that and what is involved concerning what Freud states about the relations that the unconscious reveals. Whatever stumblings he himself may have succumbed to in this order, what Freud reveals about the functioning of the unconscious has nothing biological about it. This only has the right to be called sexuality

because of what is called the sexual relationship. It is completely legitimate, moreover, until the moment when one makes use of sexuality to designate something else, namely, what is studied in biology, namely, the chromosome and its combination XY or XX, or XX, XY. This has absolutely nothing to do with what is at stake, and has a name that can be perfectly well stated, called the relationships of man and woman. It is necessary to start from these two terms with their full sense, with what that involves in terms of relation. Because it is very strange when one sees the little timid attempts that people make at thinking within the framework of a certain system which is that of the psychoanalytic institution. They notice that not everything is regulated by the frolics that are presented as conflictual, and they would really like something different, the non-conflictual, that is more restful. And so then they notice for example, that there is no need to wait for the phallic phase to distinguish a little girl from a little boy, they are not at all the same. They marvel at this! And then – I am pointing it out to you because between now and when we meet again, it will be only in the month of February, the second Wednesday of February, you will perhaps have the time to read something, because once I recommend a book, that improves its circulation, which is called Sex und Gender, and Gender, it is in English, pardon me! It is by someone called Stoller, very interesting to read, because this gives on an important subject, that of transsexuals, a certain number of very well observed cases with their familial correlates. You know perhaps that transsexualism consists very precisely in a very forceful desire to cross over by every means to the other sex, even by having oneself operated on, when you are male. There you are! With the co-ordinates, the observations that are there you will certainly learn a lot about this transsexualism because these are observations that are quite usable. You will also learn the (31) complete....the completely invalid character of the dialectical apparatus with which the author of this book treats these questions, and which means that there arise quite directly the great difficulties he encounters in explaining his cases. One of the most surprising

things, is that the psychotic aspect of these cases is completely eluded by him, because he has no reference points, Lacanian foreclosure never having reached his ears, which immediately and very easily explains the form of these cases. But what matter! The important thing is this, that to speak about gender identity, which is nothing other than what I have just expressed as this term, man and woman, it is clear that the question is posed of what emerges precociously from the fact that at adult age, it is the destiny of speaking beings to divide themselves up between men and women and that to understand the emphasis that is put on these things, on this agency, one has to take into account that what defines the man, is his relationship with the woman, and inversely. That nothing allows us in these definitions of man and woman, to abstract them from the complete speaking experience, up to and including in the institutions where they are expressed, namely marriage.

If one does not understand that in adult age, what is at stake is to be-a-man (de faire-homme), that this is what constitutes the relation to the other party, that it is in the light, at the start, starting from something that constitutes a fundamental relation, that there is questioned everything that in the behaviour of the child can be interpreted as being oriented towards this being-a-man, for example and that one of the essential correlates of this being-a-man, is to indicate to the girl that one is so, that we find ourselves, in a word, put right away into the dimension of the semblance. But besides, everything bears witness to it, including references that are common, that one finds everywhere, to sexual display principally in the higher mammals, but also among ... in a very great number of insights that we can have very, very far into the animal phylum, which shows the essential character, in the sexual relationship, of something that should be clearly limited to the level at which we touch it, that has nothing to do either with a cellular level, whether it is chromosomic or not, nor with an organic level, whether it is a matter or not of the ambiguity of one or other tract involving the gonad, namely, an

ethological level which is properly one of a semblance. It is in so far as the male, most often the male, the female is not absent from it because she is precisely the subject affected by this display, it is in so far as there is a display that something which is called sexual (32) copulation, no doubt, in its function, but which finds its status in particular elements of identity, it is certain that human sexual behaviour easily finds its reference in this display as it is defined at the animal level. It is certain that human sexual behaviour consists in a certain maintenance of this animal semblance. The only thing which differentiates it from it, is that this semblance is conveyed in a discourse, and that it is at this level of discourse, at this level of discourse alone, that it is carried towards, allow me, some effect that might not be a semblance. That means that instead of having exquisite animal courtesy, it can happen, it can happen that a man rapes a woman, or inversely. At the limits of discourse, in so far as it strives to make the same semblance hold up, there is from time to time something real, this is what is called the passage à l'acte, I see no better place to designate what that means. Note that in most cases, the passage à l'acte is carefully avoided. It only happens by accident; and this is also an occasion to illuminate what is involved in what I have long differentiated from the passage à l'acte, namely, acting out, to bring the semblance onto the stage, to put it on the stage, to make an example of it, this is what in this order is called acting out. Or again, it can be called passion. But, I am forced to go quickly, you will notice that it is in this connection, and here as I have just illuminated things, that one can clearly highlight, clearly designate what I am always saying: it is that discourse is there in so far as it allows the stake of what is involved in surplus enjoying, namely, I am giving it the full treatment, it is very precisely what is forbidden to sexual discourse.

There is no sexual act [or relationship?], I already expressed this on several occasions, I am tackling it here from a different angle. And this is made quite tangible in a massive way by the economy of analytic theory, namely, what Freud encountered, first of all so innocently, as I might say, that this is why it is a symptom, namely, that he advances things to the point that they concern us on the plane of truth. Who can fail to see that the myth of Oedipus is necessary to designate the real, because this indeed is what it pretends to do, and more exactly what the theoretician is reduced to, when he formulates this hyper-myth, the fact is that the real properly speaking is incarnated...by what? By sexual enjoyment, as what? As impossible, since what the Oedipus complex designates, is the mythical being whose enjoyment – his enjoyment – is supposed to be that of what? Of all the women. That such ... a system is here in a way imposed by discourse itself, does this not provide the surest (33) cross-check in terms of what I state as theory, concerning the prevalence of discourse, concerning everything that is precisely involved in enjoyment? What analytic theory articulates is something whose character, graspable as an object, is what I designate by the o-object, in so far as through a certain number of favourable organic contingencies - breast, excrement, look or voice – it comes to fill the place defined as that of surplus enjoying.

What does the theory state if not the following: something that tends, this relationship of surplus enjoying, a relationship in the name of which the function of the mother comes to such a predominant point in all our analytic observation, surplus enjoying is only normalised from a relationship that one establishes to sexual enjoyment, except for the fact that this enjoyment, this sexual enjoyment is only formulated, is only articulated from the phallus in so far as the phallus is its signifier. Someone one day wrote that it is the signifier that designates the lack of signifier. This is absurd, I never articulated such a thing. The phallus is very properly sexual enjoyment in so far as it is co-ordinated, is solidary with a semblance.

This indeed is what happens and this is what it is rather strange to see all the analysts striving to turn their gaze from. Far from having insisted more and more on this turning point, this crisis of the phallic phase, they use every opportunity to elude the crisis, the truth, to which not one of these young speaking beings does not have to face up to, which is that there are some of them who do not have the phallus. A double intrusion into lack, because there are those who do not have one, and then this truth was lacking up to the present. Sexual identification does not consist in believing oneself to be a man or a woman, but in taking account of the fact that there are women, for the boy, and that there are men, for the girl. And what is important, is not so much what they experience, it is a real situation, if you allow me, the fact is that for men, the girl is the phallus. And this is what castrates them. That for women, the boy, is the same thing, the phallus and this is what castrates them also, because all they acquire is a penis and that spoils things. Neither the boy nor the girl initially run risks except through the dramas that they unleash, they are the phallus for a moment. This is the real, the real of sexual enjoyment in so far as it is detached as such, it is the phallus, in other words the Name of the Father, the identification of these two terms having in its time scandalised some [pious?] people.

(34) But there is something that is worth insisting on a little more. What is the fundamentally foundational part in this operation of the semblance, such as the one that we have just defined at the level of the relationship of man and woman, what is the place of the semblance, of the archaic semblance? This assuredly is why it is worth the trouble to hold on a little more to the moment of what the woman represents. The woman is precisely in this relation, this relationship, for man, the moment of truth. The woman is in a position, with respect to sexual enjoyment, to punctuate the equivalence of enjoyment and the semblance. In this indeed lies the distance that man finds himself from her. If I spoke about a moment of truth, it is because she is the one that the whole formation of man is designed to respond to, and now over and against everything, the whole status of her semblance. It is certainly easier for a man to confront any enemy on the plain of rivalry than to confront the woman in so far as she is the support of this truth, of the semblance in the relationship of man to woman.

In truth, that the semblance is here enjoyment, for the man, is sufficiently indicated by the fact that enjoyment is semblance. It is because it [he?] is at the intersection of two enjoyments that man suffers in the highest way the malaise of this relationship that is designated as sexual. As someone or other said, these pleasures that are called physical.

On the contrary, no one other than the woman, because it is in this that she is Other, no one other than the woman knows better what is disjunctive between enjoyment and the semblance, because she is the presence of this something that she knows, namely, that enjoyment and semblance, if they are equivalent, in a dimension of discourse, are nonetheless distinct in the test, that the woman represents for man the truth, quite simply, namely, the only one that can give its place as such to the semblance. It has to be said, everything we have been told as being the mainspring of the unconscious represents nothing but the horror of this truth. It is this, of course, that today I am trying, I am attempting to develop for you just as one makes Japanese flowers. It is not particularly agreeable to listen to, because this is what is usually packaged under the register of the castration complex. By means of which, in that case, with this label, one is at peace, one can leave it to one side, one has no longer anything else to say about it, except that it is there and that one makes a little genuflection to it from time to time.

But that the woman is the truth of man, that this old proverbial business, when it is a matter of understanding something, the cherchez la femme, to which people naturally give a police-style (35) interpretation, is something completely different, namely, that to grasp the truth of a man, one would do well to know who his wife is.

I mean his spouse in this instance, and why not? This is the only situation that can give a meaning to something that one day someone in my entourage called the pèse-personne. To weigh a person, there is nothing like weighing his wife. When the woman is at stake it is not the same thing! Because the woman has a very great liberty....

Louder!
What's that?
We can't hear!
You can't hear?
No.

I said: the woman has very great freedom with respect to the semblance! She will manage to give weight even to a man who has none. These are...these are truths, of course, that in the course of the centuries, have been perfectly well noted for a long time, but which are never said except from mouth to mouth, as I might say. And a whole literature has been constructed, exists, it would be a matter of getting to know its breadth, naturally it is only of interest if one takes the best.

Someone, for example, that someone must take responsibility for one day, is Baltazar Gracian, who was an eminent Jesuit, who wrote some of the most intelligent things that could be written. They are absolutely prodigiously intelligent in that everything that is involved, namely, to establish what one could call the sanctity of man, he resumes in one word, resumes it in what? His book on the Courtier, in a word, two points: to be a saint. It is the only point of western civilisation where the word saint has the same sense as in Chinese, Tchen-Tchen. Note this point, because, this reference, because all the same it is late, today, I am not going to introduce it today, I will give you this year some little references to the origins of Chinese thinking.

In any case, yes, I have noticed one thing, which is that perhaps I am a Lacanian because I formerly did Chinese. I mean by that that I notice that in re-reading things like that, that I had gone over, but mumbled through anyway like a like a simpleton, with donkeys ears, I notice in re-reading them now that, it is on all fours with what I am (36) telling you.

I don't know, I will give an example; in Mencius, which is one of the fundamental, canonical books of Chinese thought, there is a chap who is his disciple moreover, not him, but who begins to state things like the following: "What you do not find on the side of yen, this is discourse, do not look for on the side of your spirit". I translate it for you as spirit, it is hsin, but that means, that by hsin which means heart, what he designated was well and truly the spirit, the Geist of Hegel. But anyway that would demand a little bit more development. "And if you do not find it on the side of your spirit, do not look for it on the side of your tchi", namely, of what the Jesuits translated like that, as best they could, losing breath a little, your sensibility. I am only indicating these stages to tell you the distinction which is very strict between what is articulated, what belongs to discourse, and what belongs to the spirit, namely, the essential, if you have not already found it at the level of the word, it is hopeless, do not try to find it elsewhere at the level of feelings. Meng-tseu, Mencius, contradicts himself, it is true, but it is a matter of knowing along what path and why.

This to tell you that a certain way of putting discourse right in the forefront is not at all something that makes us go back to archaisms because discourse at that epoch, and the epoch of Mencius, was already perfectly well articulated and constituted. It is not through references to primitive thinking that one can understand it. In truth, I do not know what primitive thinking is. Something much more concrete that we have within our reach, is what is called underdevelopment. But that underdevelopment is not archaic,

everyone knows that it is produced by the extension of the capitalist reign. I would even say more, what one notices, and what will be noticed more and more, is that underdevelopment is precisely the condition for capitalistic progress. From a certain angle, the October Revolution itself is a proof of it.

But what must be seen, is that what we have to confront is an underdevelopment that is going to be more and more patent, more and more widespread. Only what in short is at stake, is that we should put the following to the test: if the key of the different problems that are going to propose themselves to us is not to put us at the level of this effect of capitalist articulation that I left in the shadows last year by simply giving you its root in the discourse of the master, I will perhaps give you a little more of it this year. It would be well....we must see what we can draw from what I would call an underdeveloped logic. This is what I will try to articulate before you, as the Chinese texts say, "for your better use".

Seminar 3: Wednesday 10 February 1971

I was asked if I was going to give my seminar because of the strike. There were two or perhaps just one, but perhaps two of these people who asked me what I thought of the strike, more exactly they asked my secretary. Well I for my part ask you! Nobody has anything to bring up in favour of the strike? At least in connection with this seminar? I will not absent myself from you...from your presence. Nevertheless this morning I was myself rather inclined to go on strike. I was led to this because the person that I have just spoken about, my secretary, showed me a little rubric in a newspaper about the aforesaid strike. The slogan of the strike, to which there was added, given the newspaper in question, a communiqué from the Ministry of National Education about everything that had been done for the University; the averages of the teachers employed per number of students, etc. Naturally, I am not going to dispute these statistics. Nevertheless the conclusion that is drawn from them, of this very extensive effort which ought in any case to satisfy people, I will say that it does not agree with my information which nevertheless comes from a good source. So that...because of this, I was rather inclined to go on strike. Your presence will force me, let us say by a fact which counts, it is what is called in our tongue courtesy, and in another that I announced like that, as a sort of come-along, that I would refer to, namely, the Chinese tongue about which I went as far as to confide to you that there was a time, when I learned a little bit of it, it is called yi.

The yi, in the grand tradition, is one of the four fundamental virtues, (40) of whom? Of what? Of a man at a certain date. And if I speak about it like that, as it comes to me, because I thought I was going to have to make some casual remarks to you, it is moreover on this plane that I am going to give this discourse today. It will not be, properly speaking, what I had prepared. In my own way all the same I will take account of this strike and it is in a way - you are going to see, the level at which I am going to put things - it is in a more familiar way to reply in a fair-minded way. This is more or less the best sense that can be given to this yi, to reply in a fair-minded way to this presence. You will see that I shall take advantage of it to tackle a certain number of points that have given rise to an equivocation for some time. Namely, that since moreover there is something in question in the University, it is also at the level of the University - the movements of which in many cases I disdain to remark on when I hear about them - that today I think I should respond.

As perhaps you know – how can we know whether your presence bears witness to it or not - in my relationship to the aforesaid University I am only in what could be called a marginal position. It believes it should give me some shelter, for which certainly I pay it homage, even though for some time something has manifested itself that I cannot but take into account, given the field in which I find myself teaching. It is a certain number of echoes, of rumours, of murmurs that come to me from a quarter of a field defined in a university fashion and which is called linguistics.

When I speak, of course about disdain, I do not mean a feeling; what is at stake is a way of behaving. At a time which already, precisely, if I remember correctly, is something like...how long ago is it, two years, it is not enormous, there came out in a journal that nobody reads any more, whose very name seems out of date, La Nouvelle Revue Française, there appeared a certain article called Exercices de

style de Jacques Lacan. It was an article that I signalled, moreover, at that time I was under the roof of the Ecole Normale, anyway under the roof!...under the porch roof, at the door. I said: "You should read that, it will give you a laugh". It proved, as you saw subsequently, that it was perhaps a little less funny than it seemed, because it was in a way the bell in which I was rather, even though I was deaf, to hear the confirmation of what had already been announced to me: that my place was no longer under that porch roof. It is a confirmation that I could have heard, because there was written in the article, there was written something that I must say is rather crude, that one might (41) hope, now that I am no longer under the porch roof of the Ecole Normale, for the introduction into the aforesaid Ecole, of linguistics, I am not sure of exactly quoting the terms, you can well imagine that I did not refer to it this morning, because all this is improvised, high quality, high tension linguistics, something or other of this kind, perhaps, something that designated the fact that something was besmirching the name of linguistics, good God, within this Ecole Normale. In the name of what, great God, I had no responsibility in the Ecole Normale for any teaching, but if the Ecole Normale found itself, according to this author, so little initiated in linguistics, it was certainly not I who should have been blamed for it.

This indicates to you the point on which I intend all the same to specify something this morning. It is in effect the following, something which is raised and for some time with a sort of insistence, the theme is taken up in a more or less frivolous way in a certain number of interviews, there is a question which is raised about something: is one a structuralist or not when one is a linguist? And people tend to demarcate themselves and say: I am a functionalist. Why am I a functionalist? Because structuralism, is something, moreover, that is a purely journalistic invention. I am saying, structuralism is something which serves as a label and which of course, given what it comprises, namely, a certain seriousness, does not fail to be disturbing, so that, of course, people want to stake out

their own preserve. [André Martinet interviewed in Le Monde, 5 January 1971.]

The question of the relationships of linguistics to what I teach, is, in other words, what I want to put in the forefront in order, in a way, todissipate, dissipate I hope in a way that will mark an epoch, a certain equivocation. Linguists, the university linguists, would like in short to reserve to themselves the privilege of speaking about language. And the fact that it is around the development of linguistics that the axis of my teaching operates, is attached to, is supposed to be excessive in some way and is denounced in different formulae the principal one of which is the following, in any case it seem to me to be the most consistent one. That of linguistics there is made - in the field which happens to be the one that I am inserted into, in the one also in which someone who certainly, on occasion, would deserve to be looked at a little more closely, much more as regards what comes from me, because....which people might have only a rather vague idea of, at least it is proved, Levi- Strauss for example, and so then Levi-Strauss and then some others again, Roland Barthes - we also are supposed to be making of linguistics a use, I quote, "a metaphorical use". Well now! It is in effect about (42) this that I would like to clearly make some points. First of all there is something from which we should start because all the same it is written, written in something that counts, the fact that I am still here sustaining this discourse, the fact that you are also here to listen to it, the fact is, we have to believe that a formula is not altogether displaced as regards this discourse, in so far as I pronounce it, the fact is in a certain way finally, let us say that I know....I know what? Let us try to be exact, it seems to be proven that I know what I should keep to (je sais à quoi m'en tenir). Holding a certain place, I am underlining this, this place is no other – I am underlining it because I am not stating it for the first time, I spend my time clearly repeating that this is what I hold onto – than the place that I identified as that of a psychoanalyst – the question can after all be debated, because many psychoanalysts debate it – but in any case this is what I hold to.

It is not quite the same as if I were to state, I know where I stand (je sais où je me tiens), not because the I is repeated in the second part of the sentence, but this is where language always shows its resources, it is because to say I know where I stand, it is on the where that the emphasis would be put as regards what I was priding myself knowing. I would have, as I might say, I would have the map, the mapping of the thing. And why after all would I have it?

There is a strong reason why I could not even sustain that I know where I stand. This is truly the axis of what I have to tell you this year. The fact is that the principle of science in so far as the process is engaged for us, I am talking about what I refer to when I give its centre as Newtonian science, the introduction of the Newtonian field, the fact is that in no domain of science, does one have this mapping this map, to tell us where we are. And what is more, everyone agrees with this, but whatever the worth of the ell, of the objection that may be raised once one begins to speak precisely of a map, of its chance and of its necessity, well then, anyone at all is in a position to object to you that you are no longer doing science, but philosophy. That does not mean that anyone at all knows what he is saying when he says it. But anyway, it is a very strong position.

The discourse of science rejects this where we have got to (où nous en sommes) it is not with this that it operates. As regards the hypothesis, remember Newton affirming that he did not claim to construct any, the hypothesis, although used, never concerns the foundation of things. A hypothesis, in the scientific field, and whatever anyone may think, a hypothesis is, above all, something to do with logic. There is an if, the conditional of a truth that is never (43) articulated except logically; so then, apodosis: a consequent ought to be verifiable. It is verifiable at its level, as it is articulated.

This in no way proves the truth of the hypothesis. I am absolutely not in the process of saying that science is swimming about there like a pure construction, that it does not engage with the real. To say that it does not prove the truth of the hypothesis, is simply to recall what I have just said, namely, that implication in logic in no way implies that a true conclusion cannot be drawn from a false premise. It nevertheless remains that the truth of a hypothesis in an established scientific field is recognised from the order that it bestows on the totality of the field in so far as it has its status and its status cannot be defined otherwise than by the consent of all those who are authorised in this field, in other words the status of the scientific field is of a university kind (universitaire).

These are things that may appear crude. It nevertheless remains that this is what justifies situating the level of the articulation of the University discourse, as I tried to do last year. Now it is clear that the way that I articulated it is the only one that allows it to be noticed why it is not accidental, out of date, linked to some accident or other. The status of the development of science involves the presence, the subvention of other social entities that are well known, the Army for example, or again the Navy, and of some other elements for a certain provisioning. It is quite legitimate if we see that radically the University discourse can only be articulated if it starts from the discourse of the Master.

The distribution of domains in a field whose status is university-like, is the only place where there can be posed the question of what is happening and first of all of whether it is possible for a discourse to be entitled differently. Here there is introduced in its massiveness – I apologise for starting again from such a basic point, but after all since there are directed at me, and from people authorised as being linguists, objections like the one that I only make a metaphorical use of linguistics, I ought to recall, I ought to respond whatever may be the occasion I do so, and I am doing it this morning because of the fact that I was expecting to meet a more combative atmosphere – well then, I ought to recall here then, that if I can say decently that I know, I know what? Because after all perhaps I put myself somewhere in a place that the person called Mencius, whose name I introduced to you the last time, the person called Mencius, may perhaps allow us to (44) define, good, it remains that if – may Mencius protect me! – I know what to limit myself to, I have to say at the same time that I do not know what I am saying. I know that what I am saying, in other words, is what I cannot say. This is the date, the date that marks the fact there is Freud and that he introduced the unconscious. The unconscious means nothing if it does not mean that whatever I say, or wherever I stand, even if I behave correctly, well then, I do not know what I am saying, and that none of the discourses, as I defined them last year, leave any hope, allows anyone to put forward anything at all, to claim, to hope even in any way to know what he is saying.

I say, even if I do not know what I am saying; only I know that I do not know it. And I am not the first to say something in these conditions. It has already been heard. I say that the cause of this is only to be sought in language itself and that what I am adding, what I am adding to Freud, even if in Freud it is already there, open to view, because whatever he demonstrates about the unconscious is never anything but language material, I add this: that the unconscious is structured like a language. Which one? Well then, precisely, look for it!

I will talk to you (je vous causerai) about French and about Chinese. At least I would like to. It is only too clear that at a certain level, what I cause is bitterness, especially on the side of linguists. This is of a nature rather to make one think that the university status is only too obvious in the developments that force linguistics to turn into a funny mixture; from what one sees of it, there is no doubt about it. That I should be denounced on that occasion, good God, is not that important. That people will not debate with me, is not very surprising either, because I do not take my stand from a certain definition of the university domain, nor could I do so.

The amusing thing is, since it is obvious that it is not our fault, a certain number of people among whom I ranked myself earlier, adding to it two other names and one could add a few more, it is obviously starting from us that linguistics sees there increasing the number of posts, those counted out this morning in the review of the Ministry of National Education, and then also the number of students. Good!

The interest, the wave of interest that I contributed to bringing to linguistics, is, it appears, an interest that comes from the ignorant. Well then! That already is not too bad! They were ignorant before, now they are interested. I succeeded in interesting the ignorant in (45) something that, in addition, was not my goal, because linguistics, I can tell you, I don't give a damn about it! What interests me directly, is language, because I think that this is what I am dealing with, that that is what I am dealing with when I am dealing with a psychoanalysis.

It is up to the linguists to define the linguistic object. In the field of science, every domain progresses by defining its object. They define it as they wish and they add that I am making a metaphorical usage of it. It is curious all the same that linguists do not see that every use of language, whatever it may be, moves around in metaphor, and that the only language is metaphorical, as is demonstrated by every attempt at metalanguage, if I can express myself in this way, which can do nothing other than to try to start from what has always been defined, every time people advance onto an effort described as logical (logicien), to define first of all an object-language in which it is clear, in which one puts one's finger, in the statements of any one of these logical efforts, that this language-object is ungraspable. It is of the nature of language, I am not saying of speech, I am saying of language itself, that as regards approaching anything whatsoever that is signified in it, the referent is never the right one, and this is what makes a language.

Every designation is metaphorical; it can only be done through the mediation of something else. Even if I say: that! That and pointing at it, well then, I already imply, by calling it that, that I chose to make it nothing but that. Even though that is not that, the proof is that when I light it, it is something different, even at the level of that, this famous that (ça) which is supposed to be the redoubt of the particular, of the individual, we cannot omit that it is an event of language to say: 'that'. What I have just designated as that is not my cigar, it is so when I smoke it, but when I am smoking it, I do not talk about it. The signifier to which the discourse refers to on occasion, when there is discourse – it appears that we can scarcely escape from what is discourse – is what the discourse about something refers to and this signifier may be the only support. Of its nature it evokes a referent. Only this cannot be the right one and that is why the referent is always real, because it is impossible to designate it. In consideration of which, the only thing that remains is to construct it. And one constructs it if one can.

There is no reason why I should deprive myself, anyway I am not going to remind you all the same of what you all know about because you have read it in a pile of occult thrash that you drink in as (46) everyone knows, do you not, I am speaking about the yang and the yin. Like everyone else you know that, huh, the male and the female. They are drawn like that. They form very beautiful little characters. Here is the first as yang and as for the yin, I will make it for you another time.

I will make it for you another time because...in this connection...I do not see why I should misuse...these characters that count so little for you. I am going to make use of them all the same. We are not here

yang

either to do conjuring tricks. If I speak to you about it, it is because it is quite obvious that...here is the example of unfindable referents. That does not mean, damn it, that they are not real. The proof is that we are still encumbered with them.

If I make a metaphorical use of linguistics, it is starting from the fact that the unconscious cannot adapt itself to a research, I mean linguistics, that is unsustainable. This does not prevent it continuing, of course, it is a wager. But I have already made enough use of the wager to know, for you to know rather, that you should suspect that it can be of some use; it is just as important to lose as to win.

Linguistics can only be a metaphor that is fabricated in order not to work. But when all is said and done, it is of great interest to us, because you are going to see - I am announcing it to you, this is what I have to tell you this year - is that psychoanalysis for its part, moves about in this same metaphor under full sail; this indeed is what suggested to me this return, like that, after all, we know what it is, to the Chinese I learned in the past. After all, why would I not have understood it too badly when I learned it from my dear master Demiéville? I was already a psychoanalyst.

So then, for there to be a tongue all the same in which the following, this is read wei and it functions both in the formula wu wei which means inaction, so then it means to act, and then you see wei used as like, it means like, namely, that it acts as a conjunction to make a metaphor. Or again it means, in so far as that refers to something which is even more into metaphor, in so far as it refers to something, (47) namely, precisely, it is not one because one is forced to refer to it. When one thing refers to another, the greatest possible breadth, the greatest possible flexibility is given to the eventual use of this term wei which nevertheless means to act. It is not bad, a tongue like that! A tongue where the verbs and the plus-verbs – to act, what is more of a plus-verb, what more active plus-verb is there? – is

transformed into tiny conjunctions. That is the usual thing. This helped me a lot all the same to generalise the function of the signifier, even if it fits in badly with some linguists who do not know Chinese. For my part I would really like to ask a particular one, for example how for him the double articulation that he keeps talking about for some years – I tell you this double articulation is killing us – what does he make of the double articulation in Chinese? Huh? In Chinese, you see, it is the first that is all alone, and then finds itself like that producing a meaning which from time to time means that, since all the words are monosyllabic, one cannot say that there is a phoneme which means nothing, and then the word that means something, two articulations, two levels. Well then, yes, even at the level of the phoneme, that means something. This does not prevent when you put several phonemes together, which mean the same thing, this gives a big word of several syllables, just like with us, which has a meaning that has no relationship with what each of the phonemes mean. So the double articulation looks rather funny there! It is funny that it is not remembered that there is a tongue like that, when one states as general a function of the double articulation as characteristic of language. I don't mind if all I'm saying is pure stupidity, but explain it to me! Let a linguist come here who can tell me how the double articulation holds up in Chinese [cf. André Martinet, Eléments de linguistique général, new edition, Paris 1967.]

So then, this wei like that, to get you used to it I am introducing it, but very gently. I will bring you a minimum of other things, which may in fact be of some use. It illuminates many things moreover that this verb is at the same time to act and the conjunction of the metaphor. Perhaps the Im Anfang war die Tat, as your man says, there where the act was right at the beginning it is perhaps exactly the same thing as to say en arché, in the beginning was the word. There is perhaps no other act than this. The terrible thing is, is that I can lead you like that for a long time with metaphor and the further I go, the more you will go astray because precisely, what is proper to the

metaphor is not to be all alone. There is also metonymy which functions at this time and even while I am speaking to you , because it is after all the metaphor, as very competent, very friendly people called linguists tell us; they are even so competent that they have been forced to invent the notion of competence. The tongue is competence in itself. What is more it is true. One is competent in nothing else. Only, since they have also perceived, there is only one way to prove it, which is performance. They are the ones who call it that, performance. I don't, I have no need of it. I am in the process of giving it, the performance, giving the performance of speaking to you about metaphor, naturally I confuse you, because the only interesting thing, is what happens in the performance, it is the production of surplus enjoying, of yours and of the one that you impute to me when you reflect. That happens to you. That happens to you especially when you ask yourselves what I am doing here. It must be that this gives you some pleasure, at the level of this surplus enjoying that pressurises you; as I already explained to you, it is at that level that the operation of metonymy is carried out, thanks to which you can be more or less led anywhere at all, led by the nose, naturally not simply to go along the corridor. But this is not what is interesting, to lead you into the corridor, nor even to beat you in the public square. The important thing, is to keep you there, well arranged, close together, well pressed against one another. As long as you are there, you are doing nobody any harm! This will take us rather far, this little banter, because it is all the same starting from there that we are going to try to articulate the function of yin.

You understand, I remind you of this business of the surplus enjoying, I remind you of it anyway as I am able; it is quite certain that it was only definable by me starting from what? From a serious construction, that of object relations as it can be separated out from the experience described as Freudian. That is not enough. I had to scupper these relations to make them the bowl of Marx's surplus value, which nobody had ever dreamt of as having this use. Marx's

surplus value cannot be imagined just like that. If it is invented, it is in the sense that the word invention means that one finds a good thing already well established in a little corner, in other words that one makes a lucky discovery. To make a lucky discovery, it was necessary that it should be there already well polished, grounded, by what, by a discourse. So then, surplus enjoying, like surplus value, is only detectable in a developed discourse, that there is no question of debating whether it can be defined as the discourse of the capitalist. (49) You are not very curious, and then especially not very interventionist, so that last year, when I spoke to you about the discourse of the Master, no one pushed me to ask me how the discourse of the Capitalist was situated within it. For my part I was expecting that, I was only waiting to explain it to you, especially because it is the simplest thing possible. A tiny little contraption that turns and your discourse of the master shows everything that is highly transformable into the discourse of the capitalist. That is not what is important, the reference to Marx was enough to show you that it had the closest relationship with the discourse of the master. What I am trying to get to is the following, it is to catch hold of something as essential as what is here, let us say the support – the support, everyone knows that I do not pile it on for you, it is indeed the thing that I am most distrustful of in the world, because it is indeed with that of course that people make the worst extrapolations, it is with this in a word that people construct psychology, psychology, this is what is necessary to be able to manage to think out the function of language – so then when I realise that the support of surplus enjoying is metonymy, it is because here I am entirely justified, this is what ensures that you follow me, through the fact that this surplus enjoying is essentially a sliding object. Impossible to stop this slide at any point of the sentence.

Nevertheless, why should we refuse to notice that the fact that it is useable in a discourse - a linguistic one or not, as I already told you, it is all the same to me - in a discourse which is my own, and that it is only such by being borrowed not from the discourse, but from the logic of the capitalist, something that introduces us, or rather brings us back to what I contributed the last time and which left some people a little bit perplexed. Everyone knows that I always finish what I have to tell you in a little gallop, because perhaps I dragged things out too much, dawdled along earlier, some people tell me, what matter, everyone has his own rhythm. That is how I make love.

I spoke to you about an under-developed logic. That left some people scratching their heads. What could that be, this under-developed logic?

Let us start from this. I had clearly marked out beforehand that what carries along the extension of capitalism, is under-development. Anyway I am going to say it now because someone that I met on the way out and to whom I confided something, I told him "I would really like to have illustrated the thing by saying that Mr Nixon, is in fact Houphouet-Boigny in person", "Oh", he told me, "you should have said it". Well then I am saying it. The only difference between (50) the two, is that Mr Nixon is supposed to have been psychoanalysed! You see the result! When someone has been psychoanalysed in a certain way, and this is always true in every case, when he has been psychoanalysed in a particular way, in a certain field, in a certain school, by people that one can name, well then, he is incurable. All the same you have to say things the way they are. He is incurable. It even goes very far. It is for example obvious that it is ruled out that someone who has been psychoanalysed somewhere, in a certain place, by certain people specifically, not by just anyone, well then, he can understand nothing of what I am saying. That has been seen and there are proofs. Books even come out every day to prove it. Just by itself, that gives rise all the same to questions about what is involved in the possibility of performance, namely, of functioning in a certain discourse.

So then, if the discourse is sufficiently developed, there is something, let us say no more, this something as it happens is you, but that is a pure accident, nobody knows your relationship to this something, it is a something that interests you all the same.

You see this is how this is written. That can be read, in a classical French transcription sing. If you put an h in front – hsing – this is the English transcription, and the most recent Chinese transcription, if I am not mistaken, because after all it is purely conventional, is written like that: xing. Naturally that is not pronounced xing, it is pronounced 'sing. It is nature. It is this nature which you have been able to see I am far from ruling out of the affair. If you were not completely deaf, you were able to notice all the same that the first thing that was worth retaining in what I told you in our first talk, is that the signifier – I strongly insisted – can be found everywhere in nature. I spoke to you about stars, more exactly of constellations, because there is a star and a star; for centuries all the same that is what the sky is: it is the first feature, what is above, that is important. It is a tray, a blackboard. I am reproached for using a blackboard. It is the only thing that remains to us to serve as a sky, my good friends, that is why I use it, to put on it what ought to be your constellations.

t'ien (tian)

(51) So then, a sufficiently developed discourse. From this discourse the result is that all of you no matter how many of you there are, and whether you are from here or from the USA, it is the same thing, and even elsewhere, you are underdeveloped with respect to this discourse. I am talking about this thing, this something by which people are interested but which is certainly what people speak about when they speak about your underdevelopment. Where is it to be situated exactly? What can be said about it? It is not doing philosophy to ask where it comes from, what is its substance. There are things in this dear Meng-Tzu, I do not see, after all, any reason to drug you, I really have no hope that you will make the effort to stick your nose into it, so then I will go moreover, why not, to what I have

to set out in three stages, especially since he tells us extraordinarily interesting things. There is one thing, there is no knowing how it came out moreover, because it is made God knows how, it is a collage, this book of Meng-Tzu, things follow one another, as they say, and are not alike. Anyway! Alongside this notion of hsing, of nature, there emerges all of a sudden that of ming, the decree of the heavens.

Obviously, I could very easily stick with the ming, with the decree of the heavens, namely, continue my discourse, which means in short: that is how it is because that is how it is, one day, science will grow on our terrain. At the same time capitalism did its own thing, and then there was a chap, God knows why, heaven's decree, there is Marx who has, in short, ensured a rather long survival for capitalism. And then there is Freud who all of a sudden was disturbed by something which obviously became the only element of interest that still had some relationship with this thing that people had previously dreamt about and which was called knowledge. At an epoch when there was no longer the slightest trace of something which had a meaning of this kind, he noticed that there was the symptom.

(52) This is where we have got to. It is around the symptom that there turns everything that we can, as they say, if the word still had a meaning, have an idea of. It is around the symptom that you orient yourselves, as many of you as are here. The only thing that interest you, and which does not fall flat, which is not simply inept as information, are the things that have the appearance of a symptom, namely, in principle, things that make a sign to you, but that you understand nothing about. It is the only sure thing, that there are things that make signs to you that you know nothing about.

I will tell you how man, it is untranslatable, that is how it is, he is a good chap, made up of curious little turns of juggling and exchange between hsing and ming. It is obviously much too subtle for me to speak about it to you today, but I put it at the horizon, at the point, in order to tell you that this is where we have to get to, because in any case, this xin, is something that does not work out, that is underdeveloped; we really have to know where to put it. That it can mean nature, is not very satisfactory given the state that things are at as regards natural history. This hsing, there is no kind of chance that we will find it in this thing that requires great cunning to get, to get a close hold of, which is called the surplus enjoying. If it is so slippery, that does not make it easy to get one's hands on it. It is all the same not, certainly not to this that we refer when we talk about underdevelopment.

I know well that by ending now, because time is passing, I am going to leave you perhaps a little bit in suspense. All the same, I am going to go back, onto the plane of metaphorical acting and to tell you how, because today that was my pivot, linguistics properly filtered, criticised, focussed, in a word, on condition that we make of it exactly what we want and what linguists do, good God, why not take advantage of it? They may happen to do something useful. If linguistics is what I was saying earlier, a metaphor that is deliberately fabricated in order not to work, this may perhaps give you ideas about what may well be for us the goal. From where we situate ourselves with Meng-Tzu and then some other people at his epoch who knew what they were talking about, because you must not confuse all the same underdevelopment with the return to an archaic state, it is not because Meng-Tzu lived in the 3rd Century before Jesus Christ that I am presenting him to you as a primitive mentality. I am presenting him to you as someone who, in what he said, probably (53) knew part of the things that we do not know when we are saying the same thing. So then, this is what may serve to teach us with him to sustain a metaphor, not fabricated in order not to work, but whose action we suspend. It is here perhaps that we will try to show the necessary path.

I will remain there today for a discourse that might not be a semblance.

Seminar 4: Wednesday 17 February 1971

[Before the seminar Lacan writes on the board a quotation from Meng-Tzu: probably the following.]

"Everywhere under the heavens, when one speaks about nature, what is meant are natural effects"

孟子

- This is the name of the author of this little formula...
- Louder!
- This is the name of the author of this little formula!
- Thank you.
- this little formula to which, despite the fact that it was written around 250BC, in China as you see, in chapter 2 of Book IV, the second part, sometimes it is classified in a different way, so that in that case it would be part VIII, of Book IV, the second part of paragraph 26 of Meng-Tzu, whom the Jesuits called Mencius, because they are the ones who took a step forward, well before the epoch when there were sinologists, namely, at the beginning of the 19th Century. I had the pleasure of acquiring the first book on which there are found conjointly a plaque of Chinese printing, it is not quite the same thing as the first book in which there were at the same time Chinese characters and European characters, it is the first book in which there was a Chinese printing plate with things written, with things printed, from our part of the world. It is a translation of Aesop's fables. This appeared in 1840, and it prides itself, quite rightly in being the first book in which this conjunction was realised. (56) 1840, you can say that it is more or less, precisely, the notice of the moment when sinologists came on the scene. The Jesuits were in China for a very long time, as perhaps some of you may remember. They almost made the connection between China and what they represented as missionaries. Only they allowed themselves to be a little, a little bit impressed by the Chinese rites, and as you know perhaps, in the middle of the 18th Century, that created some difficulties for them with Rome, which did not show on this occasion particular political acuity. That happens sometimes in Rome. Anyway in Voltaire, if you read Voltaire, but of course no one reads Voltaire anymore, you are making a great mistake, it is full of all kinds of things. In Voltaire, there is, very exactly in Le Siècle de Louis XIV, an appendix, I think that it forms a particular lampoon, a long elaboration about this Quarrel of the Rites, of which many things in history now find themselves in a position of filiation.

In any case then, we are talking about Mencius, and Mencius wrote this – because I wrote it on the board....to begin with that does not form properly speaking a part of my discourse today, that is why I finished it before the exact hour of 12.30 – I will tell you, or I am going to try to make you sense what it means, and then this will get us into the swing of what, properly speaking, is the object of what I want to state today, it is namely that....in what preoccupies us, what is the function of writing (l'écriture).

Since writing, exists in China since...time immemorial, I mean that well before we have to properly speak of works, writing already existed for an extremely long time, and one cannot evaluate how long it did exist. This writing has, in China, an altogether pivotal role, in a certain number of things that happened, and it is rather...it is quite illuminating as regards what we may think about the function of writing. It is certain that writing has played a quite decisive role in supporting something, something to which we have... this particular access and no other, namely, a type of social structure that was sustained for a very long time and from which, until a recent epoch,

one could conclude that there was a completely different filiation as regards what was supported in China, than what was engendered among us, and specifically by one of these phyla that interest us particularly, namely, the philosophical phylum in so far as, I highlighted it last year, it is nodal to understand what is at stake as regards the discourse of the Master.

(57) So then this is how this exergue is stated. As I showed you on the board the last time this designates the heavens, it is called tien. T'ien hsia, is under the heavens, everything that is under the heavens. Here there is a determinative tchih, what is at stake is something that is beneath the heavens; what is beneath the heavens, is what comes afterwards. What you see there is nothing other than the designation of the word that on this occasion we will state as yen. Yen hsing, I already put it on the board the last time, in signalling to you that this hsing, was precisely one of the elements that will preoccupy us this year, in so far as the term that gets closest to it is nature. And yeh is something that concludes a sentence without saying, properly speaking, that what is at stake is something of the order that what we are stating here is, being, it is a conclusion. It is a conclusion or let us say a punctuation, because the sentence continues here since things are written from right to left, the sentence continues here with a certain tse which means consequently, or which in any case indicates the consequence. So then let us see what is at stake. Yen means nothing other than language, but like all the terms stated in the Chinese tongue, it is liable also to be used in the sense of a verb. So then that can mean both the word and the one who speaks, and who speaks what? In this case that would be what follows, namely hsing, nature, what speaks about nature under the heavens, and yeh would be a punctuation.

Nevertheless, and this is why it is interesting to take an interest in a sentence of the written tongue, you see that you can cut things up differently and say: the word, indeed the language, because if it was a matter of specifying the word, we would have another character that is slightly different. At this level, as it is written here, this character can just as well mean word as language. These sorts of ambiguities are altogether fundamental in the use of what is written, very (58) precisely, and this is the importance of what I am writing. As I pointed out to you, as I pointed out to you at the start of my discourse this year, and especially the last time, it is very precisely in so far as the reference as regards everything involved in language is always indirect that language takes on its import.

We could then also say: language, in so far as it is in the world, as it is under the heavens, language, is what makes hsing, nature, because this nature is not, at least in Meng-Tzu, just any nature, what is at stake is precisely the nature of the speaking being, which, in another passage, he is careful to specify is the difference between this nature and the nature of the animal, a difference, he adds, he highlights in two terms which mean what they mean, "an infinite difference." And which perhaps is the one that is defined there. You will see, moreover, whether we take one or other of these interpretations, the axis of what is going to be said as a consequence will not be changed.

Tse therefore, is the consequence. In consequence, ku, is here ku, in consequence, relates to the cause – because cause means nothing else, whatever may be the ambiguity that in a certain book, a certain book called Mencius on the mind, namely, a book produced by someone called Richards, who was certainly not a newcomer – Richards and Ogden are two leaders of a position originating in England and altogether in agreement with the best tradition of English philosophy, who established at the beginning of this century the doctrine described as logical positivism, whose major work is entitled The meaning of meaning. It is a book to which you will already find an allusion in my Ecrits where I take up a certain disparaging position with regard to it. The meaning of meaning means le sens du sens. Logical-positivism proceeds from this requirement that a text should

ku (gu)

have a graspable meaning, which leads it to a position which is the following: a certain number of philosophical statements find themselves in a way devalorised in principle by the fact that they are not...that they give no graspable result as regards a search for meaning. In other words, if a philosophical text is caught red handed in non-sense, it is ruled out for that very reason. It is only too clear (59) that this is a way of pruning away the things that scarcely allows us to find our way, because if we start from the principle that something that has no meaning cannot be essential in the development of a discourse, we quite simply lose our bearings. I am not saying of course, that such a requirement is not a procedure, but that this procedure forbids us in a way any articulation whose meaning is not graspable, this is something which, for example, may culminate in the fact, for example, that we can no longer make use of mathematical discourse, which, on the admission of the most qualified logicians, is characterised by the fact that it may be that at one or other of its points, we can no longer give it any meaning - which does not prevent it from being precisely, among all the discourses, the one that is developed with most rigor. We find ourselves moreover, because of this fact, at a point that is quite essential to highlight concerning the function of writing.

wei (wei)

li (li)

erh (er)

i (yi) de erh i

i (yi)

So then, it is ku that is at stake, it is ku that is at stake and as i wei, because I already told you that this wei that can in certain senses mean to act indeed something that is of the order of to do even thought it is not just anything whatsoever, i here has the sense of something like with, it is with that we are going to proceed like, like what? Like li, this is the word about which I point out to you, I am highlighting for you the fact that li, I repeat, that this li which means reward, interest, profit, and the thing is all the more remarkable in that precisely Mencius, Mencius in his first chapter, in presenting himself to a certain prince, it does not matter who, of what made up the kingdoms described, described afterwards, as the warring kingdoms, finds himself with this prince who demands his advice,

with this prince, pointing out that, he is not there to teach him what constitutes our law which is present to everyone, namely, what is appropriate for the increase of the wealth of the kingdom, and specifically what we would call surplus value. If there is a meaning that one can give retroactively to li, this indeed is what is at stake. (60) Now, it is indeed here that it is remarkable to see that what Mencius points out on this occasion, is that starting then from this word which is nature, or if you wish from the word that concerns nature, what is going to be at stake, is to arrive at the cause, in so far as the aforesaid cause, is li, erh, i i, which means the li, erh is something that means at the same time like and, and like but, erh i, is simply that, and so that there can be no doubt about it, the i that ends, which is a conclusive i, this i has the same accent as simply. It is li, and that is enough. Here I am allowing myself in short to recognise that, as regards the effects of discourse, as regards what is under the heavens, what emerges from it is nothing other than the function of the cause, in so far as it is surplus enjoying.

You will see, if you refer to the text of Meng-Tzu, you have two ways of doing it, you can find it on the one hand in an edition that in short is very good which was produced by a Jesuit at the end of the 19th Century, someone called Wieger, in an edition of the Four fundamental books of Confucianism. You have another way, which is to get hold of this Mencius on the mind, which was published by Kegan Paul in London. I do not know if nowadays there are a lot of copies still available, as they say, but after all it is worth the trouble, why not, to try to get it for those who might be curious to consult something that is so fundamental, for a certain illumination of a reflection on language which is the work of a neo-positivist and which is certainly not negligible. Mencius on the mind, therefore, by Richards, can be found in London at Kegan Paul. And those who find it worthwhile to take the trouble of getting a copy, if they cannot get the book, could get perhaps a photocopy, and they will understand all the better a certain number of references that I will make to it this year because I will come back to it.

It is one thing then to speak about the origin of language, and another thing of its link to what I am teaching, to what I am teaching in conformity with what I articulate, what last year I articulated, as the discourse of the analyst. Because you are well aware, linguistics began with Humboldt with this sort of prohibition, not to ask oneself the question of the origin of language, otherwise one would certainly go astray. It is no small thing that someone should have noticed at the height of the period of developmental mythmaking, this was the style at the beginning of the 19th Century, should have posited that nothing would ever be situated, established, articulated, about language, if one did not start first of all by forbidding the questions of (61) origin. It is an example which might well have been followed elsewhere, this would have avoided us a lot of lucubrations of the type called primitivist. There is nothing like a reference to the primitive to...make thinking more primitive. It is what regularly regresses to the very measure of what it claims to discover as primitive.

The discourse of the Analyst, I have to tell you, because in short you have not heard it, the discourse of the Analyst is nothing other than the logic of action. Why have you not heard it? Because in what I articulated last year with these little letters on the board, in this form, the small o over the S_2 and of what happens at the level of the analysand, namely, the function of the subject in so far as he is barred and in so far as what he produces as signifiers, and not just any ones, master signifiers. It is because it was written like that, because I wrote it down on many occasions, it is for that very reason that you did not hear it. It is in this way that writing is differentiated from speaking, and it is necessary to put the word back into it and to butter it up seriously, but naturally not without fundamental drawbacks for it to be heard. One can write then a whole pile of things without them reaching any ear. It is nevertheless written. That is even the reason that I called my Ecrits as I did. That scandalised, like that, sensitive people and not just anyone. It is very curious that the person that this literally threw into convulsions was a Japanese woman. I will deal with that later. Naturally here, it did not give anyone convulsions, the Japanese woman that I spoke about is not here. And anybody at all, who comes from that tradition, will be able I think on this occasion to understand why this kind of effect of insurrection was produced. It is through the word of course that the path towards writing is opened up. If I entitled my Ecrits that, it is because they represented an attempt, an attempt at writing, which is very sufficiently marked by the fact that it culminated in graphs. The trouble, is that, is that people who claim to give a commentary on me start immediately from the graphs. They are wrong, the graphs are only understandable in function, I would say, of the slightest effect of style of the aforesaid Ecrits, which are in a way the steps to reach it. As a result of this the written, the written taken up all by itself, whether it is a matter of one or other schema, the one that is called L or any other one whatsoever, or the big graph itself, presents an opportunity for all sorts of misunderstandings. What is at stake is a (62) word, in so far as, of course, and why, it tends to clear the way to these graphs that is at stake. But it would be well not to forget this word, for the reason that it is the very one that is reflected by the analytic rule which is as you know, speak, speak, speak. It is enough for you to speak, here is the box from which there come all the gifts of language, it is a Pandora's box. What is the relationship then with these graphs? These graphs of course, no one has yet dared to go that far, these graphs in no way show you anything whatsoever that allow you to return to the origin of language. If there is something that appears there immediately, it is that not alone do they not give it, but they do not promise it either.

What is going to be at stake today is the situation with respect to the truth that results from what is called free association, in other words a free use of the word. I have never spoken about it except with irony. There is no more free association than one could say that a variable linked to a mathematical function is free, and the function defined by analytic discourse is obviously not free, it is bound, it is bound by conditions that I will rapidly designate as those of the analytic consulting room. At what distance is my analytic discourse as it is here defined by this written arrangement, at what distance is it from the analytic consulting room, this is precisely what constitutes what we will call my disagreement with a certain number of analytic consulting rooms. So then this definition of analytic discourse, to highlight where I am, does not appear to them to be adapted to the conditions of the psychoanalytic consulting room. Now, what my discourse outlines, or at least delivers, is one part of the conditions that constitute the analytic consulting room. Just measure what one does when one goes into analysis, it is something that indeed has its importance, but in any case as far as I am concerned, is indicated by the fact that I always undertake numerous of preliminary conversations.

A pious person that I will not designate otherwise found, it appears, according to the latest news, anyway news three months old, at least it was an unsustainable wager for her to ground transference on the subject supposed to know, because moreover the method implies that it is sustained by a total absence of prejudice as regards a case. The subject supposed to know what, then? I would allow myself to ask this person, if the psychoanalyst should be supposed to know what he is doing, and if he effectively does it? Starting from there, starting from there one will understand that I pose my questions on transference in a certain way, in The direction of the treatment for example, which is a text to which I see with pleasure in my school (63) something new is happening. The fact is that in my school people are starting to work as a school, this is all the same a step that is new enough to be noted. I was able to note not without pleasure that people had seen that in this text, I do not in any way settle what is involved in transference. It is very precisely by saying the subject supposed to know, as I define it, that the question is...remains untouched as to whether the analyst can be supposed to know what he is doing.

To take it up in a way at the start, the start of what today is going to be stated, and for which this little Chinese character because this is one, it is one of them, I greatly regret that the chalk did not allow me to put in the accents that the brush would allow, it is one of them which has a meaning, to satisfy the requirement of the logical positivists, a meaning which you are going to see is completely ambiguous because it means at the same time twisted (retors) that it also means personal in the sense of private. And then there are still other ones. But what appears remarkable to me, is its written form, and its written form is going to allow me to tell you immediately where there are placed the terms around which my discourse today is going to turn.

szu (si)

If we place here somewhere (1) what I am calling in the broadest sense – you are going to see that it is broad...I should say that I have no need, it seems to me, to underline it – the effects of language, it is here (2) that we will have to put what is involved, where they find their source. Where they find their source, is in the fact that analytic discourse reveals something which, which is a step, I tried to recall it, even though what is at stake for analysis is primary truth. It is with this that I am going to begin right away. We would have here then (3) the fact of writing.

(64) It is very important at our epoch, and starting from certain statements that have been made and that tend to establish very regrettable confusions, to recall that all the same writing is not the first step but the second with respect to a whole function of language, and that nevertheless without writing, it is in no way possible to come back and question what results in the first place from the effect of language as such, in other words the symbolic order, namely the dimension, to please you, but you know that I introduced the term of demansion the demansion, the residence, the locus of the Other of truth. I know that this demansion raised a question for some people, echoes have come back to me, well then, if demansion is in effect a term, a new term that I fabricated and if it still has no meaning, well then, that means that it is up to you to give it one. To question the demansion of the truth, of the truth in its dwelling place, is something, here is the term, the novelty of what I am introducing today, which can only be done by writing, and by writing in so far as it is only from writing that logic is established. This is what I am introducing at this point of my discourse this year. There is no logical question unless it starts from writing, in so far as writing is precisely not language. And this is why I stated that there is no meta-language, that writing itself in so far as it is distinguished from language is there to show us that, if it is from writing that language is questioned, it is precisely in so far as writing is not it, but that it only constructs itself, only fabricates itself from its reference to language.

After having posited this which has the advantage of opening up to you my perspective, my project, I start again from something which concerns this point, this point which is of the order of this surprise to which there is signalled the effect of retrogression by which I have tried to define the junction between truth and knowledge, and that I stated in these terms that there is no sexual relationship in the speaking being. There was a first condition which could have immediately allowed us to see it, which is that the sexual relationship, like every other relationship when all is said and done,

only subsists from the written. What is essential in the relationship, is an application, a applied onto b (a→b), and if you do not write this a and b, you do not sustain the relationship as such. This does not mean that things are not happening in the real. But by what right would you call it a relationship? Something as crude as that would be already enough, let us say, to make it conceivable, that there is no sexual relationship, but it would in no way settle the fact that one cannot manage to write it. I would even say more, there is something that has been done for some time, which is to write it like this: ♂ ♀, (65) using little planetary signs, namely, the relationship of what is male to what is female. I would even say that for some time, thanks to the progress that the use of the microscope allows, because let us not forget that before Swammerdam, one could have no kind of idea of it, this...may seem to articulate the fact that the relationship, however complex it may be, however meiotic the process may be by which cells described as gonadic give a model of fecundation from which proceeds reproduction, well then, it seems that in effect something is founded, established there, that allows there to be situated at a certain level described as biological what is involved in the sexual relationship. The strange thing assuredly – and after all, good God, not all that much so, but I would like to evoke for you the dimension of strangeness of the thing – is that the duality and the sufficiency of this relationship have from all time had their model, I evoked it for you the last time in connection with little Chinese signs, they are those whose signs, all of a sudden I became impatient to show you, this seemed to be done simply to startle you, well then, the yin that I did not make for you the last time here it is – and the yang, here it is. I am repeating myself am I not, right! Another little feature here. The yin and the yang, the male and female principles, are things which after all are not special to the Chinese tradition. This is something that you will find in every kind of cogitation about the relationships of action and passion, about the formal and the substantial, about Purusha, the spirit, and Prakriti some feminised matter or other. The general model of this relationship of the male to

yang

天 t'ien (tian)

下 hsia (xia)

the female is indeed what has always haunted for all time the mapping out, the mapping out of the speaking being as regards the forces of the world, those which are t'ien hsia, under the heavens.

It would be well to mark something completely new, what I called the effect of surprise, to understand what has emerged, whatever it may be worth, from analytic discourse. It is that it is untenable to (66) remain in any way with this duality as sufficient, the fact is that the function described as the phallus, which is to tell the truth very awkwardly handled, but which is there, which functions in what is involved, not simply in an experience, linked to something or other that would be considered as deviant, as pathological, but which is essential as such for the establishment of analytic discourse. This function of the phallus renders henceforth untenable this sexual bipolarity, and untenable in a way that literally makes vanish into thin air anything involved about what can be written about this relationship.

It is necessary to distinguish what is involved in this intrusion of the phallus, from what some people thought they could express by the term of "lack of signifier". It is not the lack of signifier that is at stake, but the obstacle raised to a relationship. The phallus, by emphasising an organ, does not designate, does not in any way designate the organ described as the penis with its physiology, nor even the function that one may, faith, attribute to it with some verisimilitude, as being that of copulation. It aims in the least ambiguous way, if one refers to analytic texts, at its relationship to enjoyment. And this is how they distinguish it from the physiological function. There is, this is what is posited as constituting the function of the phallus, there is an enjoyment which constitutes in this relationship, different from the sexual relationship, what, what we will call its condition of truth. The angle from which the organ is taken which, with respect to what is involved for the totality of living beings, is in no way linked to this particular form; if you knew the variety of organs of copulation that exist in insects, you could, which is after all the source of what is still wearing well, namely, astonishment, to question the real, you could certainly, in effect, be astonished that it is like that in particular that it functions in vertebrates. What is at stake here is the organ in so far – I have to go quickly here, because I am not after all going to go on forever and take up everything again, people can consult the text that I spoke about earlier, The direction of the treatment and the principles of its power – the phallus is the organ in so far as it is, it is being that is at stake, in so far as it is ...feminine enjoyment. This is where and in what there resides the incompatibility of being and having. In this text, this is repeated with a certain insistence, and putting into it certain emphases of style, which I repeat are just as important to make one's way as the graphs at which they culminate. And behold, I had in front of me, like that, at the famous Congrès de Royaumont, some people who laughed derisively, if everything is there, if it is a matter of being and having, that did not seem to them to have any great importance, being and having. One makes one's choice, huh! (67) This is nevertheless what is called castration.

What I am proposing is the following, it is to posit that we will put language here (1), in its reserved field in this gap of the sexual relationship, as the phallus leaves it open, by positing that what it introduces here, is not, not two terms that are defined as male and female, but this choice between these terms of a quite different nature and function that are called being and having. What proves, what supports, what renders this distance absolutely obvious, definitive, is the following, something whose difference it does not seem people have noticed, is the substitution for the sexual relationship of what is called sexual law. It is here that there is this distance in which it is inscribed that there is nothing in common between what can be stated as a relationship which lays down the law in so far as it derives, in some form or other, from the application that a mathematical function circumscribes most closely, and a law that is coherent to the whole

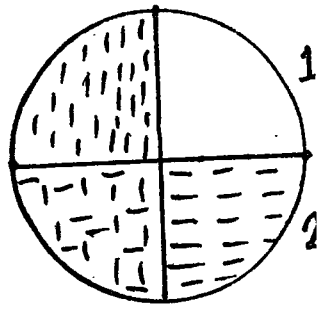
register of what is called desire, of what is called prohibition, of what underlines that it is from the very gap of the inscribed prohibition that there derives the conjunction, indeed the identity, as I dared state, of this desire and of this law, and what is posited correlatively for everything that derives from the effect of language, from everything that establishes the demansion of the truth from a structure of fiction.

The correlation that has always been made between ritual and myth, whose ridiculous weakness is to say that myth is supposed to be simply a commentary on the ritual, what is done to sustain it, to explain it, while it is, in accordance with a topology that I have already for long enough given a destiny not to have to recall it, ritual and myth are like the front and the back (l'endroit et l'envers), on condition that this front and this back are in continuity. The maintaining, the maintaining in analytic discourse of this residual myth that is called the Oedipus complex, God knows why, which is in fact that of Totem and taboo, in which there is inscribed this myth that is entirely invented by Freud, of the primordial father in so far as he enjoys all the women, it is all the same here that we ought to question a little further from the point of view of logic and of writing, what it means.



It is a long time since I introduced here the schema of Peirce about propositions in so far as they are divided into four, universal, particular, affirmative and negative, the two terms, the two couples of terms interchanging. Everyone knows that to say that: every x is y, if the schema of Peirce, Charles Sanders, has an interest, it is to show, it is to define as necessary that every something is provided with such an attribute, is a perfectly acceptable universal position without there being for all that any x. In Peirce's little formula, little schema, I remind you, here we have a certain number of vertical strokes, here we have none, here we have a little mixture of the two, and that it is from the overlapping of two of these boxes that there results the specificity of one or other of these propositions. And that it is by bringing together these two quadrants that one can say: every stroke is vertical. There is no stroke if it is not vertical. To give the negative, it is these two that must be brought together. Either there is no stroke, or there are none that are vertical. What the myth of the enjoyment of all the women designates, is that there are not all the women. There is no universal of the woman. Here is what is posed by a questioning of the phallus, and not of sexual relationship, as regards what is involved in the enjoyment it constitutes, because I said that it was feminine enjoyment.

It is starting from these statements that a certain number of questions can be radically displaced. After all, but it is possible that there is a knowledge of the enjoyment that is called sexual which is attributable to this particular woman. This is not unthinkable, there are like that, mythical traces of it in certain corners. The things called Tantra, it is said that this is practised. It is all the same clear that for a good while, if you will allow me to express my thinking in this way, the skill of female flute players is much more open to view. It is not to ... play with obscenity that I am putting forward that at this point. The fact is, there is here, and I suppose there is at least one person who knows what it is to play the flute, it is the person who recently, pointed out to me in connection with this flute playing, but one can (69) say it also with respect to any use of an instrument, what division from the body the use of an instrument, whatever it may be, makes necessary. I mean a breakdown of synergy. It is enough to play any instrument whatsoever. Get onto a pair of skis, and you will see immediately that your synergies have to be broken. Take up a golf club, I do this from time to time, I started again, it's the same thing, huh? There are two types of movement that you have to make at the same time, at the beginning you will absolutely not succeed in doing it, because synergetically, it is not arranged like that. The person who reminded me about the thing in connection with the flute, also pointed out to me that for singing, where in appearance there is no instrument, this is why singing is particularly interesting, it is because here too you have to divide your body, that you divide two things which are quite distinct, in order to be able to sing, but which usually are absolutely synergetic, namely, the placing of the voice and breathing. Good! These primary truths which I did not need to be reminded of, because moreover I told you that I had my last experience of it with a golf club, this is what leaves open, as a question, whether there is still somewhere a knowledge of the instrument phallus.

Only the phallus instrument is not an instrument like the others, it is like singing, the phallus instrument, I already told you that it is not at all to be confused with the penis. The penis, for its part, is regulated by law, namely, by desire, namely, by surplus enjoying, namely, by the cause of desire, namely, by phantasy. And this, the supposed knowledge of the woman who is supposed to know encounters a problem (un os) precisely the one that the organ is lacking, if you will allow me to continue in the same vein. Because in certain animals there is one of bone. Yes! Here there is a lack, it is a missing bone, it is not the phallus, it is desire or its functioning. The result is that a woman has the testimony of her insertion into the law, of what supplies for the relationship, only through the desire of the man. Here it is enough to have a tiny little bit of analytic experience to be certain of it, the desire of the man, as I have just said, is linked to its cause, which is surplus enjoying, or again as I put it on several occasions, if it has its source in the field of...from which everything starts, the effect of language, in the desire then of the Other, and the woman, on this occasion, one sees that it is she who is the Other. Only she is the Other from a completely different source, from a completely different register than her knowledge, whatever it may be.

(70) Here then the phallic instrument is posited, with inverted commas, as "cause" of language, I did not say the origin. And here, despite the late hour, good God, I will go quickly, I will point out the trace that one can have of it, namely, the maintaining, whatever you may wish, of a prohibition on obscene words. And because I know that there are people who are waiting for this something that I promised them, to make an allusion to Eden, Eden, Eden, ah! And to say why I do not sign, what are they called, these things, these petitions, in this connection, the fact is, it is certainly not because my esteem for this attempt is lukewarm. In its way, it is comparable to my Ecrits. Except that it is much more despairing; it is completely hopeless to language the phallic instrument. And it is because I consider it as being hopeless at this point that I also think that nothing but misunderstandings can develop around such an attempt. You see that my rejection is placed at a highly theoretical point on this occasion.

What I want to get to is this: from where does one question the truth? Because the truth can say whatever it wants. It is the oracle. That has always existed, and after that, we can only do the best we can. Only there is a new fact, huh? The first new fact ever since the oracle has been functioning, namely, from all time. The new event is one of my writings called The Freudian thing where I indicated something that no one had ever said, huh? Only since it is written, naturally you have not heard it. I said that "the truth speaks I, la vérité parle Je." If you had given its weight to this kind of polemical luxuriance that I carried out to present the truth as that, I no longer even know what I wrote, like coming into a room to the sound of a shattering mirror, that would perhaps have opened your ears. This sound of breaking mirrors does not strike you in something written. It is nevertheless rather well written, this is what is called an effect of style. This would certainly have helped you to understand what is meant by "the truth speaks I".

That means that you can say thou to it and I am going to explain what use that is to you. You are going to think of course that I am going to tell you that it can be used for a dialogue. It is a long time now since I said that there was no dialogue. And with the truth, naturally, still

less. Nevertheless, if you read something La Métamathématique by Lorenzen, I brought it along, it is published by Gauthier-Villars et Mouton. Good! And then I am even going to indicate the page where you will see some very clever things. They are dialogues, they (71) are written dialogues, namely, that it is the same person who writes the two rejoinders. It is a quite particular dialogue, only it is very instructive. Look at page 22. It is very instructive and I could translate it in more ways than one, including making use of my earlier being and having. But I will tackle things more simply in order to recall to you something that I already emphasised, namely, that none of the so-called paradoxes that classical logic dwells on, specifically the one of I am lying, hold up except from the moment they are written. It is quite clear that to say I am lying is something that creates no obstacle, because we do nothing but that, so then why would it not be said? What can that mean? That it is only when it is written that here there is a paradox, because people say: "Well here, either you are lying or you are telling the truth?" It is exactly the same thing that I pointed out to you at one time, as to write: "The smallest number that can be written in more than 15 words". You see no obstacle to it when you say it. If it is written, you count them, you see that there are only 13 of them, in what I have just said. But that is only counted when it is written. Because if it is written in Japanese, I would defy you to count them. Because here you ask yourself the question all the same, there are little bits of wailing like that, little o's and little oua's, about which you ask whether they must be stuck to the word, or whether they must be detached and counted as a word, it is not even a word, it is eh, it is like that. Only when it is written, it is countable.

So then the truth, you will notice that exactly as in the metamathematics of Lorenzen, if you posit that one cannot at the same time say yes and no on the same point, there you win. You will see later what you win. But if you bet that it is either yes or no, there you lose. Consult Lorenzen, but I am going to illustrate it immediately. I posit: it is not true, I say to the truth, that you are telling the truth and that you are lying at the same time. The truth can answer many things. Because it is you who make it answer, it costs you nothing. In any case, this is going to culminate at the same result, but I will detail it for you to remain close to Lorenzen. She says: "I am telling the truth!"; you answer her: "I am not making you tell it!". So then to piss you off, she says to you: "I am lying." To which you reply: "Now I have won, I know that you are contradicting yourself!" It is exactly what you discover with the unconscious, it is no more important. That the unconscious always tells the truth and that it lies, is, from its point of view, perfectly (72) sustainable. It is simply up to you to know it. What does that teach you? That you do not know something about the truth until it is unleashed; because it is unleashed, it has broken your leash, it has told you the two things, moreover, when you said that the conjunction was not sustainable.

But suppose on the contrary, that you had said to her: "Either you are telling the truth, or you are lying". Well in this case you have had all your trouble for nothing. Because what is she going to answer you: "I grant it to you, I put myself in chains; you tell me: either you are telling the truth or you are lying and in effect that is quite true." Only in that case then, you for your part know nothing. You know nothing about what she has told you, since either she tells the truth or she lies, so that you lose out. I do not know whether you see the relevance of this, but it means something that we have constant experience of, which is that if the truth refuses itself, in that case it is of some use to me. This is what we have to deal with all the time in analysis and that, that she gives up, that she accepts the chain, whatever it may be, well then, it's all Greek to me. In other words that...that leaves me desiring. That leaves me desiring and that leaves me my position of demanding, since I am wrong to think that I can only deal with the truth that I can only recognise when it is unchained, showing you in what un-chaining you are participating.

There is something that deserves to be highlighted in this relationship, it is the function of this something that for a long time I have been putting like that on the mat, and which is called freedom. It happens that through the phantasy, there are people who lucubrate about certain ways in which if not the truth itself, at least the phallus could be tamed. I am not going to tell you about all the variety of details in which these lucubrations can be laid out. But there is one striking thing. It is that, apart from a certain kind of lack of seriousness which is perhaps the most solid way to define perversion, well then these elegant solutions, it is clear that the people for whom that ... it is serious, this whole little affair, because good God, language counts for them and so does writing, if only because it allows for a logical questioning, because when all is said and done, what is logic if not this absolutely fabulous paradox that only allows writing to take the truth as a referent? It is obviously through this that one communes, when one begins by giving the first, the very first formulae of propositional logic, one takes as a reference that there are propositions that can be marked as True and others that can be marked as False. It is with this that there begins the reference to (73) truth. To refer oneself to the truth, is to posit an absolute false, namely, a false to which one could refer oneself as such.

Serious people, I take up again what I am in the process of saying, to whom there are proposed these elegant solutions which might bring about the taming of the phallus, you know it is very curious, it is they who reject them. And why, if not to preserve what they call liberty, in so far as it is precisely identical to this non-existence of the sexual relationship. Because after all, do we need to point out that this relationship of man and woman, in so far as it is radically falsified by the law, the law described as sexual, is all the same something that leaves it to be desired that each man has his woman (qu'á chacun il y ait sa chacune) to respond to it. If this happens what can we say? Certainly not that this is something natural, because in this respect

there is no nature, since The woman does not exist – that she exists is the dream of a woman, and it is the dream from which Don Juan emerged, if there were A man for whom The woman existed, it would be marvellous, one would be sure of one's desire. It is a feminine lucubration. For a man to find his woman, what else if not the romantic formula: it was destined, it was written.

Once again, we have come to this crossroads at which I told you I would tip over what is involved in the true lord, this chap who is translated, very badly, faith, by man, like that a little bit above the common, it is this see-saw, between the hsing, this nature as it is inscribed by the effect of language, inscribed in this disjunction between a man and a woman. And on the other hand this: "it is written", this ming, this other character, whose shape I already once showed you here, which is the one before which freedom retreats.

Seminar 5: Wednesday 10 March 1971

Lacan writes on the board:

"L'achose"

Am I, am I present when I am speaking to you? It is necessary that the thing I am addressing you about should be there. Now, it is enough to say that the thing (la chose) can only be written as l'achose as I have just written it on the board, which means that it is absent there where it holds its place. Or more exactly, that the o-object which holds that place, when it is removed – when this o-object is removed – only leaves, in this place, only leaves the sexual act as I emphasise it, namely, castration. I cannot bear witness from there, if you will allow me, that la-na-lyse is anything whatsoever, but only by this, what concerns it (la) I am saying concerns it, la, castration. Make no mistake: Oh-la-la! The philosophical patter which is not nothing – patters, churns, it does no harm – was of some use for a long time, but for some time it wearies us. It ended up with producing a being-there, that is sometimes translated more modestly in French as presence, whether or not one adds living to it, anyway, what for the learned is called Dasein. I rediscovered with pleasure, in a text, I will tell you which one later, and so that the moment that I reread it, a text of my own, I noticed with surprise that it goes back a long way, this formula that I had stated at one time for people, like that, a little hard of hearing: "Eat your Dasein." What matter! We will come back to it later. The philosophical patter is not so incoherent. It only

incarnates this presence, the 'being there', in a discourse that begins (80) precisely by disincarnating through an epoché. You know that, the epoché, putting in brackets, that is simply what it means, it is all the same better, because it does not have quite the same structure, it is all the same better in Greek. So that...it is obvious that the only way to be there takes place by putting oneself in brackets. We are approaching what I have essentially to tell you today.

If there is a hole at the level of l'achose, this allows you already to have a presentiment that it was a way of representing this hole, that this only happens in the shape of what? Let us take a quite derisory comparison, in the shape of this retinal stain that the eye has not the slightest desire to become entangled with, when after it has fixed the sun, first of all, it looks around the landscape. It does not see in it its being-there, this eye is no fool. There are for all of you a whole lot of Klein bottles...of the eye [Klein d'oeil = clin d'oeil, a wink?] There is no philosophical patter, which does not, as you clearly see, fulfil here its university office, whose limits I tried to give you last year, at the same time moreover as the limits of what you can do from inside, even if it is revolution.

To denounce, as has been done, to denounce as logocentric the aforesaid presence, the idea as they say of the inspired word, in the name of the fact that the inspired word, of course one could laugh at it, to make the word responsible for all the kinds of foolishness into which a certain discourse has strayed and to lead us towards a mythical archi-writing, uniquely constituted in short from what is perceived, quite correctly, as a certain blind point, that one can expose in everything that has been cogitated about writing, all of this scarcely marks an advance. One only ever speaks about something else in speaking about l'achose. What I said, for my part, at one time, one should not be exaggerated. I am not always talking about the full word and I think all the same that the great majority of you have never heard me in any way taking it into account. What I said about the full word, is that it fills (elle remplit). This is one of the lucky finds of language; they are always rather pretty, it fulfils (remplit) the function of l'achose which is on the board. The word, in other words, goes beyond the speaker, always, the speaker is someone spoken, this is all the same what I have been stating for some time. How can this be seen? This is what I would like to indicate in this year's seminar. Can you imagine, I am still at ... "I would like". After the 20 years that this has been going on.

Naturally, that is how things are because, after all, I did not say it, it has been clear for a long time, it has been clear first of all by the fact that you are there for me to show it to you, only there you are, if what (81) I am saying is true, your being there is no more convincing than my own. What I have been showing (montrer) you for some time is not sufficient for you to see it, I have to prove (démontrer) it to you. To prove on this occasion, is to say what I was showing, naturally not just anything, but I did not show you l'achose, like that, l'achose precisely cannot be shown, it is proved. So then I will draw your attention to the things that I showed, in so far as you have not seen them, so that they can be proved. To play the card that is at stake today, we will call it, with all the ambiguity that it may represent, writing (l'écrit).

Writing all the same, you cannot say that I have overburdened you with it. I mean that there really had to be extracted from me those that I collected one fine day, because of my total incapacity to make myself understood by psychoanalysts, I mean even those who remained tied in, like that, because they were not able to get on board elsewhere. Finally, it appeared to me that there were so many other people than they who for their part were interested in what I was saying, a little beginning of an absent being-there, that I let these Ecrits out. And then, faith, they were consumed like that, in a much larger circle than, in short, you represent, if I am to believe the figures that my editor gives me. It is a funny phenomenon that is worthwhile dwelling on, if indeed, to stick with what I always do. It is very exactly in terms of an experience that can be clearly fixed and that in any case I strove to articulate, specifically in recent times, last year, in trying to situate in its structure what characterises the discourse of the analyst. It is then by reason of this use of mine - which has no pretension to providing a conception of the world, but simply of saying what it seems self-evident to me to be able to say to analysts - about this, I gave for 10 years, in a rather well known place that is called Sainte-Anne, a discourse that did not claim certainly in any way to use writing otherwise than in a very precise way, which is the one that I am going to try to define today. Those who constitute, or who remain as witnesses of this epoch cannot protest against it, there are all the same not many in this room, of course, but all the same some. Anyway they could be counted on the fingers of one hand, those who were there the first months, can bear witness that what I did, with patience, tact, sweetness, bowing and scraping, I (81) constructed for them bit by bit, and fragment by fragment, things that are called graphs. There are some of them still sailing on, you can find them very easily thanks to the work of someone whose devotion I pay homage to, and whom I allowed to make, just as he wished, a reasoned index, in the text of which you can easily find the pages on which these graphs are to be found. That will avoid you having to search. But it can be seen, by simply doing that, one can already note that there are things which are not like the rest of the printed text. These graphs that you see here do not fail, of course, to set a little difficulty of what? Of interpretation, of course. You should know that for whom I constructed them, were not able to win even a single trick. Before putting forward the direction of a line, its crossing with a particular other, the indication of the little letter that I put at this crossing point, I spoke for a half an hour, three quarters of an hour, to justify what was at stake.

I insist, of course, not to make a merit out of what I did, fundamentally I liked doing it, no one asked me to do it, it was rather

the contrary. But because we are entering here, with that, into the heart of what is involved in l'écrit, indeed even l'écriture, so now imagine it is the same thing, people speak about l'écriture, like that, as if it were independent of l'écrit. This is what sometimes greatly embarrasses discourse. Moreover this term, "ure", like that, that is added on, allows you to clearly sense the funny sort of drunkenness (biture) that is involved on this occasion. What is certain, is that to speak about l'achose, as it is here, well then, that ought already, just by itself, enlighten you that I had to take, let us say no more, as apparatus, the support of writing (l'écrit) in the form of the graph.

It is worthwhile looking at the shape of the graph. Let us take here – I don't know - any one of them, the last one, here, the big one that you are going to find, I no longer know myself where it is, where it can be found, I think it is in Subversion of the subject and dialectic of desire. It is a thing that looks like that, in which there are here letters added in brackets, $ ◊ D of demand, and here is the S of the signifier, the signifier bearer of the function of O barred, Ø. You clearly understand that if writing can be of some use, it is precisely because it is different to the word. Who can take support on the word. The word cannot express S(Ø) for example. Only if it is based on that, even if it were only this shape, of course, it ought to remember that this shape does not work without there being here the other line (83) cutting the first, marked at these points of intersection of s(O) and of O itself. That there is here a capital I – I apologise for these infringements, but after all some people have this figure enough in their heads for this to be enough for them and for the others, good God, let them consult the proper page – what is certain, is that one cannot but, at least through this, through this figure, feel oneself, let us say, called on to answer the requirement of what it commands, when you begin to interpret it. Everything depends, of course, on the sense that you are going to give to capital O. There was one proposed in the writing where I happened to insert it. And then the sense that is imposed for all the others is not all that free.

What is certain, is that what is proper to what anyway, I think, is certainly sufficiently specified for you since. Namely, that this graph, this one like all the others, and not simply mine, I will tell you that in a moment, that this graph, what it represents, is what is called, in the evolved language that has been given to us little by little by the questioning of mathematics by logic, is what is called a topology. There is no topology without writing. You have even perhaps been able to notice, if ever you really opened the Analytics of Mr Aristotle, that in it there is a little beginning of topology which consists precisely in making holes in what is written. "All animals are mortal". You say "animals" and you say "mortal" and you put in their place, the high point of writing, namely, a quite simple letter. So it is perhaps true, huh, that this was facilitated for them by some particular affinity or other that they had with the letter, one cannot really say how. On this you can consult things that are very...very attractive, as Mr James Février said, about some artifice, fakery, forcing, involved in the invention of logic with regard to what can rather sanely be called the norms of writing – les normes, not l'énorme, even though both are true. I am suggesting in passing to you today that this has something to do with, let us say, the fact of Euclid.

There you are, because I can only throw that out in passing, since after all it has to be checked out. I do not see why I also, why from time to time, I would not give, even to people very experienced in a certain area, a little suggestion that they will perhaps laugh at because they have noticed it a long time ago. I do not see why in effect they would not have noticed, they would not have noticed the fact that a triangle, because this is the start, that a triangle, is nothing other than, nothing else than a writing (écriture) or an écrit, precisely. And that the fact that you define equal in it as metrically superimposable that goes against it. It is a writing, where the metrically superimposable can be talked about. This does absolutely not depend on the separation, it depends on you the talker. No matter how you write the triangle, even if you do it like that, you will demonstrate the history of the isosceles triangle, namely, that if there are two equal sides, the two other angles are equal. It is enough for you to have made this little writing, because it is never much better than the way in which I have just written it, the figure of an isosceles triangle. They were people who had gifts for writing, huh! That does not take them very far!

One could perhaps go a little bit further. For the moment let us record, let us record the following in any case, which is that they very clearly perceived what a postulate was, and that this has no other definition than the following, which is that...in the demand, in the demand that one makes to the listener, in order not to say right away a hook (crochet), in this demand, this is what is not required of discourse, by the simple fact of the graph.

The Greeks seem then to have possessed a very clever handling, a subtle reduction of what already existed in the world under the species of writing. It was extremely useful. It is quite clear that there is no question of empire, if you will allow me the word, even the slightest empiricism, without the support of writing. If you will allow me here, an extrapolation with respect to the line that I am going along, I mean that, I am going to indicate the horizon, the distant perspective that guides all of this. Naturally, this is only justified if the lines of perspective prove effectively to converge. (85) What follows will show it to you. At the beginning, en arché, huh, as they say, which has nothing to do with any temporality whatsoever, because what flows from it is, in the beginning was the word. But the word, there is a good chance that during times that were still not centuries, imagine, they are only centuries for us, thanks to radioactive carbon and some other retroactive affairs of this kind, which start from writing, anyway throughout a whole part of something that one can call, not time – l'aion, l'aion of aion as they say - there was a time when people had great fun with things like that. They had their reasons, they were closer than us. Anyway the word made things. Things that were certainly less and less discernible from it, because they were its effects.

What is meant by writing? It is necessary all the same to circumscribe it a little. It is quite clear and certain when one sees what it is usual to call writing, that it is something that in a way rebounds on the word. About the dwelling place of the word, we have I think, said enough the last few times, to see that our discovery is, at the very least, closely articulated with the fact that there is no sexual relationship, as I defined it. Or if you wish, that the sexual relationship, is the word itself. You must admit that all the same, that leaves something to be desired, moreover, I think that you know something about it.

The fact that there is no sexual relationship, I already fixed under this form that there is not for the relation any way at present of writing it. Who knows, there are people who dream that one day this will be written; why not, huh? The progress of biology, M. Jacob is all the same there, huh? Perhaps one day, there will be no longer the slightest question about the sperm and the ovum, they are made for one another, it will be written, as they say, it is on this that I ended the lecture the last time. When that happens you will tell me about it, won't you? One could make science fiction, huh? Try it, it is difficult to write. Why not, that is how we push things forward.

Whatever about the present, this is what I mean, the fact is that this cannot be written without bringing into play something a little funny - because precisely, one knows nothing about its sex - which is called the phallus. If everything one manages to write – I thank the person who told me the page where in my Ecrits there is what is involved in the desire of man, written as $\Phi(o)$; Φ, is the signifier phallus, this for people who believe that the phallus is the lack of the signifier, I know

(86) that that is debated in the cafes. There you are, and the desire of the woman....I don't give a damn about the Ecrits, huh? The desire of the woman is written Ø(φ), which is the phallus where people imagine it is, the little wee-wee.

Here is something that we are able to write better after, good God, something that we will simply call, like that, the fact of having arrived at, at a certain scientific moment. A scientific moment, is characterised by a certain number of written co-ordinates in the first rank of which is the formula that Mr Newton wrote, concerning what was at stake under the name of the gravitational field, which is simply a pure writing. No one has yet managed to give any substantial support, a shadow of verisimilitude to what this writing states, which seems up to the present a little hard, because people cannot manage to resorb it into the schema of other fields where, like that, people have more substantial ideas. The electromagnetic field gives you an image, huh? Magnetism, is always a little bit animal; the gravitational field for its part is not. It is a funny contraption. When I think of these gentlemen and soon these ladies and gentlemen who stroll around in this absolutely sublime place, which is certainly one of the incarnations of the sexual object, the moon, when I think that they go there simply carried by a writing, there is much to hope for. Even in the field where it might be of use to us, namely, desire. Anyway, it is not for tomorrow, huh! Despite psychoanalysis it is not for tomorrow or the day after.

Here then is writing in so far as it is something one can speak about. How? There is something that surprises me, even though it comes from the pen of a very special book that has been published by Armand Colin, anyway it is something that is very easy to find, it is in I don't know what number of the Congrès de Synthèse, and it is called, quite simply and nicely, L'écriture. It is a series of reports that begins with one by Métraux, this dear and now dead Métraux who was an excellent and really clever man. It begins with something by Métraux where he talks a lot about the writing of Easter Island. Anyway it is delightful. He starts simply from the fact that he, for his part, really understood absolutely nothing about it, but that there are some other people who succeeded a little better, that naturally it is debatable but anyway that his efforts, which obviously were absolutely unsuccessful, are here what authorise people to speak in effect about what the others were able to get from it with a questionable success. It is a quite marvellous introduction and well (87) designed to make you feel very modest, after which, innumerable papers deal with each of these writings. And after all, good God, it is rather sensible. It is rather sensible, anyway, it did not immediately happen, and we are going to see why it did not happen immediately that people started to say sensible things about writing. There was surely required, during this time, serious effects of intimidation, those which resulted from this blessed adventure that we call science, and none of us in this room, me included, of course, can have the slightest idea of what is going to come of it. Good, anyway let's leave it. People are going to get worked up a little bit like they do about pollution, about the future, a certain number of stupidities like that. And science plays its little tricks, and it would be no harm to see, for example, what its relationship with writing is, that may be of some use.

In any case, to read this large collection which is already a good ten years old, on writing, is something, compared to what is produced in linguistics, something fresh, you can breathe in it. It is not absolutely stupid. It is even very salubrious. There is even no question, when you come out of it, of you thinking that the business of writing only consists in something which seems to be nothing, but since it is written everywhere and no one reads it, it is all the same worth saying, that writing is the representation of words. That ought all the same mean something to you, Wortvorstellung. Freud wrote that, and he said that – but naturally everyone giggles, and people see clearly that Freud does not agree with Lacan – it is the secondary process. It is annoying all the same that, like that, in the circulation perhaps of your thoughts, of course you have thoughts, you even have, some of you who are a little bit backward, knowledge (connaissances). So then you imagine that you represent words for yourselves...it's hilarious! Because let's be serious! The representation of words, is writing.
